JAY AND ANOTHER V. BUDD.*

Practice—Writ—Substituted service—Defendant out of jurisdiction—Order 9, r. 2.

A writ for service within the jurisdiction was issued against a person who was at the time in England. Before the writ was served he went out of the jurisdiction, but not for the purpose of evading service.

Held, by Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Collins, L.J., Rigby, L.J., dissenting, that an order for substituted service of the writ could be made.

This was an appeal from the refusal of a Judge at Chambers to make an order for substituted service of the writ in the action.

The writ was issued against the defendant, a British subject, for service within the jurisdiction to recover a sum of money. It appeared from the affidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiffs that on October 5, 1897, the defendant, in answer to a letter from the plaintiffs, had an interview with one of the plaintiffs at their office in London, when the latter informed the defendant that he had heard that the defendant was leaving England and that his firm would require payment of their account. The defendant offered to give a post-dated cheque for the amount, which the plaintiff refused, stating that his firm would in all probability take bills for the amount. The defendant then left the office, no arrangement for payment having been come to. Upon October 6 the writ in the action was issued, and on the same day a clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitors, being instructed by telegraph, served a copy of the writ on the defendant, who was then on board a steamship in Southampton Docks about to sail for Jamaica. A gentleman, who was present, and who stated that he was the defendant's solicitor, asked the clerk to produce the original writ, which the clerk was unable to do, as the writ had only been issued in London that morning. The defendant's solicitor thereupon said that the service was not complete. The defendant sailed the same day for Jamaica, and the plaintiffs did not know any address in Jamaica where he could be found or communicated with, nor did they know when he was returning to England. It was stated in a letter from the defendant's solicitor that the defendant before leaving had delegated all matters of business to his manager in London. It was not alleged that the defendant had left England for the purpose of evading service of the writ. The Judge at Chambers having refused to order substituted service, the plaintiffs applied ex parte to the Court of Appeal for an order for substituted service.

Mr. MACASKIE, for the plaintiffs, contended that the order should be made. The defendant was within the jurisdiction when the writ was issued, and, therefore, the writ could have been personally served upon him before he left. In "Fry v. Moore," 23 Q.B.D., 395; and "Wilding v. Bean" (1891), 1 Q.B., 160, the defendant was out of the jurisdiction when the writ was issued, and, therefore, the writ could never have been personally served upon him. The doubt expressed in "De Bernales v. Bennett" (10 The Times L.R., 419), as to whether substituted service can be ordered in the case of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction was not applicable to the present case. He also referred to "Adler v. Mills" (1 The Times L.R., 308).

The COURT allowed the appeal, Rigby, L.J., dissenting.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that the old practice, where personal service could not be effected, was attended with great expense and inconvenience, and the rules under the Judicature Acts were intended to get rid of the expense and difficulty which stood in the way of honest litigants bringing reluctant opponents into Court. The great object of all such provisions was, on the one hand, that the person who had a claim against another should be enabled to bring his claim into Court, and, on the other hand, that the person against whom the claim was made should have an opportunity of answering the claim. Whether a person knew of the litigation against him or not, it had been provided that he must be properly summoned before the Court. By Order 9, r. 2, "If it be made to appear to the Court or a Judge that the plaintiff is from any cause unable to effect prompt personal service, the Court or Judge may make such order for substituted or other service . . . as may seem just." These words were very general, and he could not introduce into them an exception in the case of a person leaving the country upon hearing of the litigation against him. The question was whether prompt personal service could not be effected. If so, substituted service could be ordered, if the Court or Judge thought it in the interest of justice to do so in the particular case. It seemed to him that every element existed in this case which entitled the Court to make the order. The debtor and creditor knew each other well, and the former had practically admitted that he owed the debt. He received a copy of the writ, and left the country without giving any information as to his movements, and leaving no address, knowing well that he would thereby evade—though it was not suggested that he intended to evade—service of the writ. In his opinion the order for substituted service should be made. His lordship would regret if he were compelled to place a narrow construction on the rule. The service should be upon the defendant's solicitor, and upon the person to whom the defendant had intrusted the management of his affairs, and the defendant must have two months for entering an appearance.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY dissented. He did not know of any case where substituted service had been ordered in the case of a person who was at the time out of the jurisdiction. In his opinion the Judges would not have ordered substituted service in such a case, unless the defendant went abroad to evade service of the writ.

which was not the case here. The affidavits did not specify precisely the time on October 6 when the writ was issued. It seemed to him that "Wilding v. Bean," and other cases in this Court, showed that substituted service could not be ordered when the defendant could not, at the time, as he thought, of the application being made, be personally served. It was clear that in this case the defendant could not have been served with this writ at the time when the application for an order for substituted service was made. In his opinion the order should be refused.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed with the Lord Chancellor. The writ was issued before the defendant left the country, and a copy was actually served upon him, which would have been good service if the defendant's solicitor had not required the original writ to be produced. This was a writ for service within the jurisdiction, and they were not fettered by the law as to writs for service out of the jurisdiction. The case fell within the terms of Order 9, r. 2. In his opinion there was no case which debarred the Court from giving effect to the words of the rule and making the order. If, on the other hand, the writ had been issued after the defendant had left the jurisdiction, the only means of reaching him would have been by a writ for service out of the jurisdiction, unless, indeed, the defendant left for the purpose of evading service of the writ. That was so held in "Fry v. Moore" and "Wilding v. Bean."

RAYNES V. BALLANTYNE.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Exemptions from liability—Negligence.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy at the trial of the action with a special jury. The action was brought by the charterers of a ship against the owners to recover damages for injury caused to a pier belonging to the plaintiffs in consequence of negligence on the part of the defendants' servants. The alleged negligence consisted in unskillfulness in the management of the loading of the ship with a cargo of limestone, whereby the ship was caused to beat and work against the pier. The defendants contended that they were exempted from liability by express words contained in the charterparty to the effect that the owners should not be responsible for loss or damage of any kind arising from the neglect of the master or crew. The question was whether the case came within that exemption. On the part of the plaintiffs it was argued that before the case could be brought within the exemption it must first be brought within the contract of the charterparty, and that what they complained of was not a breach of that contract, but a breach of the general duty not to damage other people's property. The contract of the charterparty was a contract to load the cargo and carry it from the wharf, and that contract had been performed. The cause of action was a breach of a duty which did not arise from the charter at all. The defendants argued that the words of the exemption ought not to be narrowed in the way suggested by the plaintiffs, which would have the effect of making them apply only to loss or damage to the cargo. The jury having found that the damage to the pier had been caused by the neglect of the defendants' servants, the learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

*Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Carver appeared for the defendants; Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question was whether what the defendants had done was within the exemption. He thought that Mr. Justice Kennedy had not come to the right conclusion. What was the charterparty a contract for? It was argued that it was only a contract for the carriage of goods, and that there had been no breach of that contract. But according to his view that was not the real meaning of this charter. It was a time charter, and by it the vessel was to be placed at the disposal of the plaintiffs for 12 months, who required it for going to and from their jetty for the purpose of exporting merchandise. He thought that the clause on which the controversy turned relieved the defendants from liability for negligence in anything arising under the charter, and that what was complained of here was negligence in carrying out part of the duty which the defendants were bound to perform under the charter. In his opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS delivered judgments to the like effect.

F. PINET ET CIE. V. MAISON PINET (LIMITED).*

Trade Name—Imitation—Using own name—Tendency to deceive—Injunction.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of Mr. Justice Kekewich, dated August 6 last, refusing to grant the interlocutory injunction claimed by them. The plaintiffs are the well-known boot and shoe manufacturers of Paris and elsewhere, and their goods are commonly known throughout the United Kingdom as "Pinet's" boots and shoes. They recently discovered that boots and shoes not of their manufacture were being sold under the name of "Pinet's" by the defendant company. That company was incorporated in the early part of the present year (a) to acquire and take over the business of Louis Marius Pinet (trading as Maison Pinet) as then carried on by him in London; and (b) to carry on business in England and elsewhere as bootmakers and shoemakers, and especially makers of boots and shoes for the purpose of increasing height and to be used for walking, riding, cycling, tennis, dancing, shooting, fishing, or any other purpose." The business carried on by L. M. Pinet was a small and recently established business in the manufacture and sale of "elevators," being contrivances for adding height to short persons, and was not a business in boots and shoes. The plaintiffs alleged that the incorporation of the defendant company under the name of Maison Pinet (Limited) was merely a contrivance by means of which persons having no right to the name of Pinet might be enabled to compete with the plaintiffs; that the defendant company were advertising and offering for sale boots and shoes not being of the plaintiffs' manufacture, under the name of Pinet's, and were describing the same as "celebrated," notwithstanding that the same were quite unknown; and that confusion and deceit must necessarily result. The plaintiffs accordingly commenced this action, and then moved before Mr. Justice Kekewich for an interlocutory injunction, to restrain the defendant company, their servants, and agents, until judgment in the action or further order, from carrying on business as manufacturers or vendors of boots or shoes under the name of "Maison Pinet (Limited)" or under any other name or description of which the name "Pinet" formed part and which was so arranged or contrived as by colourable imitation of the plaintiffs' trading style or otherwise to be calculated to represent or lead to the belief that the defendant company were carrying on the plaintiffs' business, and from in any other manner representing or acting so as to lead to such belief as aforesaid. The learned Judge, however, did not think fit to make any order on the motion. From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. L. B. Sebastian were for the appellants.

Mr. E. BRODIE COOPER for the respondent company contended that the respondents' business had been limited to a particular class of goods of a special make; that they were not selling and had not sold boots of an ordinary description; that therefore the respondents were not carrying on the same business as the appellants; that no fraud on the part of the respondents had been proved; and that, short of fraud, the mere fact of the respondents' name being the same as the appellants did not entitle the appellants to an injunction.

Their LORDSHIPS reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich and allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case struck him as a tolerably simple one within certain limits. It appeared that L. M. Pinet carried on business as a boot and shoe manufacturer under the name of "Maison Pinet," but his business was practically confined to specially made boots and shoes for the purpose of adding to height. Their Lordships were not, therefore, embarrassed in the present case with any evidence to the effect that Maison Pinet before the defendant company was formed did any extensive amount of business in boots and shoes of the ordinary French make under the name of Maison Pinet or Pinet at all. The evidence which the Court had before it showed that to be so. That was the state of things in February, 1897. In February, 1897, the defendant company were formed primarily for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the business of L. M. Pinet under the name of Maison Pinet (Limited). If that had been all the Court would probably never have heard of this action, but the defendant company, in their memorandum of association, stated distinctly that they did not intend to confine their business, and if they could they would sell any kind of boots and shoes; they would not be content with a few orders such as Maison Pinet had before 1897; they would not be content to confine their business to that; they would do what business they could. It was merely throwing dust in one's eyes to say that the company would not if they could sell as many French boots and shoes as they found they could dispose of. The defendant company being formed for this purpose would, if they could, develop at the expense of the plaintiffs the business of L. M. Pinet and sell all they could. That was a prima facie case for an interlocutory injunction. But the plaintiffs asked the Court to go beyond what was necessary for their protection—at all events on an interlocutory application. The form of the injunction must be the same as in "Montgomery v. Thompson" ([1891] A.C., 217), and the defendant company must be restrained from carrying on their business as manufacturers of boots and shoes under any name or description of which "Pinet" formed part without clearly distinguishing the boots and shoes made or sold by the defendants from those made or sold by the plaintiffs.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment to the same effect.

BOOTH V. THE SALVATION ARMY BUILDING ASSOCIATION (LIMITED).*

Mortgage—Construction of mortgage deed—Covenant—Fetter on redemption.

This was an application, by originating summons, by "General" Booth, of the Salvation Army, against the defendant association, now in liquidation, and its liquidators, relating to a mortgage, dated July 9, 1892, by the "General" to the association of the copyright of the Salvation Army's weekly journal, the War Cry, and made in consideration of an advance by the association to the "General" of two sums of £1,500 each. The mortgage contained a covenant by the mortgagor for payment to the mortgagees of £3,570 by 84 monthly payments of £42 10s. each, with a proviso that the mortgagees might at any time give the mortgagor 14 days' notice demanding repayment of the two sums of £1,500 each advanced, with interest at 5 per cent. The association was formed in 1884 for the purpose of lending money to the "General" upon the security of property held by him in trust for or in connexion with the Salvation Army, the loans being repayable by monthly instalments. The "General" had repaid 57 of the 84 payments or instalments under the mortgage, and, upon the association recently going into liquidation, the liquidators on April 27 last served on the "General" a 14 days' notice demanding payment of the two sums of £1,500 each and interest to date, offering thereupon to repay the sums already paid by him to the association. The effect of that, according to the "General's" view, was that while, as regarded the principal, he would only have to pay the balance remaining unpaid, he would, as regarded interest, be charged with interest on the whole of the principal from the date of advance to the date of repayment of the balance of principal—that is, he would be charged with interest on principal sums already repaid. His contention accordingly was that, upon the construction of the mortgage and upon the equitable principles applicable to mortgages, particularly the rule against "clogging the equity of redemption," he could not be prevented from redeeming, or be called upon to pay interest on principal that had in fact been paid. The result was that the sum claimed to be due by the association was £1,319 17s. 9d.; whereas the amount asserted by the "General" to be due from him was only £1,074 12s. 6d., or £245 5s. 3d. less than that demanded by the association. To have this question decided the "General" took out this summons, claiming a declaration that in redeeming the property comprised in the mortgage he was not chargeable with interest on any principal moneys already repaid, and an account.

Mr. RENSHEAW, Q.C., and Mr. SARGANT, for the plaintiff, contended that the claim of the defendants was in reality for a "bonus" in excess of the mortgagor's liability for principal, interest, and costs, and, therefore, within the rule laid down by "Marquis of Northampton v. Salt" (45 Ch.D., 190; [1892] A.C., 1) and other cases against "clogging the equity of redemption."

Mr. WARRINGTON, Q.C., and Mr. C. T. MITCHELL for the defendants, contended that the mortgage did not contain any covenant for payment of a bonus, but that it was simply a mortgage containing a covenant by the mortgagor to pay, on demand, the principal with interest from the date on which the advance was made, with the addition of a covenant by the mortgagor for payment by monthly payments, and a provision that on the discharge of the mortgage debt the monthly payments would be taken into account. The only right of redemption the mortgagor had was on satisfaction of his primary liability to pay the two sums of £1,500 and interest. This was a bargain between the parties; there was nothing oppressive in it, because they deliberately contracted that redemption should be on those terms, and those terms only.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said there was express authority for holding that such a proviso as was contained in this mortgage deed was bad as clogging the equity of redemption, but, notwithstanding that was the principle of law, it behoved a Judge to be extremely careful how he interfered with freedom of contract; therefore it must not be concluded that such a proviso had no effect without careful consideration. Now, what was the true construction of this deed? Mr. Booth desired an advance of £3,000. He was willing to give as security for that advance and interest the copyright in this weekly journal, the War Cry. What was the mortgage? There was no covenant to pay £3,000 with interest at a certain date. There was, first of all, an assignment of the copyright of the War Cry upon certain terms as to holding, selling, and so forth. Then there was a covenant for payment of £3,570 by, his Lordship ventured to say, monthly "instalments," for he did not see any difference between monthly "payments" and monthly "instalments." That sum was, then, to be paid by those instalments. It was quite open to the Court, without any affidavit, to see by calculation that the sum included both principal and interest; and it must of necessity refer to the £3,000 agreed to be advanced, with interest, payment of which was contracted to be secured in that way. Stopping there, one saw a plain transaction, a mortgage of the War Cry to secure £3,000 with interest, which £3,000 and interest was to be paid by certain monthly instalments; and this was the bargain between the parties. The mortgagor was only entitled to redeem on payment of those monthly instalments. Then came the proviso, which it was impossible to read otherwise than as a plain provision not open to any question, that the mortgagees might, by giving 14 days' notice, require payment of the whole £3,000 with interest at 5 per cent., and they were entitled, according to the wording of the proviso, to say, "When you have paid that, then we will repay to you the money you have paid under your covenant." In his Lordship's opinion the clear construction was that the mortgagor was bound to pay £3,000 and interest at 5 per cent. If so—and his Lordship was satisfied this was the proper view, and after argument he could not see this was not the true construction—then the case was one of clogging the equity of redemption. What did that mean? The authorities did not bear directly on the present case, and he took the rule from the statement by Lord Hennen in "Salt v. Marquis of Northampton" ([1892] A. C., at p. 23):—"I accept, as not now open to question, the maxim that what is once a mortgage remains a mortgage, and may be redeemed on payment of the sum for which it was intended merely as a security." What was the sum for which it was intended that this deed should be a security? Upon the construction his Lordship had no doubt that it was for payment of £3,000 with interest, payable by monthly instalments. Anything interfering with that bargain interfered with the equity of redemption, and that settled the question.

Then upon what terms should redemption be permitted? He did not decide that the mortgagor was entitled to redeem; but, assuming that he was now entitled to redeem, his Lordship held that he must pay what was now due from him on the footing of the original loan being £3,000, with interest which must be calculated at the rate of 5 per cent. on the £3,000; and that each monthly payment of £42 10s. must be taken as so much principal and so much interest; that left so much principal due and so much interest due upon that until payment. Of course, the mortgagor must pay all proper mortgagees' costs of redemption.

PHILLIPS V. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—COCKERTON V.
THE SAME.*

Education Acts—School Board—Power to establish superannuation fund—Deductions from teacher's salary—Validity.

These were appeals by the plaintiffs, Miss Phillips and Mrs. R. K. Cockerton, from judgments of his Honour Judge Lumley Smith, sitting at the Westminster County Court. In the first case the facts were as follows:—The plaintiff, who has now married, was from 1888 to 1897 on the permanent staff of the School Board, first as assistant teacher and afterwards as head mistress at a certain salary. When she entered the service no superannuation fund existed, and it was admitted that no express statutory power enabling a School Board to establish such a fund exists or ever existed. In 1888 the School Board decided to establish such a fund and promulgated a scheme for forming it by means of deductions from the salaries of the teachers, the scheme to remain in force for two years, after which, if Parliamentary powers were not obtained, the deductions were to be repaid. The plaintiff agreed in writing to come under the scheme. In 1889 the School Board determined to extend the period of two years to five years, and the plaintiff consented in writing to this extension. On March 24, 1893, the School Board gave the plaintiff the option of having the deductions from her salary with interest returned to her or of joining the superannuation fund. The plaintiff on April 13, 1893, in writing elected to join the superannuation fund. In Cockerton's case the facts were similar, except that when the plaintiff entered the service of the School Board the scheme was in force and she was required to come under it when she entered the service. The actions were brought to recover the amounts of the deductions. The County Court Judge found that the deductions were made with the consent of the plaintiffs, and that they were not in law entitled to recover them, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

MR. JELF, Q.C. (Mr. Organ with him), appeared for the plaintiffs, and submitted that the contracts between the plaintiffs and the School Board for the deduction of the contributions from the salaries were ultra vires, and that therefore the contributions were recoverable. The School Board had no power to constitute itself an insurer.

MR. RAM appeared for the defendants, but was not called upon.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in giving judgment, said that by section 35 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, the School Board for London was empowered to appoint officers and teachers to hold office during the pleasure of the Board, and to assign them such salary as it might think fit. As a matter of fact some expenses of management of the fund had been paid out of the rates. In his opinion the plaintiff in the first case was not entitled to recover the contributions she had made to the fund. They had throughout been placed to a particular fund in pursuance of a contract between the plaintiff and the School Board, and, in order to recover them back, the plaintiff must show that the contract was void or illegal. No ground was suggested for the contract being void or ultra vires. It was said that certain charges for the purpose of managing the fund had been thrown upon the rates. Even if that were so there was no evidence of any contract between the plaintiff and the School Board that the rates should be charged with the expenses. Even if the contract between the plaintiff and the School Board were ultra vires, it would be difficult to see how the plaintiff could recover money that had been paid to a particular fund with her consent. He thought that under section 35 of the Act the School Board was perfectly competent to assign a remuneration partly payable annually and partly cumulative until the expiration of the service or some other period. He was not sure it was wrong for the School Board to charge the rates with the expenses of the management of the fund, but it was not necessary to determine that point. There was no difference in Mrs. Cockerton's case. She agreed to accept her appointment on the terms that the deductions should be made.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal granted in both cases.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1897.
Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Oct. 28.

IN THE MATTER OF AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN RICHARDSONS AND M. SAMUEL AND CO.*

Ship—Charterparty—Demurrage—Exceptions—
Liability of charterers.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Wright) upon a special case stated in an arbitration. The facts as stated in the case were as follows:—By a charterparty dated February 10, 1896, made between Richardsons (hereinafter called the plaintiffs), as owners of the steamship Nanshan, and M. Samuel and Co. (hereinafter called the defendants), as charterers, it was agreed that the ship should proceed to Batum and there load a cargo of petroleum in cases from a factory belonging to a person hereinafter referred to as Bnito, and therewith proceed to Saigon. The defendants had contracted with Bnito for the purchase from him of the cargo to be loaded in the Nanshan. The charterparty contained the following clauses:—"The Act of God, the Queen's enemies, insurrections, war, riots, strikes, lock-outs, accidents to railway, factories, or machinery, loss or damage from fire on board, in hulk or craft, or on shore, arrests and (or) restraint of princes, rulers, and people, or other causes beyond charterers' control"
"The cargo to be loaded as tendered by shippers and as fast as they may deliver, but the average rate to be not less than 10,000 cases per working day, Sundays and holidays excepted. . . . Lay days for loading and discharge to commence 24 hours (Sundays and holidays excepted) after receipt by the charterers' agent of written notice of steamers' readiness in berth to receive and discharge respectively. Charterers to have the right of keeping the steamer ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 6d. per net register ton per day." The Nanshan arrived at Batum on April 2, 1896, and notice of her readiness to receive her cargo was given to Bnito on that day. All oil shipped from Batum came by railway from Baku in tank wagons. The railway was under the control of the Government. The oil was brought in the wagons to factories at Batum and was there discharged into reservoirs belonging to the respective factories. It was then drawn off by the factory workmen into tins which were packed in cases and thus shipped. Owing to floods in the early part of 1896 the railway was partially destroyed, and the supplies of oil were in consequence insufficient to meet the shipping requirements at Batum, and on April 3 there was no substantial quantity of oil at the Bnito factory or anywhere else in Batum, and, owing to like causes, no oil arrived there between April 3 and April 13. Down to April 14 no means existed by which the Bnito factory could have obtained a supply of oil with which to load the Nanshan. At the end of March or beginning of April, as there was no immediate prospect of getting any oil, the workmen employed at the Bnito factory were dismissed. On April 14 the oil began to arrive again at Batum, and by April 16 sufficient oil had arrived at the Bnito factory to enable the work of filling and packing the cases to be resumed there on April 17, and from that time the supplies were sufficient. The work of filling the cases was resumed at the factory on April 20, but as the men had to be collected and got to work again the work proceeded slowly at first. On April 2, when the Nanshan arrived, there were two other steamships waiting at Batum under charter to persons other than the defendants to load oil from the Bnito factory. When the factory resumed work on April 20 these two ships were loaded, in accordance with the practice of shippers at Batum, before the Nanshan, and the loading of the Nanshan was not commenced until May 8, and was not completed until May 14. If the Nanshan had been loaded before the other two ships, and the workmen had not been absent from the factory, her loading could have begun on April 17. The Nanshan's cargo was 75,500 cases, so that under the charterparty the defendants were entitled to eight lay days for loading. The defendants had no control over the actions of Bnito. The question for the Court was what demurrage, if any, was payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs, the defendants contending that, under the exceptions in the charterparty, they were not liable for the delay which arose from the accident to the railway and the absence of the workmen from the factory. The Divisional Court held that the eight lay days ran from April 17 and that the plaintiffs were entitled to £436 16s. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the defendants; Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was what damages for demurrage the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the charterparty. The contract was a contract by which the defendants undertook to load the ship at Batum through their agent at the rate of 10,000 cases per working day, subject to certain exceptions. The accident to the railway prevented any possibility of loading until April 17. The charterers' agent had discharged his workmen on account of the accident to the railway in order to save his own pocket, and so the loading was delayed, and it was contended that that gave the defendants extra days for loading. That point arose upon the exceptions in the charterparty. Under which words in the exceptions did the fact of Bnito not having sufficient workmen for loading come? It was said that it came under the exception of "accidents to railway," because the accident to the railway prevented the oil from coming to Batum, and that in consequence, in order to save his own pocket, Bnito discharged his men. His Lordship did not agree with that contention. Those words meant an accident to the railway which prevented the oil from being sent down to Batum. But the oil was there by April 17, ready to be loaded. Therefore that exception did not apply. The real cause was that the charterers' agent had not enough men to load the oil on to the ship. It was then said that the exception of "other causes beyond charterers' control" applied. Those words could not cover the acts of Bnito which he thought fit to do for his own benefit. The words must be read ejusdem generis with the previous words. It was then said that the defendants were entitled to load the ship in turn, and that Bnito was entitled to load the other two ships first. The answer was that the contract was not a contract to load in turn, but a contract to load from a certain date. Nor, in his opinion, did the exception of strikes or lock-outs apply. The words strike or lock-out in this charterparty had their well-known meaning of a strike or a lock-out in connexion with a trade dispute. Bnito dismissed his workmen because he had no work for them to do. That was not a strike or a lock-out. The conclusion he had come to was that the defendants were entitled to keep the ship unloaded until April 17, but that they should then have commenced the loading.

Mine—Fencing entrance—Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, sec. 13—Liability of "person interested."

This was an information of H. A. Stokes, Inspector of Mines for the Midland District. It stated that F. C. Arkwright, of Willersley Castle, Cromford, in the county of Derby, on October 21, 1896, in the parish of Matlock, being the owner of or a person interested in the minerals of an abandoned mine, failed to fence it, the shafts and entrance being situate within 50 yards of a public highway, contrary to section 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict., c. 77). At the hearing the respondent was proceeded against as being a "person interested." The justices dismissed the information subject to a case setting out these facts. The mine is a mine from which lead and other minerals were obtained. Lead-mining there is regulated by the Derbyshire Mining Customs and Mineral Courts Act, 1852, and by the articles and customs established by that Act. This became a public Act under the interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 63, s. 9). The respondent is owner in fee simple of the soil in which the mine is situated. The Crown, as the owner of the Duchy of Lancaster, has the sole right to mining dues or royalties in respect of all lead ore gotten from the mines. Prior to 1857 the mine had been worked by the Ball Eye Company, since when the working of the mine as a lead mine has been discontinued. In 1862 the mine was transferred to a man named Burton, who never worked it and died soon after. The justices, therefore, found as a fact that the mine was abandoned before the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872. Among the minerals contained in the mine other than lead are calc spar and calc (barytes), through which the vein of lead runs. Neither the lead nor the calc spar or calc (barytes) are in fact exhausted in the mine. The respondent becomes entitled to the calc spar and calc (barytes) after, but not until, it has been raised and brought to the surface by persons working for lead ore. The value of calc spar varies from 1s. to £1 per ton, and calc (barytes) is about 13s. a ton. The respondent is entitled to no dues or royalties from lead ore and can grant no mining rights as to lead ore. A public path runs within 50 yards of two shafts and a side entrance, which were wholly unfenced. It was contended for the appellant that as the respondent, as owner of the soil, was entitled at common law to all minerals other than lead, and was entitled under the customs referred to to sell and dispose of all minerals other than lead, he was a person "interested in the minerals of the mine" within section 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and liable as such to a penalty.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Finlay, Q.C.), Mr. H. Sutton, and Mr. E. W. Garrett appeared for the appellant, the inspector; Mr. Dugdale, Q.C., and Mr. Hextall for the respondent.

SIR R. FINLAY contended that calc spar and calc (barytes) were minerals in which the respondent had an interest. He was the only person interested and was therefore liable. If he was not liable to fence there was no one who was. He referred to the judgments in the case of "Duke of Devonshire v. Stokes" (13 The Times L.R., 376, and in 61 J.P., 406, 76 L.T., 424).

MR. DUGDALE contended that calc spar and calc (barytes) were merely subsidiary minerals, and not minerals within the meaning of the Act. They were not merchantable. "Evens v. Mostyn" (2 C.P.D., 547) showed that the person interested in the dues could be treated as owner. The Duchy of Lancaster was entitled to the dues, and, being therefore owner, was liable to fence. That answered the difficulty raised by the Solicitor-General. The respondent had no real interest in the calc spar or calc (barytes) till it was brought up to the surface. He was not, therefore, a person interested in the minerals of the mine.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the appeal must be allowed. Mr. Arkwright was proprietor of the soil, and no one else was proprietor of anything in the soil. As such proprietor he was interested in the minerals other than lead. This was a lead mine. When, however, other minerals of a marketable value, as here, the calc spar and calc (barytes), were raised with the lead, they were minerals within the meaning of the Act. Mr. Arkwright was interested in them in a double capacity—first, as owner of the soil, and, secondly, when brought up to the surface under the customs and articles. He was therefore liable to fence the mine.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

IN RE CLARK—EX PARTE CLARK.*

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Jurisdiction to make—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 103—Construction.

This was an appeal against a receiving order made by Mr. Justice Day at chambers upon a judgment summons. The debtor was a Chilean subject against whom a creditor named Schulze had recovered judgment in this country on May 11, 1897, on a bill of exchange. In July, 1897, when the judgment debtor was temporarily in this country on business, he was served with a judgment summons in respect of the judgment debt. Upon the hearing of the judgment summons Mr. Justice Day made a receiving order against the debtor under section 103, subsection 5, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That section provides that where under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, application is made by a judgment creditor for the committal of a judgment debtor the Court may, if it thinks fit, decline to commit, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the judgment creditor, make a receiving order against the debtor. The debtor appealed, and contended first that, assuming an order of committal could have been made under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869 (that is, that the debtor either has or has had since the date of the judgment the means to pay and has refused or neglected to pay), there was no jurisdiction to make a receiving order under section 103 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, inasmuch as the requirements of section 6, subsection 1 (d), of that Act had not been complied with. This latter section provides that a bankruptcy petition shall not be presented against a debtor unless he is domiciled in England, or within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition has ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England. He contended that these conditions precedent also applied to the making of a receiving order upon a judgment summons. The debtor further contended that, if the above contention was wrong, he had not since the date of the judgment had the means to pay the debt, and that, therefore, the Court had no jurisdiction to commit him, and consequently no jurisdiction to make a receiving order. There were other points raised which are not material for the purposes of this report.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the debtor; Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Hansell for the judgment creditor were not called upon.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it was contended that there was no jurisdiction to make the receiving order under section 103 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon the ground that the debtor was not a person against whom a bankruptcy petition could be presented, inasmuch as a petition could only be presented against a debtor who was domiciled in England, or who within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition had ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England. He did not stop to inquire whether or not the evidence showed that the debtor came within that category, because in his opinion that question became immaterial. The Court had to decide what was the true construction of section 103. In his opinion the construction of that section was that when the Judge had jurisdiction to commit the debtor under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, he might, in lieu of making the committal order, and in mercy to the debtor, make a receiving order against him. The Judge would have jurisdiction to commit if the debtor had since the date of the judgment the means to pay and had refused to pay the judgment debt either wholly or in part. The Judge therefore had jurisdiction to make a receiving order if there was evidence before him of the possession of means to pay as above stated. His Lordship then went into the evidence, and said that the evidence satisfied him that the debtor had since the date of the judgment the means to pay the judgment debt either wholly or in part. The receiving order was therefore rightly made.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

MORLEY V. CARTER.*

Landlord and Tenant—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883—Compensation for improvements—Time for giving notice of claim—Validity of notice.

This motion raised a question whether the Registrar of the Halifax County Court was right in refusing to appoint an arbitrator under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, when applied to by a tenant. The facts were these. The landlord, James Carter, let a certain farm and buildings at Ovenden, near Halifax, on a yearly tenancy. It was provided in the agreement that there should be a six months' notice to terminate the tenancy, the land to be given up on February 2, and the buildings on May 1, of any year. On June 18, 1896, the tenant gave notice of his intention to quit on February 2, and on February 2 he gave up the agricultural land. On February 26 he gave notice, intended to be a notice under section 7 of the Act, of his intention to claim for compensation under the Act. On May 1 he went out of possession of the buildings. He then appointed his arbitrator to assess the compensation and called on the landlord to appoint a second arbitrator. This the landlord neglected or refused to do, and the tenant applied under section 9 (6) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vic., c. 61), to the County Court of the district for the appointment of an arbitrator. The Registrar, however, refused on the ground that the notice of claim was not given by the tenant two months before the termination of the tenancy, as required by the 7th section of the statute. The contention of the landlord was that, for the purposes of the Agricultural Holdings Act, the tenancy terminated when the tenant gave up the agricultural land in accordance with the terms of the notice to quit given by the tenant. The case came up on appeal from the refusal of the Registrar. A query was raised whether it was a proper question for appeal, and whether the more appropriate remedy was not a rule for a mandamus. Both parties, however, concurred in asking the Court to decide the main question without regard to the form of the proceedings.

Mr. W. Beverley appeared for the tenant; Mr. Clavell Salter for the landlord.

Mr. BEVERLEY contended, on the authority of the case "In re Paul—ex parte the Earl of Portarlington" (24 Q.B.D., 247), that the end of the holding meant the end of entire holding. It followed that the tenancy here was not terminated till May 1, when possession had been given up of both buildings and land. If that was so, the notice of intention to claim compensation was given more than two months before the determination of the tenancy. The Registrar ought, therefore, to have appointed an arbitrator.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. SALTER contended that no portion of the holding was agricultural at the time when the notice was given. He cited "Black v. Clay" (1894, A.C. 368).

THE COURT upheld the decision of the Registrar in refusing to appoint an arbitrator.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said there was no real doubt in the case. By section 1 of the Act, where a tenant had made an improvement comprised in the first schedule on his "holding," he was to get compensation. By section 54 nothing in the Act was to apply to a "holding" that was not at any rate partly agricultural or partly pastoral. Subject to that reservation "holding" was defined by section 61 as being "any parcel of land held by a tenant." The Act contemplated that compensation should be given on the determination of an agricultural tenancy. By section 7 two months' notice was required before the determination of the tenancy, otherwise the tenant could not proceed. Here, after the land had been given up in accordance with the notice, there was no "holding" left on the tenant for which compensation could be required. The notice of claim was, therefore, bad. As to the case of "Re Paul—ex parte Earl of Portarlington," which had been cited for the tenant, the judgment there was based on the fact that the tenant kept on 200 acres of land.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

THE LONDON FREEHOLD AND LEASEHOLD PROPERTY COMPANY (LIMITED) v. BARON SUFFIELD.*

Deed—Escrow, what is—Mortgage—Solicitor to mortgagor one of the mortgagees.

A deed may be an escrow though delivered to some person who is a party taking under it.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich (reported in The Times of May 22). The action arose out of the frauds of the notorious Llewellyn Malcolm Wynne. The object of the action was to set aside a mortgage deed for £9,000 (which was never, in fact, paid to the plaintiffs the mortgagors), on the ground that the deed was, immediately after its execution by the plaintiffs, handed to Wynne, as their solicitor, to be held by him on their behalf until the loan was advanced, and that, as the loan never had been advanced, the deed had since remained with Wynne simply as an escrow. Mr. Justice Kekewich refused to order the deed to be set aside. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeal was heard in August last.

Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. R. C. Hawkins appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., Mr. P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Daniel Jones for the defendants the Arthur trustees; and Mr. Whinney for the defendant the trustee in bankruptcy.

This morning the MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the judgment of the Court dismissing the appeal. He said:—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of

Mr. Justice Kekewich refusing to set aside a mortgage executed by them for securing £9,000 to Lord Suffield and others, who were the trustees of a settlement called Arthur's settlement. In order to understand the facts it is necessary to refer to the many characters filled by Mr. Wynne. He was one of the trustees of Arthur's settlement, and in that character he was one of the mortgagees. He was also a solicitor carrying on business in partnership with his brother Campbell Wynne under the name of Wynne and Son, and Wynne and Son were the solicitors of the trustees. He was also carrying on the business of a banker in partnership with his brother. He was also the managing director of the plaintiff company, and in May, 1886, Wynne and Son were appointed managers and bankers of the company at a commission. Wynne and Son were also solicitors to the company and Wynne and Son's office was the office of the company, and Wynne and Son's conveyancing clerk Tyler was the secretary of the company. This relation of Wynne and Son to the plaintiff company is all-important in this case. As bankers and managers, Wynne and Son kept the company's accounts, and it was their duty as managers to pay the company's money received by them as managers into their bank. Payment to Wynne and Son for the plaintiff company was in point of law payment to the plaintiff company. Moreover, it would be in accordance with the ordinary course of business for a banker who had to pay money for one customer to another to effect such payment by book entries—i.e., by debiting one customer and crediting another in their respective accounts; and it would not be necessary that any cash should actually pass from the one customer to the other. Child and Co. were Wynne and Son's bankers. In May, 1892, Wynne and Son, as the solicitors of Arthur's trustees, received a sum of £9,500 and paid it into Child's Bank to the credit of their own account. This sum had to be re-invested in the names of the trustees and it appears from the correspondence that one of the trustees, Mr. Somerset, knew that Wynne and Son had the money in their hands for reinvestment. The plaintiff company had some mortgages created by them amounting to £9,183 or thereabouts, and bearing interest at 5 per cent., and one of these mortgages, for £1,600, had been called in. As early as February, 1893, Wynne had suggested to the directors of the plaintiff company the expediency of raising money at 4½ per cent. in order to pay off these mortgages, and the directors agreed to the suggestion. With a view to raising the money necessary for carrying out this scheme, a valuation of the properties mortgaged was made in February, 1893, by Lang and Co. Wynne appears to have ordered this, but the directors knew about it and authorized it, and the company ultimately paid for it. Between February and June, 1893, a sum of £9,000 was mentioned as the sum to be raised. The mode of raising it and all the details of the arrangement were left to Wynne. He told the board he had clients who would lend it, and when the deed was executed, if not before, he referred to the lenders as the Arthur trustees. In the accounts kept by Wynne and Son there are entries which, if reliable, show that on June 1, 1893, Wynne and Son transferred £9,000 from their account with the trustees to the credit of the plaintiff company. The account to which the £9,000 was carried was headed "The London Freehold and Leasehold Property Company Mortgage Account." This ledger credit of June 1, 1893, is impugned by the plaintiff company as a fictitious entry not made at the time but at some later date in order to give some colour to the mortgage deed afterwards executed. Worley and Ryder, two of the directors, say they never knew anything of this entry, but this is not surprising as they left all the accounts to Wynne and Son, and never troubled themselves about any books except the minute-books and the company's pass-book with Wynne and Son. The £9,000 does not appear in the pass-book; but this is accounted for because the £9,000 was not to be drawn upon or used for the general purposes of the company, but was to be appropriated and applied by Wynne and Son for the special purpose of paying off the existing mortgages on the property comprised in the mortgage to the Arthur trustees. His Lordship then discussed the evidence upon this point, and came to the conclusion that the plaintiff company had failed to prove that the entry in question was fictitious or fraudulent. The effect of it will be considered presently. He then continued as follows:—In addition to the mortgage for £9,000, with which we are alone concerned in the present case, another mortgage by the company to other persons for £5,500 was contemplated, and on June 12, 1893, Wynne and Son, by letter, informed Worley and Ryder that they (Wynne and Son) had arranged for the transfer of mortgages for £14,500. It is clear that this referred to the arrangements made for the above-mentioned mortgages for £9,000 and £5,500. At about this time, instructions were given by Wynne and Son to counsel to prepare the £9,000 mortgage. Wynne and Tyler attended to this. The draft was settled by counsel on June 15, and Tyler had it back before June 22. On June 19 Worley and Ryder were informed by Wynne and Son that a meeting of the board would be held on the 22nd. A meeting of the directors of the plaintiff company was accordingly held on June 22, 1893. An agenda paper for the meeting was prepared by Tyler, and this paper stated that part of the business would be to seal the £9,000 and £5,500 mortgages. The directors present on the 22nd were Wynne, Worley, and Ryder. Tyler, the secretary, was also present. The mortgage for £9,000, engrossed for execution but with date and days for payment left in blank, was produced and discussed, and a statement of the properties the mortgages on which were to be paid off was also produced. After explanations by Wynne, it was "resolved that the seal be affixed to the mortgage for £9,000 on Victoria Warehouses and Bury-street, and that for £5,500 on all the properties subject to prior mortgages." Both these mortgages were accordingly sealed with the company's seal. Both Worley and Ryder signed the £9,000 mortgage as directors. Tyler also signed it as secretary. The blanks were not filled up. The document thus sealed was given to or left with Wynne; but in what capacity is by no means clear. Worley, Ryder, and Tyler have all given evidence as to what took place when the £9,000 mortgage was sealed, and it is contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that the mortgage was merely an escrow, and never became a perfected deed. We are unable to come to this conclusion. It is in our opinion clear that the deed was sealed and delivered by the company, acting through its directors and secretary, as a deed—i.e., as a perfect instrument—and that it was so executed in order that it might be used as an operative deed for the purpose of carrying out the contemplated arrangement by which several mortgages bearing interest at $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. might be replaced by one mortgage bearing interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. After discussing the evidence on this point, his Lordship continued as follows:—On June 28, 1893, Wynne and Son wrote to Colonel Lloyd, one of the Arthur trustees, and told him that the money received by the Arthur trustees had been invested on this mortgage. This letter was written in answer to some inquiry made by him. The date of the mortgage, December 20, 1893, was, we were told, filled in by the law stationer when it was sent to be stamped. The blanks left for the days of payment have never been filled in. The mortgage deed appears to have been kept by Wynne and Son in a box in which they kept miscellaneous deeds likely to be wanted for temporary purposes or to be stamped. This box was known as the temporary box. It was distinct from the Arthur trustees' box and also from the plaintiff company's box. The mortgage deed was found there after Wynne's bankruptcy, which occurred in March, 1895. The mortgage was not entered in the company's register of mortgages, nor was it registered in the Middlesex Registry until May 22, 1897, the day after Mr. Justice Kekewich gave judgment in the present action. It seems that at about the same time, and with a view to such registration, one of the Arthur trustees executed the mortgage. But this, of course, cannot affect the rights of the parties. Such is the history of the impeached deed. After further discussing the evidence, his Lordship continued:—The plaintiffs seek to set aside this £9,000 mortgage on the following grounds, viz.—first, on the legal ground that the mortgage never was executed as a deed, but was only an escrow; secondly, on the equitable ground that the mortgagees never gave and that the company never got the consideration for which the mortgage was given. As regards the invalidity of the mortgage as a deed, it is urged that, although sealed, the mortgage was handed to Wynne, not as one of the mortgagees nor as solicitor to the mortgagees, but as solicitor to the plaintiff company, to be delivered to the mortgagees or to be kept by him as their solicitor only when the £9,000, or at least some of it, reached the plaintiff company or was applied in paying off the other mortgages which the company had arranged to pay off. Mr. Justice Kekewich decided this point against the plaintiff company. We take the same view. We are not prepared to go so far as to say that, as Wynne was himself one of the mortgagees and a party to the deed, it could not in point of law be an escrow in his hands. Counsel for the defendants contended that the mere fact that Wynne was himself one of the mortgagees was fatal to the deed being an escrow. They contended that to be an escrow the deed must be delivered to some person not a party taking under it; in short, to a stranger. In support of this contention reliance was placed on Co. Lit., 31, 36; Shep. Touchstone, 65; and "Whitton's Case" (Cro. Eliz., 520). No doubt the language used in the authorities referred to and reproduced in other works on real property and conveyancing is in favour of this contention. But the language is very general, and we are not at all satisfied that the law is so rigid as to compel the Court to decide that where there are several grantees and one of them is also solicitor of the grantor and of the other grantees, and the deed is delivered to him, evidence is not admissible to show the character in which and the terms upon which the deed was so delivered. To exclude such evidence appears to us unreasonable; and we do not think we are compelled by authority to exclude it. We hold such evidence to be admissible, and in so doing we believe we are acting in accordance with modern authorities, beginning with "Murray v. Lord Stair" (2 B. and C. 82), and ending with "Watkins v. Nash" (20 Eq. 202). Upon the evidence, however, we come to the conclusion that the mortgage was a complete deed and that it was given as such to Wynne in order to enable him to carry out the arrangements to which we have before alluded; and to carry them out as he thought proper. There remains the more difficult question whether the deed being good at law can be impeached in equity. The mere fact that no cash passed when the deed was executed is not enough to invalidate it. The directors knew perfectly well that no cash passed. They were not informed how Wynne intended to carry out the arrangement, but they left him to carry it out as he thought best. It is contended that he had no authority to receive the £9,000 except in cash, but he had the cash from the trustees for investment. Whether the plaintiff company got it from him is another matter. If the credit entry of June 1, 1893, is a trustworthy entry made by Wynne and Son, who had the trustees' money to invest and who were the plaintiff company's managers and bankers, the entry will represent a real transaction between the plaintiff company on the one side and the Arthur trustees on the other. For Wynne and Son, as the managers and bankers of the company, had implied authority from the company to place to their credit any money placed in Wynne and Son's hands for the company or directed to be paid to the company; and Wynne and Son had ample authority from the Arthur trustees to deal with their money in Wynne and Son's hands by debiting them with it and carrying the amount to the credit of any one who banked with Wynne and Son and who gave a proper mortgage for it. We have come to the conclusion that the credit entry was made to represent a real transaction and that if it had been known and questioned at the time no one would ever have complained of it as in any way irregular or improper. But when Wynne and Son became bankrupt and it was then discovered that they had not carried out the arrangements which were contemplated, the plaintiff company very naturally quarrelled with every step in the transaction. But the case does not by any means depend solely on the foregoing considerations. As between the plaintiff company on the one side and the Arthur trustees on the other the plaintiff company have, in our opinion, no equitable right to set aside the mortgage. After again referring to the evidence, his Lordship continued:—The plaintiff company have, in our opinion, enabled their managers and bankers to make representations to the mortgagees that their money was invested on the security of property belonging to the plaintiff company. Such representation has been made; the mortgagees had every reason for believing it to be true, they did believe it to be true, and they acted on that belief by ceasing to inquire after their money. They were not bound to make any further inquiry. Had they done so it is obvious that the deed would have been produced to them. These circumstances turn the scale against the plaintiff company and distinguish this case from "Wall v. Cockerell" (9 Jur., N.S., 447), which was so much relied upon by the counsel for the appellants. In "Wall v. Cockerell" there was no authority to borrow on the security of the impeached deed; there was no relation of banker and manager on the one side and customer on the other; there was no money of the mortgagees in the hands of the agent of the mortgagor; there was no credit in account. Moreover, the mortgagor was induced to execute the mortgage by misrepresentation. Lord Chelmsford distinctly said so, and Lord Westbury merely said it was not necessary to put the case so high. In "Coupe v. Collyer" (62 L.T., N.S., 928) the impeached deed was held to be only an escrow; there was there no relation of banker and customer; and the mortgagees never placed money in the hands of the mortgagor's solicitor for investment. On these grounds we are of opinion that the decision appealed from was correct. We have purposely abstained from saying anything about notice to either party through Wynne of what he did or knew. The case turns on the facts and not on any doctrine of notice. The appeal must be dismissed with costs. Lord Ludlow having agreed to this judgment before his retirement, it can be passed and entered as the judgment of the Court which heard the case and be dated August 10.

GRAY V. SYLVESTER.*

Local Government—Bye-law—Validity—Selling Newspapers.

This was a special case stated by justices for the county of Southampton. An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent at Ryde Petty Sessions charging him with unlawfully selling a weekly newspaper on the Sandown esplanade contrary to the bye-laws of the sanitary authority, the Sandown Urban District Council. It was proved or admitted that the sea beach and foreshore at Sandown were vested in the Sandown Urban District Council for the purposes of public walks or pleasure grounds by virtue of the provisional order of the Local Government Board, duly confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (Caistor Union, &c.) Act, 1877. By section 7 of the same Act the Sandown Local Board were authorized (subject to the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875) to make bye-laws and regulations with reference to the sea beach and foreshore along the whole frontage of their district (no reference being made to the esplanade, which was constructed on part of the sea beach or foreshore subsequently to the passing of the Act). In pursuance of that section and of section 164 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the Sandown Local Board, then being the sanitary authority for the urban sanitary district of Sandown, in 1892 duly made certain bye-laws, of which the one in question was as follows:—

"A person shall not on any part of the sea beach, foreshore, or esplanades sell or offer or expose for sale any commodity or article, or let to hire or offer or expose for hire any chair, seat, or other thing except by direction of the sanitary authority or in such part or parts of sea beach, foreshore, or esplanades (if any) as the sanitary authority may by notice affixed or set up thereon from time to time appoint for the purpose, and every person who shall offend against such bye-law shall be liable to a penalty of 40s."

The justices were of opinion, on the authority of "Munro v. Watson" (51 J.P., 660) and "Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon" (16 Q.B.D., 708), that the bye-law was illegal, inconsistent, unreasonable, and repugnant to the law of England, in that it enabled the sanitary authority of Sandown to legalize a nuisance or prohibit a lawful act which was not a nuisance. The justices, therefore, dismissed the information.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., appeared for the appellant; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Dunlop Hill for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that in coming to a decision on this case it was necessary to look at the statutory authority under which the bye-law was made and at the language of the bye-law. Under the local Act in question the local authority had power to acquire the foreshore and lay out thereon an esplanade, and to make bye-laws and regulations with reference to the sea beach and foreshore along the whole frontage of the district. Under that section the local authority had made the bye-law in question. The justices had come to the conclusion that the bye-law was invalid as being more extensive than the circumstances of the case required. His Lordship was not prepared to go that length. In his opinion the bye-law was not unreasonable or ultra vires. The cases relied on by the justices were decided under the Municipal Corporation Act, 1882, the language of which was very different, and the bye-laws made under that Act were addressed to a different subject-matter from the present. It was one thing to make a bye-law for the good government of a town and another for the regulation of an esplanade on the sea shore. For the latter purpose it was not unreasonable for the local authority to say that nothing should be sold on the esplanade without their direction. The appeal would, therefore, be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment to the same effect.

PENTON V. BARNETT.*

Landlord and tenant—Ejectment—Forfeiture for breach of covenant—Claim for rent—Conveyancing Act, 1881, sec. 14.

By claiming rent accrued due after alleged causes of forfeiture a plaintiff does not waive the forfeiture so as to be disentitled to recover possession in the action.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Ridley at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was brought by a landlord against a tenant to recover possession of the demised premises, and for rent and mesne profits. The lease under which the defendant held the premises contained a general covenant to repair and also a covenant to repair on notice, and there was power for the landlord to re-enter on breach of either. In 1896 the premises were out of repair, and on September 22 the landlord gave the tenant notice under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, specifying the particular breaches of covenant complained of, and requiring the tenant to remedy them or make compensation in money for them. The tenant failed to comply with this notice, and the premises, in fact, continued out of repair till the trial. The plaintiff commenced the action by issuing his writ on January 14, 1897. By his statement of claim he claimed possession of the premises for breach of covenant, a quarter's rent due on December 25, 1896, and mesne profits from December 25 till judgment. The defence was that the plaintiff, by bringing this action to recover rent which accrued due after the alleged causes of forfeiture, had waived the alleged forfeiture, and was not entitled to recover possession of the premises. The learned Judge at the trial gave judgment for the defendant on the claim for possession. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. R. WALLACE, Q.C., and Mr. J. D. CRAWFORD, for the plaintiff, argued that this was a case of a continuing breach, and there had been no waiver. On a breach of covenant the landlord had an option whether he should exercise his power of re-entry, and that option remained until he did re-enter. On January 14, when he commenced his action, the plaintiff was entitled to possession, and to rent for the completed quarter up to December 25, and to mesne profits from December 25 to January 14. The facts in the case of "Dendy v. Nicholl" (4 C.B., N.S., 376) were different from the facts in this case, but the principle of that case was in the plaintiff's favour.

Mr. H. D. GREENE, Q.C., and Mr. POULTER, for the defendant, contended that the exact point in question had been decided by Mr. Justice Wright in the defendant's favour in the case of "Bevan v. Barnett" (13 The Times Law Reports, 310). The notice which was given on September 22 was a three months' notice, and expired on December 22. On the latter date the plaintiff had an option whether he should treat the defendant as a trespasser. By claiming rent from him up to December 25 he elected to treat him as a tenant, and could not after that maintain an action of ejectment.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the contention was that the landlord could not maintain an action of ejectment, because by claiming rent he had affirmed the tenancy. It was clear that if a landlord demanded rent he thereby treated his tenant as a tenant, and that if he brought an action of ejectment against him he treated him as a trespasser. Here the plaintiff showed an intention to treat the defendant as his tenant up to December 25, but the breach of covenant continued, and there was nothing inconsistent in the plaintiff treating the defendant as a trespasser from December 25 to January 14. If it were not for the Conveyancing Act he thought the case would be perfectly clear against the defendant. Section 14 of that Act provided that, before an action could be brought to enforce a forfeiture for breach of covenant, the lessor must give the lessee notice of particulars of the breaches complained of, so that the lessee might have an opportunity of remedying them or making compensation in money for them. The defendant contended that he had not received any notice with regard to the breaches between December 25 and January 14. But the premises were in the same state of disrepair at the date of the writ as at the time when the notice was given, and in his opinion the requirements of the section had been satisfied. He did not understand the case of "Bevan v. Barnett." He thought the learned Judge in this case had been wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS delivered judgments to the same effect.

THE MAYOR, &C., OF LIVERPOOL V. BRADY.*

Waterworks—Liverpool—Constant supply—Liverpool Waterworks Acts, 1862 and 1866—Construction.

In this case the Liverpool Corporation appealed by case stated against a conviction by justices for neglecting on March 29, 1897, to supply water to the respondent, the occupier of No. 6, Hill-street, Prescott.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., Mr. Swift, and Mr. White appeared for the Liverpool Corporation; and Mr. Channell, Q.C., and Mr. Hope for the respondent.

The Liverpool Corporation were empowered by Acts of Parliament to supply water, among other districts, to the district of Prescott. Those Acts, subject to the provisions contained in them, incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, section 35 of which lays the undertaking under the obligation of laying on a constant supply of water at such a pressure as would make it reach the highest storey of the highest house within their district, if so required to do by as many owners or occupiers as that the aggregate amount of water rate should be one-tenth of the expense of laying down the requisite pipes. The Liverpool Waterworks Act of 1862, section 25, provides as follows:—"The water to be supplied by the corporation under the Waterworks Acts and this Act respectively need not be laid on under a pressure or supplied to an elevation greater than can be afforded by gravitation from their works." The Liverpool Waterworks Act of 1866, section 32, provides as follows:—"The corporation shall, at the request of the owner or occupier of any house or part of a house in any street in which any water pipe belonging to the corporation shall be laid, or of any person who under the provisions of this Act or of any of the recited Acts, or any Act incorporated therewith, shall be entitled to demand a supply of water for domestic purposes, furnish to such owner or occupier a sufficient supply of water for their domestic uses at the rents in the Liverpool Waterworks Act, 1862, prescribed, unless prevented by unusual drought, frost, or other unavoidable cause or accident, or during necessary repairs, or during any year in any part of the first six months whereof the storage reservoirs of the works of the corporation at Rivington shall be reduced to one-half the quantity they are capable of containing, and the corporation shall not be obliged in any of the above events to have the water constantly laid on or at such pressure as will make the water reach the top storey of the highest houses within the limits of supply, but the corporation shall afford the best supply in their power, regard being had to the probable requirements of the persons within the district of supply and the probable quantity of water the corporation may have undisposed of." The waterworks comprised in the undertaking of the corporation included the Rivington, Montrey, and Vyrnwy reservoirs and the Norton Tower. From neither of these could water be supplied to the houses in Hill-street by gravitation. Between the years 1869 and 1871 the corporation constructed an elevated tank at Prescott, the bottom of which was 307' 14ft. above the ordnance level. The houses in Hill-street, including the respondent's house, stood, as to their top storeys, at about 300ft. above the ordnance level. The practice of the corporation was to pump water into the tank between the hours of 6 a.m. and 6 p.m., except on Saturday and Sunday, when pumping ceased at 3 p.m. and at 12 noon respectively. Between those hours all the premises in Prescott had a constant supply, but after pumping had ceased the supply was discontinued. On behalf of the corporation it was contended that section 25 of the Act of 1862 relieved them of the obligation to give a constant supply of water to the respondent's house. The point raised by the respondent was that section 25 was repealed by implication by section 32 of the Act of 1866. It was further contended that the tank at Prescott formed part of the works of the corporation, and that, inasmuch as by an alteration of the present system of pipes a constant supply could be afforded from that tank by gravitation, the corporation were not relieved from their liability under section 25. The reply to this on behalf of the corporation was that the tank was constructed voluntarily and did not form part of the "works" of the corporation within the meaning of section 25 of the Act of 1862, and that, inasmuch as the tank itself could not be supplied without the aid of pumping, the houses supplied from the tank, though by gravitation, could not be said to be supplied by gravitation within the meaning of section 25.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in delivering judgment, said that the respondent's house was in a street which, so far as the supply of water was concerned, had been appropriated by the Liverpool Corporation; the corporation had erected a tank and had laid down mains and pipes to supply it. Those were the facts with which the Court had to deal. Upon the question, therefore, what would have been the position of the corporation had they not taken steps to supply the respondent's house, he would express no opinion. Section 25 of the Act of 1862 contained an important provision exempting the corporation from laying on water under a pressure greater than could be afforded by gravitation. But then came section 32 of the Act of 1866. He would not say that section 25 of the Act of 1862 was repealed by section 32 of the later Act. But it was clear that the respondent was an occupier of a house in a street in which a water pipe belonging to the corporation was laid; such a person was entitled under that section to demand a constant supply of water, subject to certain qualifications. If the corporation had not thought it worth while to lay on water in the respondent's street that would have been a different question. But where, as in the present case, the corporation had chosen to lay down pipes, section 32 of the Act of 1866 became the operative section, to the exclusion of section 25 of the Act of 1862.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY, in the course of his judgment, said that section 32 of the Act of 1866 rendered section 25 of the Act of 1862 inapplicable in the present case. It partially repealed the section in the earlier Act, so that the latter section did not relieve the corporation from the obligation expressed in the former.

BAKER V. WILLIAMS.*

Local Government—Bye-law—Validity—Regulation made by local authority under Act of Parliament—Ventilation of cowsheds.

This was a special case stated by magistrates for the borough of Southport raising the question as to the validity of a bye-law or regulation made by the mayor and corporation of Southport providing that in cowsheds in the borough there must be 800 cubic feet of free air space for each animal. The appellant, a dairyman and cowkeeper, had been convicted for contravening the regulation, which purported to be made under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milk Shops Order of 1885, and was dated April 8, 1890. It was contended—(1) that the regulation in question was one that could not be made by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses as the local authority under the Order of 1885; (2) that the word "ventilation" in the 13th section of such Order did not authorize any regulation with regard to the quantity of air space; (3) that the provisions of section 34 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, did not, nor did section 9 of the Act of 1886, or any other provision of either Act, authorize the making of any order of the Privy Council regulating air space or free air space; and that, therefore, in so far, if at all, as the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milk Shops Order of 1885 imposed any restrictions as to air space, or purported to authorize the making of any regulations by the local authority as to air space, such order was invalid.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge with him, appeared for the appellant; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. G. H. Pollard for the respondents.

Mr. MOULTON contended that the power given to make regulations with regard to ventilation of cow-sheds did not include that of making regulations as to the amount of air space. Ventilation and air space were entirely distinct things. Cattle in a cattle truck on a railway had plenty of ventilation, though they were packed as tight as they could stand. The Order in Council was ultra vires and the rules were nullities. He cited the "Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood" (1894] A.C., 347).

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., contended that the Order in Council included, and rightly included, provisions for air space as well as ventilation. Therefore the borough authority was entitled to make regulations in respect thereof. He cited "Ex parte Kingstown" L.R., Ir., 18 C.L., 509; "Ex parte Foreman" (18 Q.B.D., 393); "Reed v. Harvey" (5 Q.B.D., 186).

The Court upheld the validity of the bye-law.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that by section 34 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, the Privy Council were empowered to make orders subject to the provisions of the Act for the lighting, ventilation, cleansing, and water supply of cowsheds and dairies, and for authorizing a local authority to make regulations for the purposes aforesaid. By section 58 such an order was to have the effect of an Act of Parliament. In 1885 the Privy Council made an Order under the Act. By section 7 of that Order it was provided that it should not be lawful for a cowkeeper to begin to occupy a dairy or cowshed unless he first made provision to the reasonable satisfaction of the local authority "for the lighting and the ventilation, including air space and the cleansing," &c., of the same. By section 8 it was provided that it should not be lawful for a cowkeeper to occupy any cowshed, whether old or new, "as long as the lighting and the ventilation, including air space and the cleansing," &c., were not such as were proper. By section 13 (b) a local authority had power granted to make rules for "regulating the lighting, ventilation, cleansing, drainage, and water supply of dairies and cowsheds." The question was, Did those words give the power to the local authority to make regulations for air space as well as ventilation? It was rather strange that air space should be included in sections 7 and 8 and not in section 13. The Order under the Act was to have the effect of an Act of Parliament. What was the effect of that? The case cited about the Institute of Patent Agents showed that, in such a case, the Order and statute should be read together. Following that principle, there was no inconsistency in interpreting section 13 of the Privy Council Order as giving power to the local authority to make regulations in respect of "ventilation and air space."

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. This was a case of a conviction for breach of the regulations as to cowsheds. The regulation was said to be ultra vires. It seemed to the learned Judge that there was nothing wrong in a Privy Council Order under the Act dealing with air space. In fact, they had provided for air space as well as ventilation for all dairies and cowsheds, both old and new, though it was difficult to see why in sections 7 and 8 ventilation and air space were included and not in section 13. The decision of the magistrates was right.

MURPHY v. ARROW.*

Gaming—Betting Houses Acts, 1853.

Persons arrested at a betting house are liable to be treated as if they had been arrested in a common gaming house, and a magistrate has jurisdiction to order them to enter into recognizances under sec. 14 of 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9, "no more to play, haunt, or exercise . . . in any of the said places."

This was an appeal, by case stated, against an order made by a metropolitan police magistrate ordering the appellant, who was brought before him under a warrant of arrest made in pursuance of 16 and 17 Vict., c. 119, to be bound in his own recognizances in £20, "no more to play, haunt, or exercise from thenceforth" at any gaming house pursuant to section 14 of 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9.

Mr. E. D. Purcell appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Danckwerts for the respondent.

At 3 30 p.m. on May 4, 1897, the appellant, together with 88 other persons, was arrested by the police upon premises known as the Frascati Club, at 32, Gerard-street, Soho, under a warrant issued in pursuance of the Betting Houses Act, 16 and 17 Vict., c. 119, section 11. The premises were kept and used for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and betting was, in fact, going on just prior to the entry of the police. Four of the persons arrested were charged with having kept and used the premises for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, three of whom were convicted of the offence, the remaining person being discharged. With regard to the appellant and 84 of the persons arrested it was ordered that they should be bound over in pursuance of 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9, section 14. That section provided that it should be lawful for justices to enter any houses suspected to be used for unlawful gaming and to arrest the keepers of the same, and the persons "there haunting, resorting, and playing," and to keep them in prison "unto such time as the keepers and maintainers of the said plays and games have found sureties to the King's use, to be bound by recognizance or otherwise no longer to use, keep, or occupy any such house, play, game, alley, or place, and also that the persons there so found be in like case bound by themselves, or else with sureties, by the directions of the justices, &c., no more to play, haunt, or exercise from thenceforth, in, at, or to any of the said places, or at any of the said games." The Gaming Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, section 3), provides that the justices may exercise their power of entry into suspected houses by means of their warrant issued to the police. The form of warrant given in the schedule to the Act directs the police to arrest as well the keepers of the house as also the "persons there haunting, resorting, and playing." The Betting Houses Act, section 1 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 119), provides that "no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof . . . betting with persons resorting thereto," and section 2 enacts that "Every house, office, room, or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid or any of them shall be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house within the meaning of 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109." Section 11 gives the justices power to issue their warrant to the police to enter suspected houses, the warrant to be in the form provided in the schedule to 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he ought to have been discharged and that the magistrate had no power to make the order he had made, because there was no evidence to show that the appellant "haunted, resorted, or played" in the premises, there being no evidence of the time he was there or whether he had been there on former occasions so as to constitute "resorting," and also because betting on horse-races was not a game or an unlawful game so as to make it "playing" within 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9, and because that statute only affected players of unlawful games and not persons betting in a betting house declared to be a gaming house by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 119.

On behalf of the respondent the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins in "Jenks v. Turpin" (13 Q.B.D., 526) was cited.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in dismissing the appeal, said that the question was whether the magistrate had power to do that which he did do—that was to say, to require the appellant to enter into recognizances, or whether he ought simply to have let him go. That depended upon the construction of certain sections of the Acts 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 103, and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 119. The object of the Legislature in enacting section 2 of the last-mentioned Act—that is, in saying that a betting house was to be deemed to be a gaming house—was to put those who went to betting houses in the same position as those who frequented gaming houses. Section 11 gives power to arrest persons found in betting houses. The form of warrant in the schedule to 8 and 9 Vict., c. 103, referred to in that section as the one to be made use of, directs the police to arrest persons "haunting, resorting, and playing" in the premises. Then 33 Hen. VIII., c. 9, section 14, enacted that persons found in a gaming house were to be bound over in the manner provided. From this concatenation of sections it appeared that a betting house was to be treated as a common gaming house, and that when persons were arrested thereon they were to be treated as if they had been arrested in a common gaming house. That being so, the magistrate had power to order the appellant to enter into the recognizances.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY delivered judgment to the same effect.

REG. V. MEAD, METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATE.*

Metropolis—Building—London Building Act, 1894, secs. 107 and 183—Legal proceedings—Service of summons.

A summons under sec. 107 of the London Building Act, 1894, addressed to the owner is not properly served by affixing it to the premises unless reasonable attempts have been made to ascertain who the owner is.

This was the argument of a rule for a mandamus calling on Mr. Mead, the metropolitan magistrate, to show cause why he should not hear and determine a summons under the London Building Act (57 and 58 Vict., cap. cxxiii.) in respect of a dangerous structure. The question raised was whether a summons under section 107 of that Act could be served by being affixed to the premises only.

Mr. H. Sutton appeared to show cause on behalf of the magistrate; Mr. Avory appeared for the London County Council.

The affidavit of the magistrate stated that on September 22 the London County Council applied for a summons under section 107 of the London Building Act, 1894. The summons was returnable before Mr. Mead on October 1. It was addressed "To the Owner" (of the premises) merely. The owner was called upon to appear, but there was no response. The complainant proposed to proceed in his absence on proof that a copy of the summons had been affixed to the premises. It was stated by the complainant that the owner was unknown, but no evidence was given that any steps had been taken to discover him. There was no evidence that the valuation list or rate had been examined, or the rate collector interrogated, or other obvious means taken to discover who the owner was. The complainant contended that the service was sufficient under section 188 (1) of the Act of 1894. The magistrate, however, thought that the service of any summons, even if anonymously addressed—i.e., "To the Owner"—was a "notice" the service of which is provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and must therefore be served, under section 1 of the 11 and 12 Vict., c. 43, personally or at the last known place of abode. He also thought that, even if a summons addressed "To the Owner" in a case where the owner could not be found was not "provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts," there should be evidence before him that reasonable diligence had been exercised by the complainant to discover the owner of the property. He therefore refused to hold that there had been valid service of the summons. Section 188 of the Act is as follows:—"Any notice, order, or other document required or authorized to be served under this Act, the service of which is not provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the Lands Clauses Acts, or the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, may be served by delivering a copy thereof at, or by sending a copy thereof by post to, the usual or last known residence in the United Kingdom of the person to whom it is addressed, or by delivering the same to some person on the premises . . . or if no person be found on the premises, then by fixing a copy thereof on some conspicuous part of the building."

Mr. SUTTON contended that the case of "Reg. v. Mead" (1894, 2 Q.B., 124), which was relied on when the rule was moved for, was an authority on another statute of 1891 relating to public health, and did not affect this case. The London County Council ought to have taken trouble to ascertain the owner before they sought to act under section 188. There was no sufficient proof that they had done so.

Mr. AVORY said the County Council did not pretend that when the owner was known this form of service of summons could be followed. The notice as to the dangerous nature of the structure admittedly could be served in this way. The summons could also be so served.

The COURT held that the application against the magistrate failed.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the first ground was that there was no evidence before the magistrate that the premises were empty at the time the summons was affixed, but that was a small point. The second ground, which was wider, was that in this case there had been no such sufficient inquiry as to who the owner was to entitle the County Council to act under the section. He was of opinion that if after reasonable inquiry the County Council could not ascertain who the owner was, then the procedure under section 188 was applicable, but in this case they had not done enough. They must first prove the inquiry, then the failure to ascertain who was the owner, and, lastly, that the premises were empty.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred.

LEWIS V. POOLE.*

Local Government—Parish documents—Custody of—Tithe map and apportionment—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 17 (8).

This was a case stated by the justices of the Droxford Division of Hampshire raising a question as to the custody of the tithe map in a parish.

Lord Coleridge, Q.C., and Mr. Cancellor appeared for Mr. Lewis, the appellant; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Gollan for the respondent.

An application was made by Hernan Le Roy Lewis under section 28 of 23 and 24 Vic., c. 93, that the justices of the Droxford Petty Sessional Division should make an order to remove the tithe apportionment and map of the parish of West Meon from the custody of the respondent, the Rev. Canon Poole, rector of the parish, and direct that the same be deposited in the custody of the parish council of West Meon. The justices refused to make the order, on the ground that they had no power to make it under the section. The facts were these. The appellant was interested in the lands delineated in the tithe apportionment and map. He was chairman of the parish council, but made the application in order to enforce an order of the county council dated February 22, 1897, and not as chairman of the parish council authorized to appear, nor by reason of being inconvenienced by the present place of the said documents. When the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 and 57 Vic., c. 73), came into operation the documents were in the custody of Mr. Arnold, a farmer in the parish, and were kept by him in his residence. On March 29, 1895, the parish meeting passed a resolution that the documents should remain in the custody of Mr. Arnold. He died on May 21, 1895, and the documents remained in the possession of his family till August 1, when the rector obtained them. On October 15, 1895, the parish council passed a resolution that the documents should be placed in the custody of the parish council. The rector, however, refused to give them up. On April 13, 1896, the parish council applied to the county council under section 17 (8) of the Local Government Act, 1894, to determine the difference. On August 10 the county council ordered that the said documents should be deposited in such custody as the parish council might direct. This order was formally drawn up and sealed in February, 1897. The rector refused to obey the said order, and retained the documents. The parish council have no room of their own in which to keep the said documents. The appellants contended that the parish council was entitled to the custody of the documents, and that the respondent was a "person other than the person legally entitled to the possession" of the said documents within the meaning of 23 and 24 Vic., c. 93, section 28, and that therefore the justices had power and ought to make the order. It was contended for the respondent that he was a person legally entitled to the possession of the documents; also that the documents did not come within section 17 (8) of the Local Government Act, 1894. He further contended that the parish council's resolution and the county council's order could not be enforced under 23 and 24 Vic., c. 93, section 28.

THE COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said there were two questions—one as to the power of the parish council, and the next as to the procedure followed. The Local Government Act, 1894, by section 17, subsec. (8), provided that "documents directed by law to be kept with the public books, writings, and papers of the parish should either remain in their existing custody or be deposited in such custody as the parish council might direct." This tithe map was such a document, and the parish council had directed how it should be dealt with. That disposed of the first question, although Mr. Macmorran had contended, on the construction of the various Tithe Acts, that the section did not apply to these documents. Then as to the procedure followed. The Tithe Act of 1846 (9 and 10 Vic., c. 73), section 17, provided that in certain cases the quarter sessions might appoint a place for the tithe documents to be kept. The quarter sessions, however, had not made any order here. By the 28th section of 23 and 24 Vic., c. 93, the justices had jurisdiction if the tithe documents were in the possession of any person not legally entitled to them to order them to be deposited in such custody as they thought fit. That was a jurisdiction intended to be exercised judicially. This, it was true, raised a difficulty if the justices were to act only ministerially in carrying out the order of the county council, but the objection was not conclusive. In the opinion of the learned Judge, the Local Government Act of 1894 had changed the jurisdiction of the justices, and they ought to hesitate long before overriding the resolution of the parish council, upheld by the order of the county council. The third question, whether the rector was a person not legally entitled to the possession of these documents, was determined by the answer to the former question. If the parish council had power to make directions as to the custody of the tithe map, that changed the right of the incumbent, and it was the person designated by the parish council who became the person legally entitled to the custody thereof.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. The case must go back to the magistrates with an intimation that they had power to make the order sought for.

WILSON V. LONDON AND GLOBE FINANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED).*

Damages—Contract—Measure of damages—
Breach of contract to allot shares.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wills at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a contract dated May 4, 1896. It appeared that the defendants were promoting an English company to take over the property and business of the Lake View and Boulder East Gold Mining Company in Western Australia, and the plaintiff was opposing the sale. The defendants' agent in Western Australia thereupon made an agreement, dated May 4, 1896, with the plaintiff that, in consideration of the withdrawal by the plaintiff of his opposition to the proposed sale to the proposed new company and of his assisting in the promotion and flotation of the new company, the defendants undertook and guaranteed to the plaintiff the allotment to him or his nominees of 7,500 shares at par in the new company, such shares to be issued concurrently with the first issue of shares and to be paid for by the plaintiff. The capital of the new company was to be £250,000 in £1 shares, of which 160,000 shares were to be allotted to the shareholders in the old company, 30,000 shares to be subscribed for in cash (which were allotted to the defendants and paid for by them), and 60,000 fully-paid shares to be allotted to the defendants. The plaintiff thereupon withdrew his opposition, and the new company was duly formed, and on June 2, 1896, the shares in the company were allotted. The 7,500 shares were not allotted to the plaintiff, and he brought this action on November 11, 1896, to recover damages for the breach of the agreement. The defendants admitted the breach, and contended that the damages should be assessed as on June 2, 1896, the date of the breach, when the shares were worth, as they alleged, £4 each, making the damages £22,500. The plaintiff contended that the damages should be assessed as on October 30, 1896, when the shares were worth £7 10s. each, making the damages £48,750. The plaintiff's contention arose upon the correspondence between the parties, the true construction of which was in dispute, but which showed, in effect, that the plaintiff had, at the request of the defendants and upon their writing that they hoped to deliver the shares, abstained from taking proceedings in respect of the breach, the plaintiff's solicitors writing on August 12 that they would hold the defendants responsible for any loss the plaintiff might incur through a fall in the market; but on October 30 the defendants definitely refused to deliver the shares, and "Ogle v. Earl Vane" (L.R., 3 Q.B., 272) was cited in support of this contention. Mr. Justice Wills held that October 30 was the date upon which the damages should be assessed, and assessed the damages accordingly at £48,750. The defendants appealed, and contended that the damages should be assessed at £22,500; and the plaintiff contended, in addition to what he contended in the Court below, that he did not know, as the defendants did not tell him, of the breach of contract until August 11, at which date the shares were higher in the market than on October 30, and that the subsequent delay could not affect the damages as on August 11.

Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Bankes appeared for the defendants; Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. F. W. Hollams, and Mr. Frank Phillips appeared for the plaintiff.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was, What was the amount of damages to which the plaintiff was entitled? That was the sole question, as the contract and the breach were both admitted. The contract was to allot the shares to the plaintiff "concurrently with the first issue of shares." The first issue of shares took place on June 2. What was the plaintiff's position on that day? If he had known of the breach of contract on that day he could have gone into the market and bought the shares at the market price as against the defendants, or brought an action against them, when the damages would have been the market value, less the amount he would have had to pay if the shares had been allotted to him. If nothing else had happened in this case the plaintiff would have been bound to assess his damages in that way. But after that a long correspondence took place. His Lordship had no doubt that the plaintiff wanted the shares, and the defendants through their secretary undoubtedly kept him in the dark as to the issue of the shares, and it was not until August 11 that the plaintiff became aware that the shares had been issued. The correspondence showed that the plaintiff wanted the shares, and the letter of the plaintiff's solicitors of August 12, in his opinion, meant that the plaintiff would hold the defendants liable for any loss arising from the price of the shares falling in value as from that date. That was how he read the correspondence. The correspondence showed that the plaintiff was pressing for the shares, while the defendants were requesting the plaintiff to forbear from pressing for the shares, and this went on until October 30, when the defendants definitely refused to hand over the shares. Any jury would find that the plaintiff was entitled to go into the market upon that day and buy the shares against the defendants, and the measure of damages would be the difference between the price on that day and the £1 which the plaintiff would have had to pay for the shares if they had been allotted to him. That was the ground upon which Mr. Justice Wills gave his judgment, and that was the principle laid down in "Ogle v. Earl Vane" (L.R., 3 Q.B., 272). Upon that ground he agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Wills. There was also another ground upon which the judgment could be supported, but which was not taken in the Court below. It was contended that it was not until August 11 that the plaintiff could have gone into the market and bought the shares against the defendants, because he was until then kept in the dark by the defendants. It was clear to his Lordship that until August 11 the plaintiff did not know of the issue of the shares, and consequently of the breach of contract, at which time the value of the shares was certainly as high as, if not higher than, on October 30. Upon either ground the amount of damages was right.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed in the result, saying that he rested his judgment entirely upon the second ground stated by Lord Justice A. L. Smith. Up to August 11 the plaintiff was led to suppose—his Lordship did not say intentionally—that the issue of shares would take place. Upon that date the plaintiff discovered the breach of contract, at which time the shares stood higher in the market than on October 30. As regards the other ground, in his view the correspondence did not bring the case within the decision in "Ogle v. Earl Vane."

POLLOCK V. GARLE.*

Evidence—Banker's books—Inspection of—Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879.

In an action for damages against a director for misrepresentation as to the financial position of a company, and, in particular, as to its balance at the bank on December 2, 1895, the plaintiff applied for an order giving him leave to inspect the company's balances in the bank's books on that day.

Application refused.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's raised a question of great and general importance under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879. The defendant was formerly a director of a company called The Gresham Gold Exploring Syndicate (Limited). The plaintiff alleges that in December, 1895, he was induced, by means of misrepresentations made to him as to the financial position of the company by the defendant, who was then a director, to purchase from him 150 shares in the company, and by this action he claims rescission of the contract for purchase and repayment of the purchase money. One of the representations alleged was that the company had on December 2, 1895, standing to their credit at their bankers' the sum of £87,000 in cash undivided. The plaintiff alleges that this representation was untrue. The defendant denies that he made any misrepresentation. The pleadings having been closed, but the action not having been set down for trial, Mr. Justice Kekewich on the 9th August last, on the application of the plaintiff, made an order that the plaintiff should be at liberty upon three clear days' notice in writing to Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smith, bankers, to inspect and take copies of or extracts from any accounts in the books of the bankers in the name of the Gresham Company pursuant to the provisions of the Act of 1879, "but such inspection is to be limited to showing the balances of the said company in the books of the said bankers on the 2nd December, 1895." Against this order the defendant appealed, and his appeal was supported by the Gresham Company. The Act of 1879 provides by section 3:—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, a copy of any entry in a banker's book shall in all legal proceedings be received as prima facie evidence of such entry, and of the matters, transactions, and accounts therein recorded." Section 4.—"A copy of an entry in a banker's book shall not be received in evidence under this Act unless it be first proved that the book was at the time of the making of the entry one of the ordinary books of the bank, and that the entry was made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that the book is in the custody or control of the bank. Such proof may be given by a partner or officer of the bank, and may be given orally or by an affidavit sworn before any commissioner or person authorized to take affidavits." Section 5.—"A copy of an entry in a banker's book shall not be received in evidence under this Act unless it be further proved that the copy has been examined with the original entry and is correct. Such proof shall be given by some person who has examined the copy with the original entry, and may be given either orally or by an affidavit sworn before any commissioner or person authorized to take affidavits." Section 6.—"A banker or officer of a bank shall not, in any legal proceedings to which the bank is not a party, be compellable to produce any banker's books the contents of which can be proved under this Act, or to appear as a witness to prove the matters, transactions, and accounts therein recorded, unless by order of a Judge made for special cause." Section 7.—"On the application of any party to a legal proceeding a Court or Judge may order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any entries in a banker's book for any of the purposes of such proceedings. An order under this section may be made either with or without summoning the bank or any other party, and shall be served on the bank three clear days before the same is to be obeyed, unless the Court or Judge otherwise directs."

Mr. Mark Romer was for the defendant; Mr. A. J. Walter was for the Gresham Company; Mr. Ernest Pollock was for the plaintiff.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that a question of enormous importance to the public and to commercial men was raised under this apparently harmless summons. Two persons quarrelled. The plaintiff said to the defendant, "I bought some shares in a company from you, and I was induced to do so by your misrepresentations." One of the representations alleged was that the company had a certain balance to their credit at their bankers' on a specified day. The plaintiff applied for and obtained an order compelling the bankers before the trial of the action to disclose to him the balance standing to the credit of the company in their books on the day specified, the company not being parties to the action and having nothing to do with the quarrel. The order appeared to his Lordship to be absolutely contrary to every principle of law relating to discovery and to the settled practice of the Court. It was said that the Court had power to make the order under section 7 of the Act of 1879. That Act was passed to remove a great hardship upon bankers. Under the old practice before the Act, a subpoena was served on bankers for the production of their books, and then a clerk attended at the trial of the action with the books. This was a great inconvenience to bankers, whose books were required for daily use. Sections 3 to 6 of the Act were for the protection of bankers, and they were fully protected. Section 7 had nothing to do with the protection of bankers; it related to litigants. If the section were read literally it would mean that the Court could, on the application of any party to any action, give him liberty to inspect the banking account of any one else and to take copies of any entries in it for the purposes of the action. Could that be the meaning? Could it be meant that, because two people had quarrelled, they were to be at liberty to inspect the banking account of any other person whatsoever? Such an interpretation of section 7 would be monstrous, and his Lordship would not be a party to giving it. The section must mean entries in the account of a person who was a party to the litigation. There might, of course, be a case in which a litigant was an undisclosed principal, a banker's account which was really his being kept in another name. But when the Court was satisfied that the person whose account it was sought to disclose was not a party to or had no interest in the litigation, the Court ought not in general to make such an order. His Lordship did not say that the Court had not power to make it, but the Court ought to be very careful not to make use of the section oppressively, and should consider the effect of what it was doing. His Lordship did not say that the Court could not make such an order at the trial of the action. But the present case was very different. The plaintiff wanted to see the bankers' books before the trial in order that he might make up his mind whether he would go on to trial. The order as it stood would disclose to the plaintiff not only the balance standing to the credit of the company, but all the particulars of their account. The plaintiff would have a roving inspection of the account, and the Court ought to protect a third party from that. The order must be discharged. It would be far too mischievous and oppressive.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY, in giving judgment to the same effect, said that the account was neither in form nor in substance that of the defendant. It was the account of a third party, who objected to have his account inspected before the trial. The plaintiff was attempting to obtain discovery from a third party before trial by means of section 7. That section did not say that the entries must be in the account of a person who was a party to the action, but if the Court ever did make such an order in relation to the account of a third party it should use the greatest caution. The custom of bankers being to strike a balance of their customers' accounts half-yearly, this order would give the plaintiff a right to see the company's account from June 30 down to December 2; he would be entitled to see, not merely the figures, but the names and all the details—in fact, to ransack the company's account for five months. In his Lordship's opinion section 7 was not intended to be used for such a purpose, and it would be inflicting a great injustice on a third party if section 7 were so applied.

WILLIAMS V. LLANDUDNO DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Waterworks—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, sec. 19—Penalties—Affixing stop-tap without permission.

This was a case stated by justices for the county of Carnarvon upon the hearing of an information against the appellant, Clara Paine Williams, under section 19 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, for that she had affixed a certain stop-tap to a certain water-pipe, being a service pipe belonging to her use, for the conveyance of water to a house in Church Walks, Llandudno, without the consent of the Urban District Council.

The justices convicted the appellant and fined her one shilling.

The appellant, who was in the habit of leaving her house empty and locked up during the winter months, had found on two occasions during her absence that the service pipe had burst in her house, and damaged her carpets and walls. With the object of preventing the recurrence of such bursts, she affixed a stop-tap in a place which enabled her when she thought fit to prevent water from flowing through the said service pipe—thus stopping the water supply to the cottage, but not enabling her to draw water there. On the part of the appellant it was contended that the stop-tap was not an "apparatus" or an "alteration" within section 19 of the Act of 1863; also that that section was intended to apply only to cases of wilful waste of water. The Waterworks Clauses Act, 26 and 27 Vic., c. 93, s. 19, provides—"It shall not be lawful for the owner or occupier of any premises . . . to affix or cause or permit to be affixed any pipe or apparatus to a pipe belonging to the undertakers or to a communication or service pipe . . . or to make any alteration in any such communication or service pipe . . . without the consent in every such case of the undertakers; and if any person acts in any respect in contravention of the provisions of the present section, he shall for every offence be liable to a penalty . . . without prejudice to the right of the undertakers to recover damages from him in respect of any injury done to their property and without prejudice to their right to recover from him the value of any water wasted." The above section is one of a group headed "protection of water" which are introduced in the Act with these words:—"And with respect to the waste and misuse of the water supplied by or belonging to the undertakers, be it enacted."

Mr. ENGLISH HARRISON, who appeared for the appellant, contended that no waste or misuse of water could ensue from a stop-tap, and that the sections were governed by the introductory words and by words of section 57 of the Public Health Act, 1878, under which the council provided the water. A stop-tap was not "an apparatus"; an apparatus was a collection of instruments applied to a common purpose. The pipe was the lady's own property.

The COURT, without calling on Mr. Temple Franks, who appeared for the respondents, dismissed the appeal.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said he was sorry for the lady, but the words of the Act were too clear. She had her remedy, however, under the Act, and it was right that the water authority should have some means of knowing and controlling what was done to the pipes through which their water flowed.

THE MAYOR OF WEST HARTLEPOOL V. ROBINSON.*

Local Government—Paving and sewerage expenses—West Hartlepool Extension Act, 1870—Liability of owner of one side of road to contribute to paving and sewerage of whole—Memorial by aggrieved owner to Secretary of State.

The owner of one side of a road in West Hartlepool, after notice to make up half the road, made up his half of the road.

Held, that he was liable to contribute to the making up of the other half, under the provisions of the West Hartlepool Extension Act, 1870.

Decision of Stirling, J. (13 The Times L.R., p. 182), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling, reported 13 The Times L.R., 182. The case depended on the construction of clauses in a local Act of Parliament (the Hartlepool Improvement Act, 1870) relating to the making up and payment of expenses of making up new roads, which clauses are very similar in their terms to the corresponding clauses in the Public Health Act, 1875. The case was peculiar in the result. Owing to the sequence of events and the conduct of the owner of one side in himself making up his side of two streets he had to submit to the apparent hardship of his having to pay, in addition to the whole of the expense of making up half the streets, half the expense of making up the other half of the streets. The matter was brought before the Court on an application by the Corporation of West Hartlepool to establish and enforce against certain lands belonging to the defendant and abutting on two streets, known as Murray-street and Sandringham-road, two charges for sums of £27 16s. 6d. and £328 3s. 4d. in respect of paving and sewerage of the two streets. The charges were claimed under the provisions of the West Hartlepool Extension Act, 1870. In 1878 the defendant was the owner of the land in question, forming part of an estate called the Lynfield estate, which was then and down to quite recently occupied by him for residential purposes. The owners of the immediately adjoining land on the south of Sandringham-road and east of Murray-street were Messrs. Calender, Pape, and Wright, who in 1878 were desirous of developing their property for building purposes, and applied to the West Hartlepool Improvement Commissioners (the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs) to sanction a scheme for that purpose. A plan was submitted by them showing proposed roads 36ft. wide, half on the land of the applicants and half on that of the defendant. The commissioners, on April 16 in that year, sanctioned the proposed scheme, and the roads were made, but in the first instance only 18ft. wide, an agreement having been come to between the defendant and the commissioners that he would thereafter contribute a sufficient quantity of land to give streets 36ft. wide. In January, 1892, the corporation made an order for the paving and sewerage of the roads in question, being 18ft. wide, notice of which was served on the defendant and the other owners. None of the owners executed any part of the works, and the corporation proceeded to do them themselves. The cost of the works was apportioned by the borough surveyor, the above-mentioned amounts being charged against the defendant, and, on his refusing to pay, the present summons was taken out. It appeared that the defendant had at some time after service of notice to make up half the road thrown the agreed portion of his land into the road, making it 36ft. wide, and that he had done the necessary work of paving, &c., that portion of the road, the claim now made against him being for the apportioned cost of making the 18ft. of road which was not upon his land at all. Mr. Justice Stirling made an order declaring and enforcing a charge, and Mr. Robinson appealed. The principal points taken by the counsel for the appellant were—that the 18ft. that had been made up by the corporation was not a street or streets within the meaning of the sections of the Hartlepool Improvement Act, 1870, relating to making up roads; that the notice to make up the roads was bad because it called upon Mr. Robinson to do work on roads which, as he contended, he could only do by committing trespass; and, thirdly, that going before an arbitrator to apportion the expenses was a condition precedent to enforcing a charge. It was stated that before the appeal was brought Mr. Robinson had made an abortive application to a Secretary of State under section 349 of the Act (a section somewhat similar to section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875) for the purpose of obtaining compensation from the corporation for his grievance.

Mr. Graham Hastings, Q.C., Mr. Strachan, Q.C., and Mr. Ryde argued in support of the appeal; Mr. Buckley, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. S. B. L. Druce for the corporation.

The COURT stopped the respondents' counsel and unanimously affirmed the order of the Court below. They held that half of each road was a street within the meaning of the Act, so as to bring it within the power of the corporation to make it up compulsorily at the expense of the adjoining owners in case of their not complying with a proper notice to do so; that the notice was properly made and served on Mr. Robinson, the adjoining owner on one side of the roads; and that as Mr. Robinson did not rest his defence on a wrong apportionment, there was no question within the jurisdiction of an arbitrator to decide and his decision was unnecessary.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, on certain remarks that had been made as to the hardship on Mr. Robinson in having to bear so great a part of the expense of making up the roads as a whole, observed that it was owing to the course of conduct he had himself taken, and pointed out that by section 349 of the Act in question a remedy had been provided in the case of persons who deemed themselves aggrieved by a charge for new street or other expenses by means of a memorial to a Secretary of State.

THE HON. JOHN BARING V. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Bond, whether issued in United Kingdom—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 82 (1)
(b) (i.)

The bonds of an American railway were not to become valid unless authenticated by the trustee's certificate thereon endorsed. They were so authenticated in England.

Held, that this constituted an issue in the United Kingdom, and that the bonds were liable to be stamped under sec. 82 (1) (b) (i.) of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Decision of Divisional Court (Wright and Ridley, JJ.) (13 The Times L.R., p. 436) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Ridley) on a special case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, p. 436. An instrument dated December 12, 1895, was presented to them on behalf of the Hon. J. Baring, the appellant, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which it was chargeable. The instrument was a bond unregistered, whereby the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Kansas, hereinafter called the new company, promised to pay to bearer, or, if the bond should be registered as thereafter provided, to the registered holder thereof, the sum of $1,000. It was recited that the bond was one of a series issued in pursuance of and secured by a mortgage or deed of trust, dated December 12, 1895, executed by the new company to the Union Trust Company of New York as trustee. An older company, called the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Company, had been incorporated in 1859. In 1895 this old company was in arrears in payment of the interest on its bonds. A scheme of reorganization was set on foot. This provided for the creation of the new company and a substitution of securities in the new company for those in the old. Pending the acquisition by the new company of the mortgaged property stockholders who assented to the agreement were to deposit their securities with certain firms, called depositaries. Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. were named as the depositaries of bonds for London, and agreed to act as such. Shortly after April, 1896, the new company, in accordance with agreement, executed bonds in the United States and delivered them to a trust company in New York. One of the terms of the bonds was that they should not be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the trustee's certificate thereon endorsed. These certificates were unsigned when the bonds were delivered to the trust company. The trust company forwarded to each of the depositaries in Europe a sufficient number of bonds to enable them to make the exchange against the certificates of deposit issued by them. The trust company were to countersign the bonds before forwarding them, but it was found that the premium to be paid for the insurance of the bonds on their transmission to London would be so heavy that it was arranged that the vice-president of the trust company should proceed to London and countersign them there; and this was accordingly done in the case of all the bonds sent to Baring Brothers and Co., the vice-president signing each bond by adding the words "Union Trust Company of New York, trustee, by E. H. Merritt, vice-president." Messrs. Baring and Co. received the bonds for the purpose of exchanging them against certificates of deposit issued by them. Among these was the bond in question. It was subsequently delivered by them to the appellant in London in exchange for a certificate of deposit issued by them, of which he was then the holder. The Commissioners assessed duty on the bond in question at the rate applicable to marketable securities transferable by delivery—viz., 1s. for every £10. The appellant was dissatisfied and obtained a case. The main questions were—(1) Whether the bond was made or issued in the United Kingdom; (2) if not, whether it was offered for subscription and given or delivered to a subscriber in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 82 (1) b (i.) and (ii.) of the Stamp Act,

*Reported by F. G. BAKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1891; (3) whether, if so issued or offered for subscription and given or delivered in the United Kingdom, it was chargeable with the duty of 1s. for every £10, or 6d. for every £20, as being a substituted security. The case for the appellant was that when the bond was handed to the Union Trust Company in New York it was a complete and valid obligation of the new company, and such delivery was an issue in New York; secondly, that the subsequent delivery to Messrs. Baring was not an issue in the United Kingdom; further, that the bond was never issued for subscription within the United Kingdom. The case for the Crown was (1) that the bond was a marketable security made or issued by or on behalf of a foreign corporation bearing date after June 3, 1862, and made or issued in the United Kingdom; (2) that it was a foreign security which after August 6, 1885, was offered for subscription and delivered to a subscriber in the United Kingdom; (3) the security was not valid till authenticated by the certificate thereon endorsed of the Union Trust Company of New York, and was therefore not a completed security until after the signature of the authentication by Mr. Merritt in London. The Divisional Court were of opinion that the bond was issued in the United Kingdom and dismissed the appeal. The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. R. M. B. Gray appeared for the appellant; Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C. (the Solicitor-General), and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said they were dealing with a bond which contained this express stipulation:—"This bond shall not be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the certificate hereon endorsed of the trustee under the said mortgage or deed of trust." The bond, therefore, on the face of it, was not a bond at all until the certificate endorsed on it had been signed by Mr. Merritt. The piece of paper was sent as an inchoate instrument from New York to be converted into a valid bond in this country, and it was so converted into a valid bond when the certificate received Mr. Merritt's signature in London. It was clear that the bond was not issued in New York, but was first issued when it became a valid document in London. In his opinion, when the certificate was signed the bond became a marketable security, and it was issued in the United Kingdom. The judgment of the Divisional Court must therefore be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. An instrument was not issued until it came into the hands of a person who could make use of it. During the transit of this bond from America, and until it was authenticated in London, no one could have sued on it. In his opinion, when it was endorsed with the trustee's signature and handed over to Mr. Baring it was issued, and not till then. It was further said that, even if it was issued in London it was not so issued on behalf of the company. He would not decide whether it was right to construe the Act as meaning that the bond must necessarily be issued on behalf of the company, but he was of opinion, on the facts of the case, that this bond was issued in London on behalf of the company.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

RE H. A. FARMAN—EX PARTE TRUMAN.*
Solicitor—Contempt of Court—Writ of attachment against solicitor—Who may apply for—Jurisdiction of Court over solicitor.

In this case Mr. ISRAEL DAVIS moved for a writ of attachment to issue against Mr. Harold A. Farman, a solicitor, for non-payment of a sum of £53 Os. 9d. and one guinea for costs under an order of Court of June 25, 1897. The sum in question was the balance of money paid out of Court to him as solicitor in a successful action in the Bloomsbury County Court. This he had not paid over either to the lay client or to the country solicitor from whom he received his written instructions. Dr. Truman, the country solicitor, obtained at Chambers an order on June 25, 1897, for the payment to him of the amount recovered after deduction for the costs, which had been duly taxed. This order had not been obeyed, and the Court was now asked to issue a writ of attachment in the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction over their officer to enforce obedience thereto. Mr. Israel Davis cited "Re Freston" (11 Q.B.D., 545), and argued that he was entitled to the grant of the writ whether or not Dr. Truman was technically the client of Mr. Farman, inasmuch as anybody could inform the Court that one of its officers had disobeyed the order of the Court to pay money.

Mr. W. H. STEVENSON appeared on behalf of Mr. Farman and referred to "Litchfield v. Jones" (36 Ch. D., 530) (in which case, however, an action had been brought), and took the point that Dr. Truman, the country solicitor, was not the person who was entitled to make the application, which ought to have been made by the lay client himself.

The COURT, however, gave leave for the writ to issue, directing that it should lie in the office for a month in order to give Mr. Farman time to pay the money.

SEA INSURANCE COMPANY V. BLOGG.*

Insurance—Marine—Policy on goods in vessels "sailing" on and after a certain date—"Sailing," what constitutes—Intention of master.

There cannot be a "sailing" within the meaning of a policy of marine insurance without a clear intention on the part of the master to proceed directly on the voyage.

The claim of the plaintiffs, the Sea Insurance Company, was made in respect of a loss on cargo per steamship Massasoit under a policy of reinsurance subscribed by the defendant. The policy was effected on goods at and from ports in the United States to ports in Europe in vessels "sailing on or after March 1, 1896." The question in dispute was whether the Massasoit sailed on February 29 or March 1. The facts were as follows. On February 29, 1896, the Massasoit was loading alongside a wharf at Newport News, on the St. James river, Virginia. She completed loading between nine and ten in the evening of that day. By a regulation of the port vessels were not allowed to go out to sea after dark. In order to leave the wharf clear and to prevent the crew from leaving the vessel the ship's husband ordered the master of the Massasoit, as soon as she had completed her loading, to move out a short distance into the stream, but not to start on her voyage till daybreak on March 1. The vessel had cleared at the Custom-house before the loading was finished, but a Custom-house officer was on board when she left the wharf. On March 1, about 8 a.m., the Custom-house officer went on shore, and the Massasoit started on her voyage.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. CARVER, for the plaintiff company, contended that the vessel did not sail within the meaning of the policy till the morning of March 1. If the master had left the wharf on the previous evening with the intention of then going to sea it would have made no difference if the vessel had afterwards been stopped. But in this case there was not, and could not have been, any such intention. The master only intended to lie in the stream during the night, that being a more convenient position. The general principle of law as to what constitutes a sailing was to be found in "Phillips on Insurance," section 772, "Arnould on Marine Insurance" (6th ed., 610). Counsel cited "Lang v. Anderton" (3 B. and C., 495), "Wood v. Smith—the City of Cambridge" (L.R., 5 P.C., 451) was distinguishable, for that was a case of compulsory pilotage, and a different principle applied.

SIR WALTER PHILLIMORE (with him Mr. Scrutton), for the defendant.—The question was not whether the Massasoit could or could not have got out to sea on the evening of February 29, but whether she had begun her voyage. She left the wharf in order to be in a better position for starting in the morning, and she was ready to go to sea. It was held in "Cockrane v. Fisher" (2 C. and M., 581, and 1 C. M. and R., 809) that that was sufficient to show an intention of sailing. If leaving the wharf on February 29 was a "sailing" it was immaterial that the master knew that he could not get very far that evening. He also referred to "Arnould on Marine Insurance" (6th ed., pp. 616-617), "Moir v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company" (3 M. and S., 461), "Pittgrew v. Pringle" (3 B. and Ad., 514), and "The Cachapool" (L.R., 7 P.D., 217).

Mr. JUSTICE MATHEW, after stating the facts, said that when the vessel was moved out from the wharf into the stream the master had no intention of commencing the voyage. His object was to get away from the wharf so as to leave room for other vessels, and also to keep his crew together and prevent their going ashore. Some slight advantage might have been obtained for the ship in starting from the river instead of from the wharf, but there was no reason to suppose that that consideration entered into the master's calculations. It was contended for the plaintiffs that the vessel had "sailed" within the meaning of the policy on March 1. For the defendant it was urged that the vessel had made a start when fully prepared for the voyage on February 29, and that the risk, therefore, was not covered by the policy. The law was thus stated in "Phillips on Insurance," section 772:—"A vessel has 'sailed' the moment she is unmoored and got under way, in complete preparation for the voyage, with the purpose of proceeding to sea without further delay at the port of departure." Then he quoted Lord Mansfield as follows:—"To constitute a sailing . . . the vessel at the time of sailing must be, in the contemplation of the captain, at absolute and entire liberty to proceed to her port of delivery in a mathematical line, if it were possible." For the plaintiffs reliance was placed on the case of "Lang v. Anderton;" which was contrasted with "Wood v. Smith" and "The Cachapool." It was said that without an intention to proceed to sea on a direct course there was no sailing within the meaning of the policy. On the other hand the defendant's counsel mainly relied on "Cockrane v. Fisher." The vessel. it was said, when fully prepared for sea was placed by the master in a better position for prosecuting her voyage, and had, therefore, sailed upon the earlier day. But, as was pointed out in that case, the question whether the warranty was complied with depended upon the intention of the master when the vessel left her moorings, and upon the findings of the jury that the master meant from the first to prosecute the voyage it was held that the warranty was complied with, although in the then state of the weather the vessel could not get to sea. There was no authority for the proposition that there could be a "sailing," as required by the policy, without a clear intention on the part of the master to proceed directly on his voyage. Any obstacle which was foreseen and which would cause delay in getting the vessel to sea would postpone the time of sailing until the obstacle was removed. What the Massasoit did on February 29 was, not to sail, but to shift her berth with a view to sailing on March 1. There would therefore be judgment for the plaintiff company for the amount which had been agreed upon.

ROBERTS V. HILL'S PLYMOUTH COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Dismissal—Agreement to refer questions to arbitration—Construction.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (13 The Times L.R., 448), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 448. The action was brought against colliery owners to recover damages for the wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff from his employment in the Plymouth works, Merthyr Tydvil Colliery. It appeared that on January 1, 1892, a sliding scale agreement (which was a renewal of a previous agreement) was made between certain persons on behalf of the members of the Monmouthshire and South Wales Coal Owners' Association (of which association the defendants were members) and certain other persons on behalf of the workmen employed at the collieries of the members of the association. By clause 1 of the agreement the parties thereto were styled the joint committee. By clause 6, the wages of the men were to be regulated by a sliding scale. By clause 9, "the standard of wages upon which future advances and reductions are to be made shall be the several rates actually paid at the respective collieries for the month of December, 1879." By clause 9 (a), "both the employers and the workmen shall be bound to observe and fulfil all customs, provisions, and conditions existing in December, 1879, at the associated collieries, and no variation shall be made therein either by employers or workmen, except by mutual agreement." By clause 17, "both parties to this agreement pledge their respective constituents to make every possible effort to avoid claims or disputes at the collieries, and that in case of any unavoidable differences the owners and their officers together with their workmen shall endeavour to settle all matters at the collieries, and only in case of a failing to effect a settlement shall an appeal be made to the joint committee. It is also hereby agreed that in such cases no notice to terminate contracts shall be given by either employers or their workmen before the particular question in dispute shall have been considered by the joint committee, and they shall have failed to arrive at an agreement." By clause 23, "all notices to terminate contracts . . . shall be given only on the first day of any calendar month and to terminate upon the last day of the same month." It had been the practice in the district where the defendants' collieries were situated to make certain allowances per ton, in addition to the stipulated rate of wages on cutting coal, to the men working in certain seams where from the character of the seam the coal was difficult to get. The amount of the allowances varied from time to time according as the difficulty increased or decreased. The practice of giving allowances existed before 1879. By an agreement dated March 26, 1891, the rates for allowances as from March 1, 1891, were fixed at certain figures, "the new rates to be subject to the sliding scale, advances and reductions." In November, 1895, an allowance of 3d. per ton was made to those who worked on the 9ft. seam. In that or the following month the defendants' manager, in consequence of the collieries being worked at a loss, desired to discontinue the allowances, stating that he could not go on without. The men refused to consent, and a mass meeting was held, and deputations were sent to the manager to discuss the matter. The men contended that the matter should be referred to the joint committee, to which the manager replied that the matter did not come within their jurisdiction. On January 1, 1896, the manager gave the men a month's notice of dismissal. Further discussions took place, and on January 28 the manager offered to refer the matter to the joint committee, on condition that their decision took effect from February 1. This proposal was rejected by the men, and on February 1 the collieries were closed. The present action was commenced on February 13, 1896, but subsequently an arbitrator was appointed by consent, who fixed the allowance at 1½d. per ton. An agreement was come to in accordance with the award, and the men resumed work on March 26. The action was continued to recover damages for the wrongful dismissal, the plaintiff claiming wages from February 1 to March 26. The Lord Chief Justice gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. Evans appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. Abel Thomas, Q.C., Mr. F. W. Hollams, and Mr. Trevor Lewis appeared for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether by clause 17 of the sliding scale agreement it was made a condition precedent under the circumstances which existed in this case that the matter should have been considered by the joint committee before the notice was given. The Lord Chief Justice held that it was not. It was not denied that when the notice of January 1, 1896, was given the defendants had paid to the plaintiff every farthing which was due to him under the agreement, whether for wages or allowances, or for any other claim which the plaintiff might have thereunder; and, indeed, as regards such matters there never was any claim or dispute whatever. The circumstances which existed when the notice was given the Lord Chief Justice found to be as follows, and there was ample evidence to support the finding. In October, 1895, the state of things at the colliery was this. For some years the colliery had been worked at a very considerable loss, and it had been under consideration by the owners to close the pits; but they were willing to advance further funds to continue to work the colliery if the men on their part were willing to forgo or make certain reductions in the allowances they then claimed and were receiving. That was the finding. That the defendants acted bona fide was not disputed. The agreement of 1892 was headed "Sliding Scale, 1892." It was admitted that a month's notice on either side was the proper length of notice to be given, and the question was whether clause 17 applied to the case. If it did, the notice to leave the service could not be given until after the joint committee had been applied to, and in this case this was not done. All the clauses in the agreement, except clause 9a, related to the way in which the sliding scale was to be worked out. Clause 9a had reference to the customs and what he would call the allowances which were to be preserved and carried out, all the obligations of which had been duly performed by the defendants. What did the words "claims or disputes at the collieries," "unavoidable differences," in clause 17 embrace and refer to? Did they embrace and refer to claims or disputes which might arise in relation to the working out of the existing sliding scale of wages and the existing allowances and customs in clause 9a; or did they also embrace and refer to such a matter as to whether the master should or should not be bound to continue his workings at the existing rate of wages and allowances? That they referred to the first class of cases could not be doubted, and he could understand the setting up of a joint committee as a tribunal of conciliation in such cases, so as to prevent, when claims or disputes arose thereon, notices to leave being given by either side in hot blood; but what a joint committee had to do with the latter case, in which the master was the sole judge when he found, as in this case, that he could only carry on his works at the existing wages and allowances at an enormous loss, his Lordship did not apprehend. Every master was at liberty to do as he pleased as to continuing to carry on his works, unless he had contracted otherwise. It could not be found in this agreement that the master had contracted that, before he could shut up his works, he must call in the joint committee; and it would require clear words to show that he had so contracted. Clause 17 was a clause ancillary to the carrying out of the sliding scale agreement and the compact about allowances and customs, and to nothing more. For these reasons, in his opinion, the words of clause 17 would not bear the construction which the plaintiff was attempting to put upon them, and they did not apply to this case. It did not appear to him to be necessary to consider the true construction of the latter part of this ill-drawn clause. In his opinion, the Lord Chief Justice was right in the construction he placed upon the clause, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL V. LONDON HYDRAULIC COMPANY.*

Metropolis—Subways—London County Council (Subways) Act, 1893—Charges for using subways —"Water company," what is—Company for supplying hydraulic power.

This was a special case stated by consent, under Order XXXIV., r. 1, in an action by the London County Council against the London Hydraulic Company.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

in which they sought to recover £185 6s. for remuneration or rates payable by the defendants in respect of their use of certain subways under Queen Victoria-street, Victoria-embankment, Northumberland-avenue, Shaftesbury-avenue, Charing Cross-road, Southwark-street, and Rosebery-avenue. The question raised by the case was whether the London Hydraulic Company was a water company, for, if it was, the charge for use of the subways would only be £32. The defendants were constituted under the Wharves and Warehouses Steam Power and Hydraulic Pressure Company's Act, 1871, §1 and 35 Vic., c. 121, for applying motive power by hydraulic pressure to waterside and land cranes used for working lock gates and other machinery. Under the Act they were authorized to take water for this purpose from the Thames to an amount of one million gallons a day. Section 2 of the Act incorporated therein certain general Acts, including the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the breaking up of streets for the purpose of laying pipes. Section 30 provided that the company should construct all proper works, apparatus, and conveniences necessary to secure the return to the River Thames of all waters taken therefrom and used by them immediately after the use of the same for the purposes of the said Act. Section 31 provided that the said company should not at any time supply water to be used for any purpose other than as a motive force, and that if they should supply water at any place contrary to the said enactment they should for every such offence forfeit to every company then incorporated by Act of Parliament for the supply of water within the district the sum of £20. By Section 38 the company was authorized to supply within their district motive power by hydraulic pressure to any persons or company. The London Hydraulic Power Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vic., c. 72), by Section 9 imposed a penalty on any person who being supplied by the said company with pressure water under the powers of the said Act should use the water so supplied for any other purpose than as a motive force. By the London County Council (Subways) Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vic., c. 202), it was enacted that it should be lawful for the London County Council to require a company to lay in or remove into a subway of the Council any pipes belonging to the said company where the council had a subway in the same street. By Section 5 it was provided that it should be lawful for the Council to make on the company using any subway a charge for the use of the subway according to a scale to be determined. And it was provided that, in the case of any water or gas company having statutory powers to break up streets, regard should be had only to such saving (if any) as might result to such company by reason of the pipe laid and accessible in a subway instead of being laid or remaining under a street, and to any other saving resulting to such company by reason of the subway. By section 10 of the Acts power was given to the Council to make and enforce bye-laws, and to fix the scale of fees and charges to be paid by any company or person using any subway. A scale of charges was accordingly drawn up. One table consisted of the charges to be made on water and gas companies having power to break up streets, and the other of the charges for companies, bodies, and persons other than water or gas companies having power to break up streets. The latter was on a higher scale. The pipes of the company have been laid in the subways under the streets named. A question arose between the Council and the defendant company as to the scale of charges applicable. The question for the Court was on which scale the charges were to be made.

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C. (Mr. English Harrison with him), for the County Council, said the defendant company was other than a water company, and should therefore be charged on the higher scale. In the Waterworks Act persons authorized to construct waterworks were called the undertakers. This company did not construct waterworks.

Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C. (Mr. Loehnis with him), said the company was a water company, at any rate for the purpose of breaking up streets. The clause of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with regard to the breaking up of streets was incorporated by section 2 of their Act. It was true the company could not compete with other water companies by supplying water to customers. In the Act of 1847 there was no definition of a water company.

Mr. DICKENS replied that it could not be said that this company supplied water for domestic use.

The COURT upheld the view of the London County Council.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the defendant company was a company constituted for the purpose of supplying hydraulic power. The purpose of a water company was to take water for the purpose of supplying it for domestic use. The defendant company had no power to sell water; their duty was to return all water to the River Thames. Water was only the means of working the machinery. They were not a water company within the exemption; the higher scale of charge was therefore applicable.

Mr. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred, but not with so much confidence as Mr. Justice Wright. The defendant company in a sense supplied water. Supply was a word common to both purposes, but, on the whole, he thought that the more just view was that the term water company should be kept for those companies which supplied water for consumption in the ordinary way.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1897.
Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Nov 8.

TAYLOR V. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF WINDSOR AND ANOTHER.*

Tolls — Bridge — Prescriptive toll — Statutory rights.

Held, reversing the decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (13 The Times L.R., 402), that the Corporation of Windsor had possessed a prescriptive right to take tolls in respect of Windsor-bridge, but that the effect of certain legislation was to extinguish that right and substitute in its place new statutory rights, on the expiration of which the corporation could not revert to the old prescriptive toll.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice at the trial of the action without a jury (reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 402). The action was brought by a member of the Eton Urban District Council for the purpose of having it determined whether the corporation of Windsor have the right to levy tolls from the public in respect of vehicles passing over Windsor-bridge. This bridge, which connects Eton and Windsor, was constructed in 1819 under a private Act of Parliament (59 Geo. III., c. 126) by means of funds raised from the public and from certain tolls authorized by that Act. Before that time there had been an ancient wooden bridge on the same site, in respect of which the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of Windsor had always levied tolls. By an Act of Parliament passed in 1734—viz., 9 Geo. II., c. 15—the tolls which had been thus levied in accordance with custom were confirmed, subject to certain variations as to the persons liable to pay them, as mentioned in the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith, and certain new means of enforcing the payment of them were conferred on the corporation. The present bridge was made of stone, and was larger than the old bridge. The Act of Geo. III., which was a temporary Act, referred to the Act of Geo. II., and in section 6 spoke of the ceasing of the tolls which the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses were then entitled to take and receive by virtue of the thereinbefore recited Act. It conferred on the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses special powers to take higher tolls for the purposes of the new bridge. The Act also contained a saving clause (section 54), which provided that nothing in the Act should prejudice the rights or tend or be construed to defeat or abridge the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of the powers granted to them by their charters, but that the said corporation should continue to hold and enjoy such rights, privileges, benefits, and advantages as were granted to them in or by their said charters, or to which they were entitled by prescription or otherwise, in as full, ample, and beneficial a manner as they did before the passing of the Act, or could or might have done in case the Act had not been passed, anything in the Act contained to the contrary notwithstanding. Section 55 provided that the said bridge should not be deemed or taken to be a county bridge, and the inhabitants of Berks and Bucks should not be liable to repair it. The continuance of the Act of Geo. III. was extended by another Act—5 Vict., c. 8—for 31 years from April 22, 1842, and from thence to the end of the then next Session of Parliament. On January 30, 1896, the plaintiff was proceeding from Windsor to Eton in a hired cab, and at the bridge a toll of 2d. was demanded of him, and on his refusal to pay the gates were closed against him. He then paid the toll under protest, and afterwards brought this action, asking for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to levy tolls for the passage of the bridge, and for an injunction to restrain them from preventing the plaintiff from crossing the bridge and from levying tolls for the passage of the bridge. He contended that the right to levy tolls in pursuance of the above Acts had for a long time ceased to exist. The defendants contended that their right to take tolls in respect of the bridge was not affected by the expiration of the Act of George III. They and their predecessors had been from time immemorial owners of the bridge and had been liable to repair it, and had enjoyed the customary right to levy certain tolls in respect of loads, animals, and vehicles passing over the bridge, and, inter alia, a toll of 2d. for every hackney coach so passing over it, and, as incidental to their rights, the right to close the passage of the bridge to any person refusing to pay. These rights, they maintained, had never been extinguished, and existed in respect of the present bridge in the same manner as they had existed in respect of previous bridges which had from time to time existed before the present one was built. Alternatively to the claim by custom the defendants claimed to be entitled to the tolls and the rights incidental thereto—(1) by prescription at common law; (2) by prescription under the statute 2 and 3 William IV., c. 71; and (3) by lost grant. The defendants counterclaimed a declaration that they were entitled to levy tolls for the passage of Windsor-bridge and to close the bridge to any person refusing to pay. At the trial the Lord Chief Justice held that the effect of the Acts of George II. and George III. was merely to suspend temporarily the prescriptive rights of the corporation to levy tolls, and that on the expiration of those Acts the prescriptive rights survived and remained. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. WITT, Q.C., and Mr. DANCKWERTS, for the plaintiff, argued that the effect of the statute of 9 Geo. II. was to extinguish the customary right to take tolls which the corporation had possessed. Although the tolls taken under that Act were substantially the same as the customary tolls which had been levied previously, the Act conferred on the corporation a fresh and a different title to the tolls. The right, which had been a prescriptive one, was confirmed by the statute, and thenceforth the corporation took the tolls under the statutory right. It was settled law that where a prescriptive title was confirmed by a Parliamentary title the prescriptive title was thereby extinguished and the Parliamentary title alone remained—"Corporation of Manchester v. Peverley" (22 Ch.D., 294, note); "Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners v. Straker" (42 Ch.D., 83); Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 3rd ed., p. 419; Com. Dig., Prescription, G. The old prescriptive right was therefore destroyed in 1734 and could not by any means have been subsequently revived. Secondly, even if the prescriptive tolls survived the Act of George II., they were only tolls in respect of the old wooden bridge, and could not continue to be leviable when that bridge was pulled down and superseded by the new bridge in 1819. In that year the corporation made a contract with Parliament, to which effect was given by the Act of 59 Geo. III. The corporation were liable to repair the old bridge and rebuild it if necessary. In consideration of their giving up their rights to the old tolls Parliament relieved them from that liability; and in consideration of their substituting a new and larger bridge Parliament gave them new powers to levy a new set of tolls. The old prescriptive tolls were never leviable in respect of the new bridge.

Mr. CRACKANTHORPE, Q.C., and Mr. COURTHOPE MURDOCH, for the defendant corporation, contended that where prescriptive rights were confirmed by Parliament they were not thereby destroyed and converted into merely statutory rights, and cited Co. Litt. 115, A., and Com. Dig., Prescription, F. The Act of 9 Geo. II. enlarged the remedy, but did not extinguish the right, which continued to exist by virtue of the custom confirmed by statute. Neither was the old prescriptive right destroyed when the new bridge was built, which was for this purpose the same bridge as the old bridge. Section 6 of the Act of Geo. III. merely referred to the temporary suspension of the old tolls during the time while the new tolls were being taken. The saving clause in that Act was most material, and showed clearly that the old tolls were not extinguished.

Mr. J. R. Atkin appeared for the other defendant, through whom the corporation levied the tolls.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment, in the course of which he said that the Lord Chief Justice of England found—and this finding was not impeached—that prior to the passing of the Act of 9 Geo. II., c. xv., in the year 1734, the corporation had, by virtue of prescription founded upon the theory of a lost grant, a right to take the toll in question, and he also held, though with some doubt, that the legislation which had taken place since that date in relation to the tolls had not extinguished this right, and that it had remained suspended and in abeyance for the 140 years intervening between the passing of 9 Geo. II., c. xv., and the termination by effluxion of time of the last Act upon the subject—viz., 5 Vict., c. viii. The real point for determination was what was the effect which the statutes passed in 1734, 1819, and 1842, in relation to these tolls, had upon the old franchise founded upon prescription? There was, in the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen, in the case of "Mayor, &c., of Manchester v. Lyons" (22 Ch.D., at p. 310), a passage which so clearly defined what were the questions to be decided in this case that he (the Lord Justice) would at once cite it before going to the statutes. Lord Justice Bowen said:—"When there is a franchise created by charter, and the Legislature afterwards operates upon it, it is obvious that the Legislature can do exactly what it pleases. It can either leave the old franchise standing and place a new Parliamentary right beside it; or it may leave the old franchise standing and incorporate certain statutory incidents into the old franchise, provided it makes its intention clear; or it may extinguish the old franchise, either expressly or by implication, and substitute in its place, not a franchise properly so called, but Parliamentary rights and obligations as distinct from a franchise." Now, into which of these three classes did the legislation as to the tolls during the last century and a half bring the present case? This brought him to the year 1734, when the first Act was passed. At that time the Corporation of Windsor were under liability ratione tenuræ to repair and maintain the bridge, and by prescription were entitled to receive tolls for passage over and under the bridge. In 1734 the corporation obtained the first Act (9 Geo. II., c. xv.). Did that Act leave the old franchise founded upon prescription standing, or did it bring into existence a Parliamentary right as distinct from a franchise? By the old right founded upon prescription the corporation were empowered to levy upon every coach, animal, article, and barge passing down stream, passing over or under the bridge, the respective enumerated tolls, excepting the one toll of 2d. upon every hackney carriage which was not to be levied upon a freeman's hackney carriage. By this statute not one of these tolls was to be levied upon a freeman. How could these two conflicting rights stand together? If the old franchise founded upon prescription was left standing, a freeman after the passing of the Act of 1734 was liable to all the tolls except the one, whereas by the Act he was exempt from all. It could not be said that this Act left the old franchise standing and placed a new Parliamentary right beside it. Nor did the Act leave the old franchise standing and merely incorporate certain statutory incidents therein, for it did much more, it changed the area over which the toll was to range. In his opinion this Act of 1734 granted a substantive right to tolls to be levied upon persons different from those whom the old franchise made liable to toll, and this Act consequently superseded and extinguished the old franchise founded upon a lost grant, and substituted in its place a new statutory right. This was made clear by the Act of 1819 (59 Geo. III., c. cxxvi.), which the corporation then obtained, and wherein they recited (s. 6) the loss they would sustain by the ceasing "of the several tolls which at present they are entitled to take and receive by virtue of the Act of 9 Geo. II., c. xv." This alone was sufficient to decide the case against the corporation. He now came to the Act of 59 Geo. III., c. cxxvi., passed in the year 1819. The tolls granted to the corporation by this Act were in amount greatly in excess of the tolls authorized by the Act of 1734, and it also authorized tolls upon some different subject-matters, and the freemen were not exempted from toll as they had been by the Act of 1734. How could the old franchise, which was totally different, stand together with this Act, even assuming that the Act of 1734 had never been passed? Surely the fresh substantive Parliamentary powers contained in the Act of 1819 were such that they could not exist alongside the old franchise and leave it standing; and, if so, it followed that the old franchise must give way. How could two different sets of tolls, differing in amount, persons to be charged, and subject-matters to be charged, stand at one and the same time? It appeared to him impossible, and therefore the Act of 1819 must be held to have extinguished the old franchise, had it existed in 1819, which, in his judgment, for the reasons given above it did not. It was said, in answer to this, that this Act of 1819 was only a temporary Act for 21 years, and that the Legislature could not have intended to have left the corporation without a toll at the end of that period. But the Legislature expressly prolonged the existence of the Act from the end of the 21 years to the end of the next Session of Parliament, which seemed to have been given in order that the corporation might again go to Parliament, if necessary, for extended rights to the tolls, and which in fact they did when they obtained the Act of 1842. No doubt section 54 of the Act of 1819 reserved the rights of the corporation whether under charter or prescription, but it only reserved such rights as existed when the Act was passed. By the Act of 1842 the provisions of the Act of 1819 were extended for 31 years, and from thence to the end of the then next Session of Parliament. Here, again, time was expressly given to the corporation to apply to Parliament at the expiration of the 31 years, but when the Act expired in 1874 the corporation sought no further powers. For these reasons, in his opinion the old prescriptive toll was extinguished, and the corporation after the year 1874 could not lawfully revert to such tolls and take the toll which was the subject-matter of the action. The appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read judgments to the same effect.

IN RE PEVERIL GOLD MINES (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Petition—Who may present—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 82.

Articles of association provided that no petition to wind up the company should be presented except upon certain conditions therein set forth.

Held, notwithstanding the articles of association, that a holder of 5,000 fully-paid shares who had not complied with any of the conditions was entitled to present a petition to wind up the company.

This case involved an important and novel point of company law. A petition had been presented by a shareholder, holding 5,000 fully-paid shares, to wind up the company, and a motion was made on behalf of two shareholders, one holding 20 shares on which 16s. 6d. per share had been paid, and the other holding 13,000 fully-paid shares, to stay proceedings upon the petition. All the shares were of the nominal value of £1 each. It was conceded for the purposes of the motion that the petitioner was a contributory who would be entitled to petition but for the existence of clause 164 of the articles of association, which was as follows:—

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"No petition shall be presented or proceeded with by a member to wind up the company except and unless (a) by consent in writing of not less than two of the then board, or (b) in pursuance or by permission of a resolution passed by a majority at a general meeting of the company, or (c) the petitioner or petitioners shall hold or together hold not less than one-fifth of the then issued capital of the company, upon which all calls shall have been paid." It was admitted that the petitioner had not complied with any one of the conditions mentioned in the article.

Mr. C. E. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy were heard in support of the motion; and Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Eustace Smith for the petitioner.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE delivered judgment to the effect following:—The applicants say that the article in question disentitles the petitioner to proceed with his petition. Their argument may be shortly summarized thus:—The articles of association constitute an agreement between the members of the company, and article 164 is part of that agreement; there is nothing illegal either at common law or by statute to render such an agreement invalid, and, consequently, they are entitled to insist on its being observed. For the petitioner (the respondent on this motion) it is contended that the article is invalid as being in conflict with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, as being against the policy of the Act and against public policy. The memorandum and the articles of association embody the contract between the different members of the company, but those documents must not conflict with the provisions of the Acts regulating the incorporation of joint stock companies. The Act of 1862 confers certain rights upon shareholders, and, amongst others, it provides, by section 82, that any application for winding up shall be by petition, that "it may be presented by the company or by any one or more creditor or creditors, contributory or contributories, of the company, or by all or any of the above parties, together or separately." A qualification upon the right to petition so conferred is to be found in the Act of 1867, section 40. The 82nd section of the Companies Act, 1862, undoubtedly confers a right upon any single contributory—and the petitioner in the present case is a contributory within the meaning of the section—to present a petition, and the question really is whether or not the petitioner has by becoming a shareholder entered into a contract, enforceable either by the company or by other individual shareholders, not to exercise the right which section 82 prima facie in terms confers upon him. I am of opinion that, although section 82 only says that a contributory "may" present a petition, it confers a right upon every shareholder just as much as if the terms of the section had been that every contributory should have "the right to present a petition." Apart from the question of public policy, I consider that the terms of the section are intended to confer a right of which a contributory cannot be deprived, either entirely or in a modified way, by the terms of the articles of association, unless upon the footing that by becoming a shareholder the petitioner has done what is equivalent to validly releasing an individual legal right, and I am of opinion that he has not done so. I am confirmed in my view of the true intent and meaning of the section, not only by section 40 of the Act of 1867, to which I have referred—which had the meaning been otherwise would have been unnecessary—but by the fact that the Act of 1862, when it provides for a discretionary alteration or limitation of the statutory terms of articles of association, so provides in terms, as in the case of section 52, in relation to voting and summoning meetings, where it is enacted that, in default of any regulations as to voting, every member shall have one vote, and in default of any regulations as to summoning general meetings, a meeting shall be held to be duly summoned if summoned as in the section mentioned. There are no corresponding words in section 82. In fact, I think that the right to petition to wind up by every single shareholder is a condition of incorporation under the Companies Acts, whatever independent contracts may be separately made between the company and an individual who happens to be or to intend to become a shareholder, or between individuals who happen to be the shareholders. I am not left without guidance in the matter. It appears to me that I have the authority of the House of Lords in the case of "Welton v. Saffery" (1897, A.C., p. 299) for the principle which ought to be applied in this case. It is true that in the present case the article in question is not at variance with the memorandum of association in the same way as it was in the case I have referred to, but if it can be shown that the article is at variance with the Act of Parliament directly, the reasoning applies, if not with greater force, at least in a more direct manner. "If one were to suppose," says the Lord Chancellor at p. 305, "that the whole 6,000 original shareholders, or persons who agreed to become shareholders, or persons who became shareholders by purchase in the market, were to have agreed that these shares should only be regarded as having 10s. due upon them, each might perhaps against himself establish some contract by which the persons agreeing with him in his individual capacity might have rights, but it would not be in his capacity as shareholder, it would be in his capacity as individual." And Lord Davey says at p. 331:—"Of course, individual shareholders may deal with their own interests by contract in such way as they may think fit. But such contracts, whether made by all or some only of the shareholders, would create personal obligations or an exceptio personarum against themselves only and would not become a regulation of the company or be binding on the transferees of the parties to it or upon new or non-assenting shareholders. There is no suggestion here of any such private agreement outside the machinery of the Companies Acts." I think that the passages I have quoted apply to the present case. The article which I have to deal with is really an attempt to fix upon the holders of every share an obligation, so to speak, running with the share, in contravention of the provisions of the Act of Parliament. So far as regards the company who are moving parties the case is to my mind quite clear, and, in reply, counsel for the motion hardly insisted upon the right of the company to the relief asked for. If the articles are to be regarded as part of the terms of the contract between the company and the person applying for shares, I am of opinion that the company had no right, having regard to the Act of Parliament, to enter into such contract as a condition and part of the general contract binding upon all shareholders, whatever separate or distinct bargain they might have the power to make with an individual who happened to be or to desire to become a shareholder. This article appears to be one more attempt to remove a statutory safeguard of the inexperienced intending shareholder. Not one per cent. of intending shareholders reads the articles before applying for or accepting a transfer of shares, and a shareholder does not expect to find that he has entered into a special contract waiving his statutory rights. I know nothing about the merits of the particular case presented by the petition sought to be restrained, but I am glad to be able to think that the law is as I hold it to be. Having regard to the views I have expressed, it is unnecessary for me to decide the points raised which were founded upon the article being against the policy of the Act or against public policy; but I desire to add that I am far from saying that such points may not be made good. I dismiss the motion with costs.

The petition was, however, ordered to stand over pending an appeal.

CLARKE V. M'TURK.*

Penalty—Liquidated damages—Breach of contract.

This was an action against Mr. William M'Turk, who until 1896 carried on business at Angelo's Fencing School in St. James's-street. The plaintiff, Mr. Henry Clarke, was in the employ of the defendant as fencing instructor, and he brought this action to recover arrears of salary. The claim was admitted as to part, but the defendant denied that he was liable for one month's salary in lieu of notice, as the plaintiff had agreed to forgo it. Since leaving the defendant's employment the plaintiff had started a fencing school of his own at 47, Pall-mall, and the defendant contended that this was a breach of an agreement entered into by the plaintiff when he went into the defendant's employment. That agreement contained a clause that the plaintiff would not teach or instruct any person in London or within 70 miles thereof in the event of his leaving Mr. M'Turk's employ or that of his successors, and for the performance of that clause and all the other provisions of the agreement on the part of the plaintiff the plaintiff bound himself in the sum of £1,000, to be recoverable as liquidated and ascertained damages and not as a penalty. The defendant counter-claimed for £1,000.

Mr. Loehnis appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Bonsey for the defendant.

Mr. LOEHNIS contended that the £1,000 was not liquidated damages but a penalty, and that therefore the defendant could not recover against the plaintiff on the counter-claim. He cited "Wilson v. Love" (L.R., 1896, 1 Q.B., 626).

His LORDSHIP upheld this contention, and gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim for £15 10s. 6d. (being the amount claimed less the month's salary claimed in lieu of notice), and on the counter-claim.

THE CHIOGGIA.†

Ship—Bottomry—Necessaries—Prior charges—Marshalling assets.

Certain necessities men held not entitled to have the assets marshalled in their favour.

This was a motion by bottomry bondholders for payment out of Court to them of the net proceeds of the Italian ship Chioggia and her freight, and that they might be at liberty thereout to reimburse themselves the sum of £106 8s. 8d. paid by them to the crew for wages, and pay the master £101 and the Italian Consul £10 1s. 8d., and apply the residue in part satisfaction of the judgment recovered by them in respect of their bond.

Mr. Butler Aspinall appeared on behalf of the necessities men, and Mr. Balloch on behalf of the cargo owners.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES said,—The motion is supported by the owners of the cargo, but is opposed by the Goole Roping and Ship Chandling Company (Limited) and others who have supplied necessities to the said vessel and obtained judgment against the ship and freight in respect thereof. The bond was given on ship, freight, and cargo whilst the vessel was on a voyage from Demerara to Liverpool, on April 9, 1897. After the vessel arrived at Liverpool, an action was instituted by the bondholders against ship, freight, and cargo, in which an order was made that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to pay the wages and other amounts legally due to the crew (other than the master) and to take their rights, and in pursuance of this order the plaintiffs have paid crew's wages amounting to £106 8s. 8d. Judgment was obtained on July 12 last in this action for £1,897 19s. 6d., against the ship and freight and the owners of the cargo who had given an undertaking in respect of the cargo, but all questions of priorities were reserved. The necessities above mentioned were supplied at Goole, in January and April, 1896, before the vessel sailed for Demerara, and judgment was obtained on October 26 last against the proceeds of the ship and freight for the sum of £245 17s. 7d., subject to questions as to priority. The ship has been sold by the marshal, and the net proceeds of the ship and freight in court after deducting the marshal's expenses are £376 16s. 10d. The cargo was of the value of £2,052 10s. 9d. The suppliers of the necessities had no lien on the ship or freight, but having recovered judgment against these interests they contend that they have a right to have the assets marshalled in their favour as they have only the ship and freight to look to, while the bondholders have the security of ship, freight, and cargo. The value of the ship, freight, and cargo appears to be enough to meet all the claims and costs. The cargo owners, in whose interest the case was argued by Mr. Balloch, however contend that the bondholders have a prior right to the proceeds of the ship and freight as against the necessities men, and must exhaust these proceeds before coming on the cargo, and that if the assets are marshalled the effect will be to compel the cargo owners to pay the claim of the necessities men, with which they have no concern. It was not disputed that the claim of the bondholders has priority over that of the necessities men, nor that the cargo cannot be made subject to the payment of the bond until the proceeds of the ship and freight have been exhausted, but the contention of the necessities men, as above indicated, was that, the bondholders having two funds upon which they can claim—namely, the proceeds of the ship and freight on the one hand, and the cargo on the other, while the necessities men can only claim against the proceeds of the ship and freight, the latter ought, according to the doctrine of marshalling, to be paid first out of the last mentioned proceeds. But marshalling should not be permitted to the prejudice of third persons. According to equitable doctrines, in order to marshal not only should there be two creditors of the same person, but one of them should have two funds belonging to the same person to which he can resort; see "Aldrich v. Cooper" (2 Tudor's Leading Cases, 4 ed., p. 78) and "Douglas v. Cooksey" (2 Ir.R., Eq., 311). In the present case the two funds belong to different persons, i.e., the shipowners and cargo owners respectively, and in my opinion the necessities men have no right of marshalling. They have no equity to have the claims adjusted so as to compel the cargo owners in effect to provide the means of discharging the claim for necessarios. The case of the "Edward Oliver" (L. R., 1 A. and E., 379), which was principally relied on by the counsel for the necessaries men, does not apply. Although the effect of that decision was to compel the cargo owners to pay a balance which was greater by the exact sum paid to the master out of the proceeds of ship and freight, the master had a lien on these proceeds for the amount of his claim, and it was merely decided that the rule that a master who has bound himself, as well as the ship and freight, for the payment of a bottomry bond, is not entitled to payment of his own claims in priority to those of the bondholders cannot be invoked by the cargo owners, and will not be acted on where the bondholder will not be prejudiced by the master being paid before him. The net proceeds in Court, £576 16s. 10d., must therefore be paid out to the bondholders, and thereout they must be directed to repay themselves the said sum of £106 Rs. 8d. and pay to the master the said sum of £101 and to the Italian Consul the said sum of £10 1s. 8d., on proof to the satisfaction of the Registrar that these sums are due, and to apply the balance in discharge pro tanto of the amount due under their judgment.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1897.
Chitty, L.J.) } Nov. 9.

IN THE MATTER OF AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN
THOMAS PALMER AND CO. AND HOSKEN, TREVITHICK, POLKINGHORN, AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Arbitration—Question of law—Remitting award for re-consideration—Special case—Jurisdiction of Court over arbitrators—Arbitration Act, 1889, secs. 10, 11, and 19.

This was an appeal, by leave, of Hosken and Co. (Limited) from an order of Mr. Justice Day's, at Chambers, on July 23 last which raised a question of considerable importance to the commercial world bearing on the Arbitration Act, 1889. His Lordship ordered that an award of the directors of the Liverpool Corn Trade Association (Limited), dated June 16, 1897, and made in the above-mentioned arbitration and the matters referred to in the arbitration forming the subject matter of the award, should be remitted to the reconsideration of the directors. The learned Judge also ordered that the directors should state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court the following question of law arising in the course of the reference—namely, whether Palmer and Co. were entitled to be refunded by Hosken and Co. (Limited) in respect of the actual deficiency in a cargo of wheat below the bill of lading quantity, notwithstanding that the cargo was shipped in the hold and rebagged and weighed at even weights of less than 250 per draft, contrary to the terms of the contract. The dispute, which had been referred to arbitration in accordance with the rules of the Liverpool Corn Trade Association (Limited), arose between Palmer and Co., last buyers, and Hosken and Co. (Limited), sellers, and G. W. M'Near, of San Francisco, first seller, under a contract dated February 3, 1897, for a cargo of Californian wheat, shipped per the Port Douglas. The contract contained a provision that any deficiency on bill of lading weight was to be refunded by the sellers, and any excess over bill of lading weight to be paid for by the buyers. Palmer and Co. alleged that they received, ex ship, a number of bags short, equivalent to about £442 in value, and thus accordingly claimed to be compensated. The arbitrators awarded that the buyers had no claim upon the sellers for deficiency in invoice quantity. The matter was brought before the directors of the Liverpool Corn Trade Association (Limited) by way of appeal against the decision of the arbitrators, and they confirmed the award. The matter was very fully discussed before the directors, and in the course of the proceedings a formal application was made to them on behalf of Palmer and Co. to state a special case for the opinion of the Court, under the 19th section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, on the point of law above mentioned. In the event of their refusing to state a case they were asked to adjourn the further consideration of the matter, in order that Palmer and Co. might apply to the Court for an order for the point of law raised to be settled. The directors were, however, of opinion that they were competent to deal with the case, and that there were no grounds or necessity for seeking the assistance of the Court. The matter was then brought before Mr. Justice Day, sitting in Chambers, when his Lordship made the order now appealed against.

Mr. E. Bray (with him Mr. R. M. Bray) was for the appellants; Mr. Carver was for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments on the 26th ult., their Lordships reserved judgment, which was delivered this morning, dismissing the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the facts of the case, said,—Having stated these facts, the question arises as to the jurisdiction of the Court to make the order. That turns upon three sections of the Arbitration Act, 1889—namely, sections 10, 11, and 19. (His Lordship read them and continued).—Those are the sections which are material. The Arbitration Act, 1889, section 19, gives the Court very extensive powers over arbitrators beyond any which the Court previously possessed. It impliedly confers on the parties to an arbitration the right to apply to the Court for an order directing the arbitrator to state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court any question of law arising in the course of the reference. The right thus conferred must be respected by the arbitrator; and if a party to an arbitration acting bona fide requests an arbitrator either to state a special case raising a question of law arising in the course of the reference and material for consideration, or to delay his award until the party can apply to the Court for an order directing a special case, and the arbitrator refuses to comply with either of such requests, the arbitrator is prima facie at all events guilty of a breach of duty towards such party. Such a breach of duty is prima facie misconduct on the arbitrator within the meaning of section 11 of the statute, and justifies the Court in setting aside the award under that section, or in remitting it for further consideration under section 10. Even in such a case as that supposed there may possibly be some grounds for justifying the refusal of the arbitrator, although it is not easy to imagine any. But it is obvious that, if an application for a special case is frivolous and is made merely for delay, an arbitrator will be perfectly right to refuse it, and will be upheld by the Court in so doing. This view of the law is quite consistent with "Dinn v. Blake" (Law Rep., 10 C.P., 388) and "Re Keighley and Co." (1893, 1 Q.B., 405). Section 19 has imposed new duties on arbitrators, and has consequently made a breach of such duties by them misconduct on their part; although before such duties existed their conduct could not be so regarded. In the present case the question of law raised by the buyer is material if there is a deficiency and is raised bona fide and not at all for delay. On the evidence before us a considerable deficiency seems established; but the parties are not agreed about the matter, and the Court does not know what the arbitrators' decision on this question really is. If they find there is no deficiency no question of law arises; but if there is a deficiency the question of law raised by the buyer becomes all important. Under these circumstances the order appealed from should be slightly varied in its terms so as to direct the arbitrators to reconsider their award and to state whether there is a deficiency or not, and if there is then to state the special case. In substance, however, the order is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said,—The order under appeal cannot be supported under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, standing alone. The proceedings were closed by the award. Section 19 empowers the arbitrator to state a case "at any stage of the proceedings," but not after the award has been completed, and the power of the Court or a Judge to compel him to state a case, under that section standing alone, is on the construction of the section limited in like manner. This was the opinion of the Lords by whom the "Tabernacle" case ([1892] A.C., 298) was decided. The case, then, turns on section 10, read in connexion with the other sections of the Act, including particularly sections 11 and 19. Upon the principle of construction adopted in "Keighley's" case ([1893] 1 Q.B., 405) the Court or a Judge has power to remit an award to the arbitrator for reconsideration where there has been misconduct on the part of the arbitrator. Now, on the facts of this case I think that it was the duty of the directors to adjourn in order to give Palmer and Co. an opportunity to apply to the Court or a Judge for an order directing a special case to be stated for the purpose of raising the question of law. The application was made in good faith and on reasonable grounds; it was not made for the purpose of delay. According to the affidavits, a strong case was made out in the evidence adduced before the directors by Palmer and Co., the ultimate buyers, showing that on the discharge of the cargo from the ship there was a deficiency in the quantity stated in the provisional invoice, which was founded on the bill of lading; and if there was, in fact, a deficiency the contract between the ultimate sellers and buyers gave a right to the buyers to have the deficiency refunded; and the right to have the deficiency refunded was irrespective of any question of the liability of the ship. I am not stating these propositions for the purpose of deciding any point of law between the parties; but merely for the purpose of showing the nature of the case presented on Palmer and Co.'s behalf to the directors. The points of law, if they arise on the facts, will have to be considered and decided hereafter. Now, the appellants do not contest that the evidence as to deficiency on the discharge was such as is stated in Palmer's affidavit; wholly passing this evidence by, they state that there was evidence before the arbitrators of a due shipment of the full quantity of cargo referred to in the bill of lading, and they suggest that the arbitrators were not satisfied in fact that any deficiency in the outturn was proved. The chairman of the directors has made an affidavit; but it is silent on this point of fact. We are unable to say whether the directors were prepared to find as a fact that there was no deficiency. The order which we propose to make varying the order in Chambers will leave that matter open for the decision of the directors. If they find as a fact that there was no deficiency, the point of law sought to be raised will not arise. Our decision is quite consistent in principle with that of Lord Esher and the other members of the Court in "Re Keighley" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 405). There in dealing with the tenth section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, the Court referred to the corresponding eighth section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and the previous decisions on that section. But they had not to take into their consideration the new enactment of the 19th section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the general effect of that enactment on arbitrations, and on the application of the tenth section to circumstances such as those before us. It seems to me that the Legislature intended to confer on the Court or a Judge a discretionary power to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case over arbitrators in reference to questions of law at least to this extent—namely, that when a request for a case is made in good faith, and on reasonable grounds, and the request is made for an adjournment for the purpose of applying to the Court or a Judge, the arbitrator by summarily making his award ought not to preclude, or attempt to preclude, the party from applying to the Court. In this case I think that the adjournment ought to have been allowed; that there was a duty cast on the directors which they failed to perform; and that in this sense there was misconduct on their part which justifies us in remitting the case to them in the manner already stated by the Master of the Rolls. In the "East and West India Docks" case (12 App. Ca., 738), decided before the Arbitration Act, 1889, was passed, it was held by the House of Lords that the Court had jurisdiction to give leave to revoke the submission if there was reasonable ground for supposing that the arbitrator was going wrong in point of law, even in a matter within his jurisdiction. The leave would have been given in the circumstances of that case if the parties had not come to terms that the arbitrator should state a special case for the decision of the Court. This jurisdiction, as was held in "James v. James" (23 Q.B., 12), is discretionary, and to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case. In the "East and West India Docks" case the discretion was exercised while the arbitration was still pending, and consequently the decision does not directly bear on the present case. Granting leave to revoke the submission is a strong measure and a drastic remedy. As the law then stood, it was considered the right mode of controlling the arbitrator in matters of law; and the case shows the importance attached by the House of Lords to keeping the arbitrator right in point of law; and in this respect it has an indirect bearing on the present case.

COOPERS AND OTHERS V. THE UNITED CONTRACT CORPORATION (LIMITED) AND DANZIGER.*

Contract—Agreement—Syndicate—Validity of Agreement.

The defendants entered into an agreement with a syndicate, consisting of eight persons, but the agreement was executed by seven only of them.

Held, it was not binding on the defendants.

The plaintiffs in this action were seven gentlemen, who, together with the defendant Danziger, constituted a syndicate called the Athelstane Syndicate. The action was brought to recover £700 under an agreement alleged to have been entered into by the members of the syndicate with the defendant corporation, by which the syndicate agreed to transfer to the corporation certain leases of mining properties in Western Australia. The agreement contained a proviso that if the corporation made default in paying the sum of £700 on account of the purchase money the syndicate should be entitled to recover £700 as liquidated damages. The plaintiffs alleged that default had been made, and brought this action to recover £700. Danziger had refused to join in the action as one of the plaintiffs, and had therefore been joined as a defendant. The corporation raised several defences, but the only one calling for a report was that the agreement was not binding on the corporation because it had not been executed by Danziger as one of the syndicate.

Mr. H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Mr. Holmes Poulter appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. Ritter for the corporation; Mr. Mitchell Innes for Danziger.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he was of opinion that the action could not be maintained. The question in the case was, Who was it that intended to contract with the defendant corporation? It was the Athelstane Syndicate. Who were the members of the syndicate? Danziger was one of them. The contract was signed by all the members except Danziger. His Lordship was of opinion that the defendant corporation did not intend to contract with some only, but with all the members of the syndicate, and an examination of the contract made that fairly clear. The object of the contract was to transfer to the corporation certain leases of property in Western Australia. The agreement recited that "Whereas the syndicate is possessed of or entitled to transfers of certain mining leases," and "whereas the syndicate has agreed with the corporation for the sale to it of the mining leases." It was obvious that the corporation throughout intended to contract with the persons who had control of the leases. The seven plaintiffs were not by themselves possessed of or entitled to the transfers of the leases. Then the contract went on to provide that the syndicate would sell and the corporation would buy. How could it be said that a contract signed by seven only of the eight vendors was a contract at all? Clause 3 made the matter still plainer, for it provided that the corporation should form a company for the purpose of acquiring the properties. Was it ever contemplated that the defendants should form a company to take over and work 92½ per cent. of these leases, for that would be the effect of excluding Danziger's interest from the contract? Finally, the contract provided that the liquidated damages should be paid to the syndicate. How, then, could these plaintiffs recover the damages, for they were not the syndicate? It was argued that Danziger was bound because he had given a power of attorney to two of the members to deal with the properties on his behalf, but the contract did not purport to be signed by them as attorneys for Danziger, and his Lordship was sure that these two members, when they signed, had no intention of dealing with more than their own individual rights. His Lordship added that he did not know where the morality of the case lay, but if the matter were probed to the bottom it was probable that the morality would be found to be nowhere. As, however, the case had to be decided according to the law there must be judgment for the defendants.

DAWSON V. THE AFRICAN CONSOLIDATED LAND AND TRADING COMPANY.*

Company—Directors—Appointment—Validity—Trivial Irregularities.

This was an appeal against an order made by Mr. Justice Ridley (acting as Vacation Judge) restraining the defendant company, and the three other defendants, Thomas Thompson, A. B. Nielsen, and E. G. Sanders, until judgment in the action or further order, from forfeiting, or declaring forfeited, all or any portion of the shares held by the plaintiff and the other shareholders in the company, and from selling, or allotting, or otherwise disposing of, such shares, or any of them, and from taking or continuing proceedings to recover the amount of an alleged call of 3s. on each share which had been made, or alleged to have been made, by the defendants Thompson, Nielsen, and Sanders, and from parting with any proceeds of the call money in their hands, or to be received under the call. It was alleged that the resolution making the call, which purported to be a resolution of the directors, was invalid, because the defendant Nielsen, who had been a director, had ceased to be such by reason of his having for a short period lost his qualification. There were only three directors—viz., the defendants Thompson, Nielsen, and Sanders. Nielsen had originally held the number of shares required by the articles as the qualification of a director, but for a short period—from the 17th to the 23rd June, 1897—he had ceased to hold any shares, and had been off the register of shareholders, and he had never been formally re-elected after he had regained his qualification. An objection was also raised to the defendant Thompson, on the ground that he was an undischarged bankrupt at the time of his appointment, and it was said that he, therefore, vacated his directorship immediately on his appointment. The articles of association contained the following clauses:—By clause 41, shares might, for non-payment of calls after notice, "be forfeited by a resolution of the directors to that effect." Clause 90.—"The number of the directors shall not be less than three, nor more than seven." Clause 93.—"No person, other than the first directors, shall be qualified to be a director who is not the holder of shares of the company of the nominal value of £200." Clause 96.—"The office of a director shall be vacated (inter alia) if he become bankrupt, or suspend payment, or compound with his creditors . . . or if he cease to hold the required amount of shares to qualify him for office." Clause 105.—"Until otherwise determined two directors shall be a quorum." Clause 114.—"All acts done at any meeting of the directors, or of a committee of directors, or by any person acting as a director, shall, notwithstanding that it shall be afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such directors or persons acting as aforesaid, or that they, or any of them, were disqualified, be as valid as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director."

Mr. Alexander, Q.C., and Mr. W. Higgins were for the defendants, the appellants; Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the plaintiffs.

THE COURT allowed the appeal.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS said that the ground of the application to the Court was that there were several irregularities in the appointment of the directors who made the call. The suggestion was of nothing more nor less than some small irregularities; there was no radical defect in the appointment. Take one instance. Thompson was appointed to fill a casual vacancy, which the directors had power under the articles to fill up. At a subsequent meeting of the shareholders Thompson retired and was re-elected. It was said that the shareholders did not know that he was an undischarged bankrupt. But his Lordship thought it was perfectly competent to the shareholders to elect him, notwithstanding that fact. Then, as to the defendant Nielsen ; for five days he had no shares in the company. He then re-acquired the necessary number of shares, and on June 24 he was present at a meeting of the directors, and acted as a director. There was a casual vacancy which the directors had power to fill up. They did not pass a formal resolution reappointing Nielsen, but they accepted him as a director. The objections were very trivial, and without a shadow of substance in them. It would be reducing clause 114 to a nullity to say that it did not apply to such trivial irregularities and trumpery defects as this. It was said that the case of "The Howbeach Coal Company v. Teague" (5 H. and N., 151) showed that such a protecting clause applied only in favour of strangers, and not as between the company and its shareholders. Nothing of that kind was to be found in the judgments in that case. There the Court held that the validating clause did not cure a radical defect in the appointment of directors. That was the foundation of the judgment, and the case was no authority for the proposition that clause 114 did not apply as between the company and the shareholders. His Lordship could see no reason for thus cutting down the meaning of the clause. Another point taken by the plaintiffs, which might be a serious matter, was that the call on the shares was made for an improper purpose—not for the benefit of the company, but with the object of repaying persons who had paid off the promoters. There was no evidence to support such a case ; it was a mere suggestion as to which the Court had nothing to rely upon. The appeal must be allowed, with costs in both Courts.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY agreed. He would say one word about clause 114. That clause was not so framed as to render valid (as had been suggested in argument) any resolution passed by any persons whatever who were assuming to act as directors of the company—e.g., three strangers—who came into the board-room and said, we are the directors. The clause was addressed, as the language showed, to defects in the appointment of directors. And there was no evidence to show that the two other directors knew that Nielsen had parted with all his shares. There could be no question that if the defect had been pointed out they would have reappointed him a director. There was no defect in his original appointment, but he had become disqualified. There had been a loss of his qualification subsequently to his appointment. This was just one of the irregularities or defects at which clause 114 was aimed. And there was no distinction, as suggested, between the case of outsiders and the case of the company as against the shareholders. In "The Howbeach Coal Company v. Teague" it was quite clear that the persons who were professing to act as directors had not been well appointed, and it was quite open to say that their appointment was so radically bad that it was not within the protection of the validating clause. As to the point that the call was made for a fraudulent or improper purpose, the simple answer was that the evidence did not prove in any material degree the case which was shadowed out. His Lordship would reserve for future consideration the point (which did not really arise now) whether on such materials shareholders could sue for the rescission of the company's contract.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS entirely agreed. He only wished to add that it was not necessary to decide what was the true meaning of the words "shall be afterwards discovered" in clause 114, for there was no evidence that at the time of the passing of the resolution the directors knew of the irregularity.

COOK V. WILLIAMS.*

Contract—Offer and acceptance—Withdrawal—Specific performance refused.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (13 The Times L.R., 481), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's, reported 13 The Times L.R., 481. The action was brought by Mr. John Mason Cook, the well-known tourists' agent, claiming specific performance of a contract, alleged to have been constituted by letters and telegrams, for the sale to him of the mansion and estate called Mount Felix, at Walton-on-Thames. The principal defendants to the action were the five daughters of the late Lady Watkin (the wife of Sir Edward Watkin) by her first husband, the late Mr. Herbert Ingram, formerly M.P. for Boston, and proprietor of the Illustrated London News. A sixth defendant was Mr. Osman Frederick Giddy, who carries on the business of estate agents in Pall-mall under the style of "Giddy and Giddy." The property in question belonged to the late Lady Watkin, and on her death, which occurred on May 26, 1896, the beneficial interest in it passed under her will or testamentary appointment to the defendants, her five daughters, for their separate use in equal shares. On May 31, 1896, shortly after Lady Watkin's death, the property was placed in the hands of Giddy and Giddy for sale on behalf of the intended executor, who had not yet been appointed, and on June 1 Giddy and Giddy wrote to the plaintiff, who was a client of theirs, informing him that the property was in the market. Subsequently telegrams and letters passed between the several parties containing negotiations for the purchase of the property by the plaintiff. In one of these letters, dated June 11, from Giddy and Giddy to the plaintiff, Giddy and Giddy said that, "although we can agree price now, we cannot make a formal contract until the executors are appointed and will proved." Ultimately, on June 23, Giddy and Giddy sent the plaintiff a telegram to the effect that they could "close for £21,250, subject to more formal contract," which would at once be prepared by the ladies' solicitors, and requesting him to send a cheque for the deposit. In reply to that telegram the plaintiff on the same day wrote to Giddy and Giddy that he was "willing to close at £21,250," and enclosed a cheque for the deposit. Giddy and Giddy thereupon informed the ladies by letter of the plaintiff's acceptance of the offer. A formal agreement was then prepared, but ultimately the ladies declined to execute it, and accordingly, on October 10, 1896, the plaintiff issued the writ in this action against the five ladies and Mr. Giddy as defendants. He claimed specific performance and damages against the first five defendants and, as against Mr. Giddy, the return of the deposit and damages for misrepresentation if it should appear that he had no authority to enter into the alleged contract. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that there was no contract in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Beddall for two of the sisters ; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Mark L. Romer for the other three sisters ; and Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Allen for Mr. Giddy, the other defendant.

After having heard Mr. JENKINS, Q.C., at length for the appellant,

Their LORDSHIPS confirmed the judgment of the Court below without calling on counsel for the defendant.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that there was no authority to make a complete contract, and Mr. Giddy had never represented that he had authority. In the very first letter he had himself stated that he had authority only to settle the price; the price had been settled; that was only one term of the contract, and the other terms had never been determined.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY gave judgment to the same effect. He observed that the old fallacy that there could be an enforceable agreement to make an agreement seemed at the bottom of part of the argument.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

LOCKE-KING V. THE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL OF WOKING.*

Highway—Extent of—Fences—Prima facie presumption.

Where a highway runs between fences, one on each side, the right of passage which the public have along it extends prima facie, and unless there be evidence to the contrary, over the whole space between the fences.

This was an action by a landowner in Woking, Surrey, raising the question whether certain strips of land adjoining his property and bordering a highway in Woking called Goldsworth-road belonged to him or to the defendants, the Urban District Council, as part of the highway. The road, or highway, including the strips, was bounded on each side by a hedge in the usual way, and it was proved that the public had habitually used and made tracks over the strips without interference. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled to enclose the strips as being his property under a conveyance to his predecessor in title, whereas the defendants counter-claimed a declaration that the strips formed part of the highway. On Monday last his Lordship went down to view the locus in quo in the presence of the representatives of both parties.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. E. M. Bray for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, in the course of an exhaustive judgment, adverted to his having had the inestimable advantage of a view, which had put him in possession of the points in the plaintiff's case; and without presumption he might say he was then able to forecast within fair limits the answer proposed to be given by the defendants. He confessed he then formed a strong opinion which neither the evidence nor the arguments had been able to displace. It seemed to him as he looked at the roads, and the strips and hedges bounding them, that the case fell within the class of cases of which one that had been cited—"Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company" (31 L.J., M.C., 186)—was as good an illustration as could be found. The answer through the eye of the mind was an obvious one. These strips were remarkably irregular; sometimes they were of considerable width, and sometimes they ran to a point; and the boundary hedges were themselves not very regular in shape. The conclusion he had arrived at he would take from the judgment of Mr. Justice Crompton, in the case already referred to, which was heard before the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Crompton, and Mr. Justice Blackburn. The learned Judge said this:—"Taken altogether, I think it comes to this, that, prima facie, when you come to look at the highway running between fences, unless there is something to show the contrary, the public have a right to the whole, and are not confined to the metalled part of it." Was there anything "to show the contrary" in the present case? A great deal of the evidence appeared to him to be of no practical value at all; he believed there was no real question of fact in dispute between the parties, and there was no evidence that the case came within any of the exceptions mentioned by Mr. Justice Crompton in the case referred to. There was no rock or other obstruction which made any of the spaces impassable, or prevented them from being used by the public, nor anything to prevent the application of the presumption of law to which he had referred. It was said that the strips of land had been conveyed to the plaintiff's predecessor in title, but if they formed part of the highway, there could be no interference with the exercise by the defendants of their statutory power to maintain them as part of the highway for the benefit of the public. Then it was said that the strips formed part of the waste of the manor of Woking, and that the rule of law already cited would not apply to such a case. It might be assumed that if they were proved to be part of the waste the rule of law would not apply. But there was no sufficient evidence that they ever were part of the waste; the evidence on the point was extremely slight. Then descriptions in Acts of Parliament had been relied upon, but it could not be seriously argued that because an Act may have described the strips as part of the Manor of Woking, therefore that was so. If they were not in fact part of the waste, what was the value of the description in an Act? After referring to further points, including the circumstance that there were definite public tracks across the strips, his Lordship said he based his conclusion entirely upon the direct application of the rule as laid down by Mr. Justice Crompton. He would, therefore, make a declaration that the strips of land in question claimed by the plaintiff formed part of the highway known as Goldsworth-road, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of the action and counterclaim.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. TEDDINGTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 175—Power to purchase lands—Sale of "lands not required for the purpose for which they were acquired."

This was an action against the Teddington local authorities, at the relation of Mr. James Powell, a resident in the defendants' district, to compel the defendants to sell a piece of land which adjoined the plaintiff's property, on the ground that it was no longer needed for the purpose for which it had been bought—viz., the disposal of sewage. The land in question formed part of a piece of land consisting of some 26 acres, which had been acquired in the year 1887, with the sanction of the Local Government Board, under the

*Reported by G. I. FOSTER COOKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Public Health Act, 1875, for the purpose of permanent sewage works, and most of which had been used for the erection of tanks and machinery and for filtration beds for the purpose of the reception and disposal of sewage. About 2½ acres of the land had been sold as not being required for sewerage purposes—in accordance with section 175 of the Public Health Act—but another part had been utilized by the defendants as a place of deposit for refuse collected from dustbins, to receive which trenches had been dug to the gravel surface and drawn to the level of the sub-soil. A mound had also been raised. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had also entertained a scheme for turning another part of the unused land into a public recreation ground, with a lake, bathing-place, and promenade, and had constructed a temporary footpath over the land. The plaintiff alleged that the pieces of unsold land were, in the words of section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, “not required for the purpose for which they were acquired”—viz., the reception and disposal of sewage, and submitted that they should be ordered to sell the same in accordance with the section. The defendants alleged that their mode of using this land was not permanent, but merely temporary, and not such as to prevent the land from being used hereafter for sewage purposes; and, moreover, that having regard to the rapid increase of Teddington in extent and in population, and to the necessity of having reserve land available for these purposes, the land was, in truth, still needed for the purpose for which it had been acquired. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the land in question, in all some eight acres, was not required for the purpose for which it had been acquired under the Act of 1875, an order directing its sale under section 175, and an injunction restraining the defendants from appropriating or using any portion as a site for a public promenade or recreation ground, or for ornamental water, or for a footpath, or for the purpose of the deposit of house refuse, or for any purpose other than that of the reception and disposal of sewage.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. F. R. Y. Radcliffe appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. E. Lewis Thomas for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said that the first question which he had to consider was whether any part of the land acquired by the defendants for the sewage purposes was no longer required for those purposes. Bearing in mind the rapid growth of the defendants' district and its rapidly increasing population, he found that all the land should be kept and would be ultimately required for sewage purposes only; or, in other words, that section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, did not apply to any portion of the land. No doubt at the time when the land was purchased with the sanction of the Local Government Board it was contemplated as shown by the plan, that part of the land purchased would not be required for sewage purposes. But circumstances had changed, and if he were to hold that the portions contemplated at the date of the purchase as not being then required to be retained for sewage purposes were on that account never to be so used at all he failed to see what right the local authority had to acquire the land at all. In his view the local authority did acquire the whole of the land for sewage purposes, and they were not conclusively bound to sell the land marked on the plan as not required if circumstances changed and it was found that they did require it. Apparently they had now changed their minds, and, in his opinion, they had come to a wise conclusion, and the land was required for sewage purposes. No doubt the council, until very recently, had thought that the whole of the land would not be required, and if they had committed themselves irrevocably to the position that part was not required perhaps section 175 would have applied. He had considerable doubt on the point, but he should give the council the benefit of the doubt; but he thought they were not precluded from saying that the whole land was required, and they were entitled to retain it. Undoubtedly what they had done had misled the plaintiff; and his Lordship would remember that when he came to deal with the question of costs. The next question which arose was whether the defendants had dealt with any part of the land so that it could not be used for sewage purposes. The only parts which that referred to were those on which the trench and mound had been made. Although he thought these works were improper, yet, at the same time, they did not make the land on which they were wholly unfit for sewage purposes. The plaintiff was not, therefore, entitled to any declaration that any portion of the land should be sold. A further question arose. The plaintiff or relator said that the defendants had dealt with parts of the land improperly, and ought to be restrained. With the exception of the mound and trench, nothing had been done of a permanent character. They had made a footpath and put a few benches, and contemplated using parts of the land as a temporary park, and these things only referred to parts not immediately required for sewage purposes. The plaintiff, however, argued that even such temporary use was not permissible, and claimed an injunction. He thought it right to state shortly his views with reference to the interim user of the land not required for sewage purposes. He agreed that the defendants could not apply the land to or use it for any purpose inconsistent with the purposes for which it was acquired. But those purposes did not require the immediate user of every part of the land for sewage purposes. Some part only was required for immediate sewage works, and the remaining part had to be retained because needed hereafter for such works. Pending the actual application of this remaining part for such purposes the defendants could retain it, and one of the purposes for which it was required might be said to be such retainer. But, of course, while so retaining it, they could not use it or deal with it in such a way as to prevent user for sewage purposes or substantially interfere with its immediate user whenever it was needed for these purposes. But, subject to such exception, while retaining the land, his Lordship did not see how it was inconsistent with the purpose for which they had acquired it to use it in any lawful manner in which in its then condition it could be used, provided that such user did not substantially interfere with the main purpose of drainage for which the land was ultimately wanted, and he knew of nothing which made it unlawful for a council such as these defendants from permitting vacant land in their possession, and not at the time required for the ultimate purpose for which they had acquired it, to be temporarily used as a recreation-ground, provided care was taken to prevent any rights from being acquired over it by the public or otherwise which would prevent or interfere with the council's using the land for its ultimate purpose whenever required. The case of “Attorney-General v. Corporation of Southampton” ([1853] 1 Giff., 363) did not interfere with that view. There the land had to be held by certain trustees substantially for purposes of recreation, and it was held that these trustees could not use it even temporarily for purposes of a fair or for the sale of cattle, because the land could not be used for the purposes of the trust except for recreation, and it was just as much a breach of trust to use it temporarily as permanently. Nor was the judgment of Lord Justice Cotton in “Bayley v. Great Western Railway Company” ([1884] L.R. 26, Ch.D., 450) inconsistent. It might also be added that he had nothing to do in the present case with the misapplication of ratepayers' money. He was only concerned with the lawful user of the land. With regard to the works proposed by the defendants to be put on the land—namely, campshedding, making up the frontage, making a lake and, above all, a bathing-place—when the correspondence was looked at, and all the facts, his Lordship thought that the defendants had contemplated using parts of the land not for sewage purposes, nor for justifiable interim purposes. The defendants now asserted that they had no intention of doing anything which would prevent them from properly using the land for its ultimate purposes. He accepted that statement. The mound and trench were, however, most injurious to the proper user of the land for sewage purposes, and were inconsistent with such user. As he understood that the defendants would give an undertaking not to use the land for such inconsistent purposes, he made no order except that, on the defendants' undertaking not to use the land for dustbin refuse, the defendants should pay the costs of the action.

COONEY V. EDEVEAIN.*

Defamation—Libel—Fair comment, what is—Question for jury.

This was an application for judgment or a new trial in an action brought by Mrs. Charlotte Cooney, professionally known as Miss Lottie Collins, against the proprietor of a weekly periodical called Society to recover damages for an alleged libel published in the issue of his paper of December 5, 1896. The trial was reported in The Times of July 17. The defence was that the words complained of were fair comment on a matter of public interest. At the time of the publication of the alleged libel the plaintiff was engaged at the Palace Theatre, where she sang two songs called "The Little Widow" and "The girl on the Ran-dan-dan." On December 5, 1896, the alleged libel appeared as a paragraph in Society, and ran as follows:—"At the Palace Theatre, Morton Console, there is quite the best variety entertainment in London, the sort of show, I mean, to which a man can with impunity take his maiden aunt. There is nothing coarse about it anywhere, and the only touch of vulgarity is supplied by Miss Lottie Collins, who successfully reproduces in two of her songs, at least, the methods, far from pleasing, of the age which to its eternal sorrow used to applaud such monstrosities as the 'Lion Comique,' now happily very nearly dead. One of her songs, 'The Little Widow'—no connexion, I am happy to say, of our very own sweet lady—is written in gross bad taste, which is not redeemed even by the singer's surprising agility and rose red petticoats. To my mind, Miss Collins has never done anything so well since 'Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay.' " The action was tried before Mr. Justice Hawkins and a special jury, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £25. The defendant applied for judgment or a new trial.

Mr. JELF, Q.C. (Mr. E. U. Bullen with him), appeared for the defendant, and, after reading the above paragraph, said that the plaintiff at the trial admitted that the hit of the song, "The Little Widow," was that a lady appeared in very deep mourning and bemoaned the loss of her first and second husbands, and then suddenly began dancing, when the sadness passed away and gave place to gaiety, and she showed a red petticoat beneath her black dress. Some people might consider that vulgar. No jury could find that this was not fair comment, and the learned Judge ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury. Fair comment was no libel, and therefore it came within the rule that it was for the Judge to say whether the publication complained of was or was not capable of being a libel. The learned counsel then read the two songs, and said that half the people in the world might say that there was vulgarity in those songs, taken in connexion with all the circumstances, though probably the other half would say that there was no vulgarity. If this sort of criticism was not allowed then criticism might as well cease altogether. He referred to "Merivale v. Carson" (20 Q.B.D., 275).

Mr. E. U. BULLEN followed on the same side.

Mr. H. Kisch, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, the application must be refused. This was an action for libel, and the question was whether the defendant had published a libel or not. The jury found for the plaintiff, damages £25. He would like, first of all, to state his opinion as to the law applicable to the case. A plaintiff went into Court and produced a document which he alleged to be libellous, and proved the publication by the defendant. If the document was incapable of being a libel the Judge should withdraw the case from the jury. In such a case the document could not in any view of it be a libel. But if the document was capable of being a libel no Judge in the kingdom could nonsuit the plaintiff. If the document was capable of being a libel, then the question whether it was or was not fair comment was, as a general rule, one for the jury. Was the document in this case capable of being a libel? In his opinion it was. The case was therefore properly left to the jury. Then, when the jury came to consider whether the document was or was not a libel, they might take into consideration whether it was fair comment. He could not say that the jury were wrong in this case.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that fair comment was no libel, and there might possibly be cases, though he did not wish to decide the point and expressed no opinion upon it, in which it might be the duty of a Judge to withdraw the case from the jury. But this was not one of those cases.

Mandamus—Prerogative writ—Application refused on the ground that an action for a mandamus could be brought.

In this case the HON. ALFRED LYTTELTON moved, on behalf of Mr. Page and another, the trustees of the will of Mr. John Martin, for a rule nisi for a mandamus to Lord Bateman and the steward of the manor of Kingsland, in the county of Hereford, to compel them to admit the applicants to the holding in the manor formerly held by the late Mr. Martin. The late Mr. Martin carried on the business of farmer in partnership with his brother, and had only a partnership interest in the stock and chattels of the business. One of the incidents of the copyhold property was a heriot. In respect of them a question was raised by the lord of the manor, who refused to admit the applicants to a portion of the property except on the payment of 20 guineas in lieu of a heriot. The solicitor of the applicants wrote formally demanding admittance, and offering to hand over any article of the testator's wearing apparel which the lord of the manor might select. This was refused. Hence the present application. Mr. Lyttelton said it was an important question of law whether in the total absence of custom a lord of the manor could compel an applicant to pay money instead of a heriot. The only heriot possible in this case was clothing, because the stock and business chattels were not the sole property of the deceased, and he had no jewels.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT interposed, and suggested that this was not the proper case for a prerogative writ of mandamus, and referred to a case in which it was decided that, since an action for a mandamus could be brought, the prerogative writ should only be granted in cases of public concern. It was of great importance to keep the practice regular, and not to grant a writ unless there was a strong balance of convenience in its favour.

MR. LYTTLETON argued that this process was a much more convenient method than an action for a mandamus. The point was so short and the facts so simple that an action was not really necessary.

The COURT, however, refused the application.

MAYOR, &C., OF THETFORD V. NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Local Government—County Council—Expenses of Quarter Sessions—Local Government Act, 1888, sec. 84.

This was an action brought by the Corporation of Thetford against the Norfolk County Council for money paid by the corporation for the council.

Mr. Crump, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs appeared for the plaintiffs: Mr. Channell, Q.C., and Mr. W. Wills were counsel for the defendants.

The question was whether the obligation to pay the costs and expenses of the quarter and petty sessions of the borough of Thetford, including the salary of the Recorder and the fees of the clerk of the peace and the salary of the clerk to the borough justices, together with the expenses incurred in the necessary attendance, warming, cleaning, and lighting of the Guildhall and retiring rooms when used for the purposes of the quarter and petty sessions, was transferred from the plaintiffs to the defendants by the Local Government Act, 1888. The action was tried on the 26th ult., when judgment was reserved.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS, in giving judgment, said that Thetford was a borough of less than 10,000 inhabitants. Section 38 of the Local Government Act, 1888, dealt with boroughs of less than 10,000 inhabitants. Up to the passing of that Act the salaries of the Recorder and of the clerk of the peace fell on the borough, and they must still be paid by the borough unless there was something in this Act transferring them to the county council. He could not find anything in the Act that either expressly or by implication effected such a transfer. It was said that this involved a hardship, but the borough could petition her Majesty to revoke the grant of quarter sessions on the ground that they were unnecessary. The only difficulty was the case of " Ex parte the County Council of Kent and Council of Sandwich " ([1891] 1 Q.B. 390), but that case could not have been exhaustively argued, and was founded on the mistaken supposition that the clause in section 35, which expressly provided for the payment of the cost of quarter sessions in boroughs of over 10,000 inhabitants, was also to be found in section 38. It was suggested in that case that section 169 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, was repealed, but the alteration really applied only to the larger boroughs. There remained the question of the salary of the clerk to the justices in petty sessions. This was dealt with by section 84 of the Act—a section which had been considered in " In re the County Council of Herefordshire and the Council of Leominster " ([1895] 1 Q.B. 43), where it had been decided that the salary of the clerk to the justices in petty sessions now fell on the county council. The judgment would be a declaration that, so far as regarded the salaries of the Recorder and the clerk of the peace, the borough of Thetford was liable, but as regarded the salary of the petty sessions clerk the county council was liable, and there would be judgment for the plaintiffs for such portion of the arrears of his salary as could be recovered consistently with section 68, sub-section 9, of the Act—namely, such a sum as was in arrear at the time the action was brought, limited to six months before that time. With respect to the claim for the salary of clerk to the visitors and magistrates as regarded lunacy matters, that was expressly cast upon the borough by sections 177 and 178 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. The other items of expenditure on quarter sessions were also payable by the borough. The costs of each of the issues would follow the event.

Bill of Exchange—Notice of dishonour—Time—Principal and agent—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 49, subsec. 12 (b).

This was an application for judgment in an action tried before Mr. Justice Ridley and a jury or for a new trial. The action was brought by endorsees of a bill of exchange for £120. The defendants were the drawer, the acceptor, and an endorser. The defendant, who was sued as endorser, Mrs. Laura Emma Edwards, pleaded that she had not received due notice of dishonour. The bill was payable at the National Provincial Bank of England, and it was presented there for payment on Saturday, November 10, 1894, by the London and Westminster Bank, as agents for the County of Gloucester Bank. The plaintiffs kept their banking account at the Cardiff branch of the County of Gloucester Bank, from which branch the bill had been sent to the London and Westminster Bank. The bill having been dishonoured on presentation, the London and Westminster Bank on Monday, November 12, gave notice of its dishonour by returning it to the County of Gloucester Bank, but by inadvertence they addressed their letter to the Cirencester branch of that bank instead of the Cardiff branch. Early on the next morning, November 13, having discovered their mistake, they sent a telegram to the Cardiff branch of the County of Gloucester Bank giving notice of the dishonour of the bill. Subsequently notice of dishonour was given by the plaintiffs to the defendant, Mrs. Edwards, but her case was that the London and Westminster Bank had not given notice to their principals in accordance with the requirements of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. By section 49, subsection 12, of that Act—"The notice may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured, and must be given within a reasonable time thereafter. In the absence of special circumstances notice is not deemed to have been given within a reasonable time, unless . . . (b) where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in different places, the notice is sent off on the day after the dishonour of the bill, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day, and if there be no such post on that day then by the next post thereafter." By subsection 13—"Where a bill when dishonoured is in the hands of an agent, he may either himself give notice to the parties liable on the bill, or he may give notice to his principal. If he give notice to his principal, he must do so within the same time as if he were the holder, and the principal upon receipt of such notice has himself the same time for giving notice as if the agent had been an independent holder." Mr. Justice Ridley at the trial gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Woodfin appeared for the defendant; Mr. Ashton Cross and Mr. Edmondson for the plaintiffs.

The COURT (Lord Justice Collins dissenting) dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the defendant's contention was that there was a blot in the plaintiffs' case, in that the London and Westminster Bank had not given due notice of dishonour to their principals on November 12 as required by the statute. They did give notice on that day to the right persons, but they directed it to them at a wrong address. On the next morning they rectified this error by sending a telegram to the right address. He thought that he could not disjoin these two acts, but ought to treat them as one continuing act, and in his opinion the requirements of the statute had been satisfied. He therefore agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Ridley.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. A notice of dishonour need not be in any particular form, and in his opinion the matter ought to be treated as one of substance. If the Act had said that the address was to be an essential part of the notice, different considerations would arise. But in his opinion the question was whether the notice came to the knowledge of the person to whom it was addressed in proper time. If the putting of a wrong address did not prevent the notice from arriving in proper time he could not say there had been a failure to comply with the Act. Here the notice was received in proper time.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said it was with great diffidence that he differed from his learned brethren. But the point on which he differed was this, whether different branches of a bank ought to be treated as one and the same person or as different persons for the purpose of receiving notices of dishonour of bills of exchange. He thought they ought to be treated as different persons. In his opinion the only principals of the London and Westminster Bank were the Cardiff branch of the County of Gloucester Bank, and when the London and Westminster Bank sent notice to the Cirencester branch they sent notice to persons who were not their principals. He therefore could not see that they had satisfied the obligation imposed on them by subsection 12 (b) of section 49. It was said that their error was cured by the telegram on the next day. But that telegram clearly was not a good notice in itself, in accordance with the statute, and in his judgment it could not be used to supplement the wrong notice.

RALEIGH V. GOSCHEN.*

Trespass—Crown—Prerogative.

Action against Lords of the Admiralty as an official body held not maintainable.

In this case, recently reported in The Times (see The Times of November 5, 1897), judgment was delivered today. The action was brought (in the words of par. 1 of the statement of claim) for the purpose of establishing, as against the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Director-General of Naval Works, that they were not entitled to enter upon, or take possession of, or to acquire by way of compulsory purchase, certain land, the property of the plaintiffs, in the neighbourhood of Dartmouth, for the purpose of establishing there a training college for cadets. The plaintiffs allege (par. 12 of the statement of claim) that the defendants had entered upon a portion of the estate and had placed certain stakes thereon, with a view to the acquisition of the site for the training college, and (par. 17) that the defendants had, by their servants and agents, wrongfully entered upon the property, and surveyed and staked out the site, and threatened and intended to take possession, and they alleged that the defendants contended that they had statutory powers of compulsory acquisition, which they threatened and intended forthwith to exercise, and (par. 18) that they, the plaintiffs, were advised that the defendants had no right, either by statute or otherwise, to enter on the land, &c., or to acquire it by compulsory purchase. The defendants admitted that the site had been surveyed and marked out, but denied that they or any of them had done the acts complained of, and they alleged that what had been done had been duly performed by the officers of the Lords of the Admiralty acting by the direction of the Executive Government under the Crown. They submitted that the Lords of the Admiralty were entitled to exercise by statute compulsory powers. They, however, made a further and preliminary submission—namely, that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action for tort against Ministers of the Crown sued in that capacity. The plaintiffs asked leave to amend, if necessary, by also suing the defendants individually, and by adding as parties two marines and a civil engineer who had staked out the site.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), Mr. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C., and Mr. INGLE JOYCE, for the defendants, submitted that the action was not maintainable, and that leave to amend should be refused.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. S. Dickinson appeared for the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said:—I have already stated some general principles of law which, in my opinion, are applicable to cases like the present. I will apply those principles and point out shortly what kind of action the plaintiffs might have maintained and what kind they were not entitled to bring against the present defendants in respect of the matters referred to in the statement of claim. The plaintiffs are complaining of an alleged trespass said to have been committed on their land, for which they claim damages, and they ask for an injunction to restrain further trespass on the land, which they say is threatened. Now, in the first place, inasmuch as the plaintiffs could not sue the Crown for a past or threatened trespass, they could not in respect of any trespass sue the defendants in the capacity of agents for or as representing the Crown. Again, the plaintiffs could not sue the defendants merely on the footing that, as representing a branch of the Executive Government, the defendants were responsible for a trespass committed or threatened by some officials or persons in the employment or under the control of the Government or of the Admiralty as a department of the Government, even though those officials or persons purported to act on behalf of or as representing the Crown or the Government or the Admiralty. And further, even if some of the defendants, acting on behalf of the Crown or of the Government or of the Admiralty, had committed or threatened a trespass, that would not justify the plaintiffs in suing the other defendants, if they had taken no part in the transaction. On the other hand, the plaintiffs could sue any persons actually committing or threatening the trespass, even though those persons only acted on behalf or by the authority of the Government or of the defendants as representing the Admiralty. Moreover, I do not think the rights of the plaintiffs would of necessity be confined to an action against those actually committing the trespass, who might be some very humble persons. If a trespass was committed by those persons by the order or direction of some higher officials, so as in substance to have been the act of those higher officials, then the latter could be sued. For example, suppose the captain of a ship unlawfully to have ordered some of his sailors to take possession of a house and they obeyed his order, he could be sued for the trespass, even though he himself remained on board his ship and did not personally go into the house. So if any of the defendants had themselves ordered or directed the alleged trespass now complained of by the plaintiffs, and it was in consequence of such order or direction that the alleged trespass took place, or if any of the defendants threatened to order or direct further trespass, then they could be sued. But in this case they could be sued not because but in despite of the fact that they occupied official positions or acted as officials. In other words, to sum up shortly the result of the above by the use of convenient phraseology, the plaintiffs in respect of the matters they are now complaining of could sue any of the defendants individually for trespasses committed or threatened by them, but they could not sue the defendants officially or as an official body. The question then before me narrows itself down to this, Is the present action one against the defendants as an official body, or is it an action against them as individuals? And in dealing with this question I ought also to consider the summons to amend issued on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the affidavits filed in support of that summons. Now, on the facts before me, and dealing fairly with the writ and statement of claim, the conclusion I come to is, that the present action was intended to be and is a claim against the defendants in their official capacity, and not as individuals. They are described and sued, except as regards the defendant Major Raban, as the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and he is described and sued as the Director-General of Naval Works. Throughout the statement of claim no distinction is drawn between them, and no act, order, direction, or threat by any of them individually is alleged. Paragraph 1 of the statement of claim sets forth the general nature of the plaintiffs' case, and shows that what the plaintiffs wish to do is to have some general questions decided as between them and the defendants as representing the Admiralty. The correspondence referred to in the statement of claim is with the Admiralty, or with certain officials in an official capacity only. Then so far as regards trespasses alleged to have been actually committed or threatened, the only material paragraphs are those numbered 12 and 17. Paragraph 12 alleges that the defendants had entered upon some portion of the plaintiffs' estate and placed stakes there. Now it was admitted before me on behalf of the plaintiffs that it was not suggested or intended to be suggested that the defendants themselves had done this. The paragraph shows that, in this action, when an act of the defendants is referred to what is meant and intended to be alleged is the act of the defendants treated as an official body—that is to say, as a body representing the Crown or Government or as responsible for the acts of all officials or persons acting or purporting to act on behalf of the Crown or of the Government or of the Admiralty. Then all that is contained in paragraph 17 is a general allegation that the defendants by their servants and agents have trespassed and threatened to trespass again. That is to say again, as I understand it, acts alleged against them as an official body on the footing above mentioned. But any possible doubt as to what kind of action this is appears to me to be set at rest by the plaintiffs' summons to amend their writ and subsequent proceedings, and the affidavits filed in support of that summons. The affidavits state that the alleged trespass was committed by two marines acting under the directions of Mr. Shortridge, a civil engineer employed in her Majesty's dockyard at Devonport. Those affidavits do not allege any personal participation in the alleged trespass or any threat of future trespass by, or by the order or direction of, any of the defendants. Then the summons asks for leave to amend the action by suing the defendants in their individual as well as in their official capacity, and by adding the two marines and Mr. Shortridge as co-defendants. In other words, the summons proceeds on the footing that the present action is one against the present defendants in their official capacity only, and I think the plaintiffs' own view as to their action is the correct one. It follows that in my opinion the present action as it stands is misconceived and will not lie, and the only further question I have to consider is whether I ought to give the plaintiffs leave to amend as asked by them. On consideration, I think I ought not. For what the plaintiffs are seeking to do is to change one action into another of a substantially different character. Apart from the fact that the present action cannot be sustained, while the other might lie, an action against the defendants in their official capacity, supposing it to lie, would differ in most material respects from an action against them as individuals, as will be seen when consideration is paid to questions of discovery, and to the form of any interlocutory injunction or final judgment that could be obtained by the plaintiffs, and as to how and against whom such injunction or judgment could be enforced. Moreover, as pointed out above, the affidavits in support of the summons to amend do not venture to allege any claim against any of the defendants individually. For these reasons I think I ought not to allow leave to amend as asked. If the plaintiffs have in fact any claim against any of the present defendants individually, that claim will be more properly and conveniently enforced in a separate action. At the same time I will take care to provide by my order that the dismissal of the present action shall not prejudice any just claim the plaintiffs may have. I therefore order the present action to be dismissed with costs, without prejudice to any claim the plaintiffs may have against the two marines or Mr. Shortridge or against any of the defendants individually in respect of any trespass committed or threatened. The costs of the summons and of any pending interlocutory application will be costs in the action.

Leave to appeal was asked by the plaintiffs and given.

THOMAS V. LONDON SEWING MACHINE COMPANY.*

Penalty—Liquidated damages—Breach of contract—Wrongful dismissal.

This was an action tried before Mr. Justice Mathew and a special jury on November 11, 1897. A report appeared in The Times of November 12. The plaintiff claimed damages for wrongful dismissal, or in the alternative £1,000 under the terms of the agreement under which the plaintiff was employed by the defendants. The agreement, which was dated May 13, 1896, provided that "if at any time during the said term the company shall by notice determine the agreement and the engagement hereby created without assigning any reason the company shall thereupon pay to the said Thomas, by way of compensation and in full discharge of his rights and claims, the sum of £1,000." The jury found that the plaintiff was not properly dismissed either because he was unfaithful to his employers or because he was incompetent. The question of damages was not left to them. The defendants contended that the sum mentioned in the agreement was in the nature of a penalty and not recoverable at law. This question now came on for argument on further consideration.

Mr. S. Lynch and Mr. Bennett Calvert appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Kemp, Q.C., and Mr. S. O. Buckmaster for the defendants.

Mr. KEMP, Q.C., relied on the words "without assigning any reason." The defendants assigned a reason.

Mr. JUSTICE MATHEW, without calling on counsel for the plaintiff, said that the jury found the defendants' reason to be a bad one, which was equivalent to saying it was no reason. In any case he, the learned Judge, would have had great difficulty, in view of the terms of the agreement, in assessing the damages at any other sum than £1,000. The verdict must therefore stand and judgment be entered for the plaintiff for £1,000.

Nov. 13.THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD V. R.
HUNTER CRAIG AND CO.*Shipping—Port dues on goods—Upper Mersey Dues Act, 1860—Construction.

This was a claim by the plaintiffs for £1 5s., being town dues at the rate of 8d. per ton on 37½ tons of flour alleged to have been imported into the port of Liverpool by the defendants and landed at the Duke's Dock in the said port in the following circumstances:—The flour in question formed part of the cargo of the ship Oliva, which was a general ship carrying goods to Manchester, and was brought from Fiume, a place beyond seas, under a bill of lading in which the ship was described as "bound for Liverpool, via Manchester." The vessel proceeded to Liverpool by the Manchester Ship Canal, and the whole cargo, including the flour, was discharged and landed at Manchester. The flour was subsequently carried in lighters by the Manchester Ship Canal and across the River Mersey and into the Duke's Dock, and there landed in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading. In accordance with the usual practice of the Customs authorities when the Oliva arrived at Manchester the flour was entered with the Customs there, and when it was carried to Liverpool no entry was there made or required by the Customs. The corporation of Liverpool from time immemorial levied certain "town dues" upon all goods imported into the port of Liverpool. The port of Liverpool is of very wide extent and includes the waters of the Mersey and Weaver as far up as the bridges at Frodsham and Warrington, and the corporation claimed that these dues were payable on all goods landed in any part of the port. No service was performed in return for these dues. As Widnes, Runcorn, and Garston, which were all within the port, grew in importance considerable difficulty arose with regard to the payment of the dues on goods landed at those places. In 1857 the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was created by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act, 1857, and all the powers, rights, and privileges of the corporation with respect to these town dues were by that Act transferred to the Mersey Board. The Upper Mersey Dues Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict., cap. CXXV.), section 17, provided that from and after January 1, 1861, "all powers, rights, and privileges of imposing or collecting all such of the rates or dues in the above-mentioned Mersey Docks and Harbour Act, 1857, called 'town dues' . . . as should be payable for or in respect of any goods which should be carried or conveyed upon, over, or along any part of the Upper Mersey" should be transferred to and vested in "the Upper Mersey Dues Trustees (by the said Act created)." For the purposes of that Act the port of Liverpool was divided by an imaginary line, drawn from Eastham Ferry to Garston Dock, into two parts, called the Upper Mersey and the Lower Mersey respectively. The Act of 1860 also provided that the Upper Mersey Trustees should, as a consideration for the transfer of the dues, pay to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board the sum of £105,000, and that when that sum, together with certain other charges, had been paid the dues transferred should be abolished. The said sum was finally paid in 1875, and the dues were abolished. The entrance to the ship canal is about a quarter of a mile above Eastham Ferry, Duke's Dock is in the Lower Mersey, so that the flour was in fact carried over a portion of the waters of the Upper Mersey, both on its way to Manchester in the Oliva and on its way from Manchester to Duke's Dock in lighters. A separate issue was ordered to be tried to determine the question, apart from other questions in the action, whether, assuming that the plaintiffs would otherwise have been entitled to succeed on their claim, they were disentitled by reason of the provisions of the Mersey Dues Act, 1860. This issue came on to be tried on November 5, the question in effect being whether the town dues claimed were "payable for or in respect of any goods which had been carried or conveyed upon, over, or along any part of the Upper Mersey" within the meaning of that Act.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. G. Carver appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Dankwerts for the defendants.

The learned Judge reserved judgment.

Mr. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, after stating the facts of the case and referring to the Upper Mersey Dues Act, 1860, and reading section 17 of that Act, said that the defendants' counsel insisted on a literal interpretation of that section; they said that these goods had been "carried or conveyed upon, over, or along any part of the Upper Mersey," and therefore no dues were payable in respect of them. Now, at the time the Act was passed no town dues were payable in respect of goods carried over the Upper Mersey unless these goods were imported into the Upper Mersey into such places as Runcorn,

*Reported by R. H. BALLOCH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Widnes, and Garston, which were all places within the port of Liverpool. It seemed clear from the language of the preamble of the Act of 1860 that the dues were levied only on goods "imported into or exported from the port of Liverpool," and it was intended by the Legislature that only such part of those dues should be transferred by the Act of 1860 as were payable in respect of goods imported into or exported from places in the Upper Mersey. It appeared from the language of the Act that the only goods in respect of which dues were payable to the Upper Mersey Trustees were goods inward bound or outward bound to or from a place in the Upper Mersey. These goods were inward bound to Liverpool, not to a place in the Upper Mersey. The effect of the literal interpretation contended for by the defendants would be to create new dues.

The learned JUDGE gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the issue with costs.

PASSINGHAM V. KING.*

Principal and Agent—Commission—Sale of publichouse—Finding a purchaser.

This was an action for commission on obtaining a contract for the sale of the Albert Edward publichouse, Albert-road, Kilburn.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. Fred Low for the defendant.

In December, 1896, Mr. Bird, the plaintiff's managing clerk, had an interview with the defendant, who requested him to find a purchaser for the Albert Edward. The plaintiff on December 30, 1896, introduced to him a Mr. Vine, who paid a deposit of £250 on the purchase-money. Mr. Bird prepared the contract, which was duly executed both by defendant and by Mr. Vine, and by which completion was to be on February 11, and, on defendant's instructions, he also took the inventory at the Albert Edward. Subsequently the defendant extended the time for completion of the purchase till May 6, on receipt of a further deposit of £250 from Mr. Vine, a clause being added to the contract which gave the defendant absolute right to retain the deposit and sell elsewhere after that date. The defendant afterwards (on June 10) called at the plaintiff's office and was alleged to have said that he had cancelled Mr. Vine's contract, as he hoped that a brewery company would purchase. On January 1, 1897, the plaintiff had written to the defendant:—

"We beg to inform you that our regular commission to a vendor for licensed property is 1 per cent. upon the purchase-money, but as we hope to do future business with you over some of your other houses we are willing to reduce our commission re the Albert Edward to £100."

On behalf of the defendant, it was contended that this was an agreement to pay commission only on completion of the sale of the property if sold through the plaintiff's introduction, unless the sale went off by defendant's default. The plaintiff admitted that he had taken no trouble to ascertain whether Mr. Vine was a man capable of completing. As a matter of fact, the defendant was still in possession, no purchaser having been found. He denied that he ever said that he had cancelled the contract. He simply said it was at an end, as the required time had elapsed. He was willing to accept Mr. Vine still.

Mr. Vine gave evidence that he contracted to buy the house simply as a speculation, and with no present means of paying for it. He did not complete, because he could not resell at a profit. It was urged that the plaintiff could not earn his commission by getting a man of straw to sign a contract. The clause added to the contract had not made time of its essence. Time always is of the essence of such a contract. (Cowels v. Gale (7 Ch.Apps., 12.) As to the meaning of the word "sale," counsel cited "Bull v. Price" (7 Bingham, 237). Moreover, if the action was right, it was premature, as the defendant had never cancelled the contract, but was willing to accept Mr. Vine now.

Mr. C. A. RUSSELL, on behalf of the plaintiff, cited "Grogan v. Smith (7 The Times Law Reports, 132). Defendant had accepted Vine as purchaser, and so prevented the plaintiff from looking elsewhere to find one, and he had subsequently entered into a fresh bargain with Vine behind the plaintiff's back.

His LORDSHIP said that, in his opinion, plaintiff was clearly entitled to succeed. The defendant chose to accept Vine as purchaser without inquiry. There was no evidence that commission was to be payable upon the completion of the sale. The evidence only was that Mr. Bird undertook "to sell" for him. Neither plaintiff nor Mr. Bird ever acquiesced in the new arrangement between defendant and Vine. By that arrangement he chose not to enforce a contract he had got.

Judgment for plaintiff for £100.

Mr. JELF stated that the defendant intended to appeal, and a stay of execution for ten days was granted.

ROBEY V. ARNOLD.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Music-hall agency—Commission on "re-engagements."

This was an action brought by Mr. George Robey, a music-hall artist, against Mr. Henry Lewis Arnold, of 35, King-street, Covent-garden, and Mr. Walter Lumley, of 37, Conduit-street, W. (receivers of the late firm of Hugh J. Didcott and Co.), for damages for wrongfully and falsely and to the damage of the plaintiff asserting to the manager of the Royal Theatre at Birmingham (where the plaintiff was performing as a music-hall artist) that the plaintiff had made default in the payment of instalments which he agreed to pay to the defendants under or by virtue of an indenture dated October 4, 1895, and made between the defendants and the plaintiff, and for stopping, or endeavouring to stop, the payment of the plaintiff's salary at the said theatre in pretended exercise of the defendants' rights under the said indenture; and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from doing the acts and things complained of or the like acts and things at other theatres or music-halls; and for a declaration that all moneys secured under the said indenture had been paid by the plaintiff to the defendants, and that the said indenture was no longer a continuing security, and had ceased to be so before the said salary was earned by the plaintiff.

for the plaintiff; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs for the defendants.

The material facts were shortly as follows:—The plaintiff some years ago employed Messrs. H. J. Didcott and Co. as his agents to procure him engagements at various music-halls, and in November, 1892, they obtained for him engagements at the Oxford, Pavilion, and Tivoli Music-halls. On November 15, 1892, the plaintiff made three contracts in writing with Didcott and Co., each being in the same form, and respectively relating to the engagements at the Oxford, Pavilion, and Tivoli Music-halls. The contract relating to the Oxford Music-hall engagement contained the following paragraph:—"I agree to pay to you or your heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns 10 per cent. commission on all moneys accruing from this engagement; and I hereby authorize Mr. Thomas to deduct and pay Hugh J. Didcott and Co. or order the same from my salary in any manner Hugh J. Didcott and Co. may deem expedient. I also agree to pay you, your heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns the same rate of commission on all my re-engagements at the above establishment or with E. Thomas, Esq." (Signed) GEORGE ROBEY." In 1893 H. J. Didcott became bankrupt, and the defendants were appointed receivers of Didcott and Co. On October 4, 1895, the plaintiff was indebted to H. J. Didcott and Co. in the sum of £48 15s. 7d., and upon that date he gave a mortgage to the defendants, as receivers, to secure that debt and other claims for commission which had accrued and were accruing. The engagements under the contracts of November 15, 1892, terminated on December 1, 1895, and it was admitted that at the time the present action was brought the debt of £48 15s. 7d. and all commissions up to December, 1895, had been paid by the plaintiff. Between April and December, 1896, the plaintiff himself obtained his own engagements without the intervention of Didcott and Co. at the Pavilion, Tivoli, and Oxford, and it was admitted by the defendants that at that time Didcott and Co. were not ready and willing to act as the plaintiff's agents. In January, 1897, the defendants wrote to the manager of the Royal Theatre, Birmingham, requesting him to pay half the plaintiff's salary to them. The ground upon which the defendants based their claim to stop the plaintiff's salary was as follows:—They contended that under the contracts of November 15, 1892, Didcott and Co. were entitled to commission on all future engagements the plaintiff might at any time during his life obtain at the Pavilion, Tivoli, or Oxford, and whether obtained through Didcott and Co. or not. They said that the words "on all my re-engagements at the above establishment" included all fresh engagements, however obtained. As the plaintiff had in fact obtained engagements at the Oxford, Tivoli, and Pavilion in 1896, they contended that Didcott and Co. were entitled to 10 per cent. commission upon the salary he received for those engagements, although Didcott and Co. had nothing whatever to do with procuring such re-engagements. The defendants further contended that by the mortgage the plaintiff had assigned to them Didcott and Co.'s rights, and that, therefore, they were entitled to claim such commission from the plaintiff.

Mr. Harry Lundy, manager of the Oxford Music-hall, examined by Mr. LUSH, said that in the music-hall profession the word "re-engagement" meant a re-engagement through the particular agent. There was a uniform and well-recognized practice in the music-hall profession that the agent should obtain the times of the performer.

Cross-examined by Mr. WALTON, Q.C.—If a performer employed one agent one year, and the agreement contained a clause saying that the agent was entitled to commission on re-engagements, and the next year the performer obtained an engagement through another agent, the performer would only pay commission to the second agent for the second year, and not the first agent, because the first did not obtain the second engagement.

Mr. Glenister, manager of the London Pavilion, and Mr. Vernon Dowsett, manager of the Tivoli, said that they were not aware of any specific meaning in the profession given to the word "re-engagement."

MR. JUSTICE DARLING ruled that there was no evidence to go to the jury that the word "re-engagement" had any specific meaning.

In giving judgment, his LORDSHIP said that it was with great regret that he felt compelled to hold that the contention on behalf of the defendants as to the meaning of the word "re-engagements" in the contracts of November 15, 1892, must prevail. The sentence which contained the word "re-engagements" meant that commission was to be paid to Didcott and Co. whether they effected such re-engagement or not. If that were not so, there would have been no necessity to put the clause in at all. As to the mortgage deed, however, the plaintiff had only assigned to the defendants the rights of Didcott and Co. under contracts they themselves had arranged, and, as nothing was due from Robey to Didcott and Co. in respect of such contracts, the defendants had no right to make the claims for commission they had made. There would, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff upon the claim for the injunction and declaration asked for, with costs. Judgment for defendants upon their counter-claim for an account with costs, and for payment of the amount found due. There would be a general stay of execution if notice of appeal given within 14 days, and then to the hearing of the appeal.

TRUFFAULT CYCLE AND TUBE MANUFACTURING COMPANY (LIMITED) V. SAUNDERS.*

Practice—Judgment (Order 14)—Leave to defend —Unconditional leave—Calls on shares resisted on the ground of deception in prospectus.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Day at Chambers. The action was brought by the plaintiff company to recover from the defendant calls in respect of shares which had been allotted to him. The defendant had applied for these shares on receiving from the company a prospectus, in which they were called the Dunlop Truffault Cycle and Tube Manufacturing Company (Limited). An injunction having been obtained in the Chancery Division by the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company restraining the plaintiff company from using the word "Dunlop" as part of their name, the defendant complained that he had been deceived by the use of that word in the prospectus, and he refused to keep the shares, and demanded repayment of the application money. The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action, and took out a summons at Chambers for summary judgment, and Mr. Justice Day made an order giving them leave to sign final judgment for the amount claimed. The defendant appealed, and asked the Court of Appeal to give him unconditional leave to defend. It was pointed out on the part of the plaintiffs that there was on the face of the prospectus a statement printed in red ink to the effect that the company was self-contained, and was not in any way connected with the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company.

Mr. W. D. Benson appeared for the defendant; Mr. J. W. McCarthy for the plaintiffs.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the appeal ought to be allowed. The defendant resisted a claim for calls on shares in the plaintiff company on the ground that he had been deceived by the use of the catchword "Dunlop" appearing on a prospectus as part of the company's name. He thought that there was a question proper to be submitted to a jury, and that Mr. Justice Day had been wrong in allowing the plaintiffs to sign judgment. There would, therefore, be unconditional leave to defend.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS concurred.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY V. MULHOLLAND.*

Railway Company—Liability to passenger—Wagons lent gratuitously to another company —Personal injuries.

Appellants had lent wagons gratuitously to another company.

Held, that they owed no duty to persons travelling in such wagons to see that they were in proper condition. Decision of Court of Session reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland.

Mr. Cyril Dodd, Q.C., Mr. C. E. Allan, Mr. M. Campbell, and Mr. Johnston appeared for the appellants; and the Lord Advocate and Mr. E. B. Nicolson for the respondent.

The action was brought by the respondent, the widow of a carter in the employment of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, against that company and the Caledonian Railway Company to recover damages for the death of her husband, who was killed on October 22, 1895, by reason of the alleged negligence of both or either of the companies. The deceased was killed through the defects in the brakes of certain wagons of the Caledonian Railway Company which were being used on the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company's line. The Caledonian Railway Company sought to be dismissed from the action on the ground that they having lent their wagons gratuitously to the other railway company owed no duty to the deceased, and were therefore not liable. The Court below held that in the circumstances the Caledonian Company were liable to the action. The Caledonian Company appealed.

At the conclusion of the arguments,

LORD HERSCHELL, in delivering judgment, said that it was clear that the appellants owed no duty to the deceased to see that their wagons were in proper condition. The decision of the Court below must therefore be reversed, with costs. The noble and learned Lord said that the Lord Chancellor, who was unavoidably absent, concurred in his judgment.

The other noble and learned Lords having concurred,

The appeal was allowed, and the judgment of the Court of Session was reversed, with costs.

JONES V. SPENCER.*

Practice—New trial—Verdict of jury set aside—
New trial ordered.

Decision of Court of Appeal (13 The Times
L.R., 174) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, refusing by a majority to set aside the verdict of the jury in the action.

Mr. Amplett, Q.C., and Mr. E. A. Owen, appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Sidney Clarke for the respondent.

The action was brought by the respondent, a horse-dealer in London, against the appellant, a farmer at Bromsgrove, in Worcestershire, to recover the sum of £70 for breach of a warranty of a cart horse which the respondent had purchased from the appellant on a warranty that the horse was at the time of the purchase "a good worker." The case of the respondent was that on the arrival of the horse by train in London it was immediately found to be "a shiverer" and as such unable to back, and consequently not a good worker. In support of his case the respondent called several veterinary surgeons who had examined the animal shortly after its arrival in London, and who pronounced it to be a very bad shiverer and suffering from a disease which must have been in existence at the time of its purchase by the respondent. On the other hand the appellant called a number of witnesses who had used the animal continually, and who swore that up to the time of the sale the animal was perfectly sound and had shown no symptom of shivering. The jury found for the respondent for the amount claimed. The appellant thereupon applied to the Court of Appeal for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The Court of Appeal, consisting of the late Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Lopes, and Lord Justice Chitty, by a majority, Lord Justice Lopes dissenting, dismissed the appellant's application and upheld the verdict of the jury. In the course of his judgment Lord Esher remarked that, short of perverseness on the part of a jury, it was nearly if not quite impossible that a new trial could be obtained on the ground that a verdict was against the weight of evidence when there was conflicting evidence in the case. Lord Justice Lopes, on the other hand, suggested that the Court of Appeal had gone rather too far in refusing new trials in such cases, and that it was clear from the judgment delivered in the House of Lords in the case of the "Metropolitan Railway Company v. Wright" (11 App. Cas., 152) that a new trial ought to be granted if it were necessary to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The appellant now sought to have the decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

At the conclusion of the arguments yesterday,

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, and directing a new trial, said that he did not propose to enter into the evidence, because, according to the long-established rule when the verdict of a jury was set aside, no observations as to the effect of the evidence should be made lest they might prejudice the new trial. It was sufficient to say that he did not think that the jury in this case had thoroughly appreciated the question before them. The learned Judges in the Court of Appeal did not appear to have directed their minds to the question because the late Master of the Rolls appeared to think that a judgment which he (the Lord Chancellor) had delivered in the case of the "Metropolitan Railway Company v. Wright" made it necessary to refuse a new trial in a case of this sort. He was not aware that he had laid down any new rule in that case, and he had found in a case more than a century old very much the same language as he had himself made use of in the "Metropolitan Railway Company v. Wright." The appeal must be allowed with costs.

The other noble and learned lords having concurred, The appeal was allowed and a new trial ordered, the respondent to pay the costs in that House and in the Court of Appeal, and the costs of the former trial and of the new trial to be dependent upon the result of the latter.

MEABY AND CO. (LIMITED) v. TRITICINE (LIMITED)—
IN RE MEABY AND CO.'S TRADE-MARK (No. 52,389).
Trade Name—Colourable imitation of—Evidence of confusion—Trade-mark—When descriptive—Registration of—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883.

In the above action the plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants, a company called Triticine (Limited) and two gentlemen named Goodall, who are directors of that company, from infringing the plaintiffs' registered trade-mark "Triticumina" (No. 52,389 of 1886), and also to restrain the defendants from selling, disposing of, offering or advertising for sale any food-stuff or preparation from wheat (not being an article prepared or manufactured by the plaintiffs) under the name of "Triticine" or "Triticumina," or under any other name of which "Triticine" or "Triticumina" formed part, or which constituted a colourable imitation of the plaintiffs' trade name "Triticumina," or in such a manner as to be calculated to lead the public or purchasers to believe that the article sold, disposed of, or offered or advertised for sale was in fact prepared or manufactured by the plaintiffs; and to restrain the defendants from trading or carrying on business under the style of "Triticine (Limited)," or under any other style of which the name "Triticine" or "Triticumina" formed part, or under any other name which constituted a colourable imitation of the plaintiffs' trade name, or which might be calculated to lead the public or persons having dealings with them to believe that the trade or business carried on by them respectively was the trade or business of the plaintiffs, or in any way connected therewith. The plaintiffs also claimed the delivery up of all labels, wrappers, &c., in the possession or under the control of the defendants, or any of them, containing the word "Triticine," or any such other word as aforesaid, or otherwise so contrived or expressed as to be calculated to lead the public or purchasers to any such belief as aforesaid. The plaintiffs further claimed damages or an account of profits. As is usual in cases of this kind, the defendants met the action with a motion to rectify the register of trade-marks by removing the plaintiffs' trade-mark therefrom, on the ground that its registration was wrongful and improper. The business of millers, &c., now carried on by the plaintiff company was during 1886 and 1887 carried on by Messrs. Albert Meaby and A. B. Lester at Reading, and from October, 1887, to October 13, 1891, in conjunction with Mr. S. A. M. Farnworth. In March, 1886, Meaby and Lester obtained the registration of the trade-mark in their names in Class 42 in respect of leaven and wheatmeal biscuits, bread, cakes, and other preparations from wheat. On September 15, 1886, Meaby and Lester obtained the grant of a patent for improvements in preparing malted wheaten meal and for preparing malted wheat. On October 7, 1891, Lester assigned his interest in the trade-mark to Meaby and Farnworth. The plaintiff company was incorporated on October 13, 1891, under the title "Meaby's Triticumina Company (Limited)," and the whole of the business of millers and manufacturers carried on by Meaby and Farnworth, and the goodwill and the assets thereof, including the benefit of the patent and the trade-mark, were assigned to the plaintiff company. In 1893 the company acquired the business of the Reading Biscuit Company (Limited), and the name of the plaintiff company was, as from August 31, 1893, changed to their present name. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs said that they had always maintained the high reputation in the trade and with the public which had been obtained by the firm of Meaby in connexion with malted wheaten meal, and flour and articles manufactured therefrom, and had spent large sums in advertising, with the result that their business had enormously increased. The trade-mark had ever since 1886 been used by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title in connexion with the various articles manufactured by them, and in particular with flour, meal, bread, porridge, biscuits, and a food for infants, children, and invalids. Ever since its registration as a trade-mark the name "Triticumina" had been associated with the name of Meaby, and had for many years denoted, and still denoted, both to the trade and the public, that the article to which it was attached was the manufacture of the plaintiff company. The "Triticumina" food, which is a particular preparation of malted wheatmeal, in the production of which the patent process is used, had been largely advertised and had acquired an extensive and favourable reputation as a food for infants and invalids. It was sold in tins bearing the name "Triticumina" thereon. The defendant company was registered in November, 1896, and they acquired the business of millers formerly carried on by Messrs. Harry Goodall and Sons at Castleford, in Yorkshire, defendant directors being then members of that firm. The defendant company sell under the name "Triticine" a food which the plaintiffs allege to be really what is commonly known as "Semolina." The plaintiffs alleged that the name of the defendant company so closely resembles the plaintiffs' registered trade-mark that confusion must arise and the public would be led to believe that the business of the defendant company was that of the plaintiffs, or that the defendant company was in some way connected with the plaintiffs, and that the defendant company would, by reason of its name, appropriate part of the legitimate business of the plaintiffs and their trade would be seriously interfered with. The defendants asserted that the word "Triticumina" had been applied by the plaintiffs themselves as the name of the article made under their patent, and that for this reason, and also because the word was descriptive of the article, and not a "fancy" word, it could not be properly registered as a trade-mark. The defendants also said that they, or their predecessors, had used the word "Triticine" for many years, beginning as early as 1885. The defendants also denied that their acts would deceive the public or lead to any confusion.

In the opening of the plaintiffs' case their claim to an injunction was limited to the food for infants and invalids which they sell under the name "Triticumina." On the question of the legality of registering the name of a patented article it was contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that, though they had patents under which they manufactured "Triticumina" flour and food, the name did not describe the patents, and the articles could be made without the help of the patents.

Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Chitty were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Thomas Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian were for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH dismissed the action. The action, he said, was for the purpose of restraining the defendant company from using the name "Triticine" in a way likely to lead the public to think the substance it described was the article "Triticumina" made by the plaintiff company. The burden of proof lay on the plaintiffs; and his Lordship was of opinion that they had not established a case. The defendants had clearly shown that they had their word printed on labels before they could have heard of the plaintiffs' name. He commented on the fact that no evidence of confusion of names had occurred—a fact not absolutely fatal to the granting of an injunction, at the same time an important matter. He also commented on the absence of important witnesses on both sides; and, on the ground that the defendants had not given the Court the assistance it was entitled to, he dismissed the action without costs. Upon the motion to expunge the registration of the trade-mark, his Lordship said there were two grounds on which the application was based. In the first place, it was said that the name "Triticumina" was not one capable of being properly registered as a trade-mark within the provisions of the statute applicable to the case. In the second place, it was contended that, by reason of its being a patented substance, or a substance professed to be patented as an article called by the name "Triticumina," there was a well-settled principle of law preventing the name from being registered as a trade-mark, because, if the name of a patented article could be registered as a trade-mark, after the expiration of the patent the patentee would have an unfair advantage in the exclusive use of the name, the advantage to a large extent of a monopoly, after the legal period of the monopoly had come to an end: his Lordship was not, however, going to deal with the motion on this ground; at the same time he observed that it was well settled that a man could not by registering the name of a patented article acquire practically a prolongation of his patent. He did not see that even if a man had not a patent for an article he sold under a particular name, and he held out that he had a patent for the article, he ought to be in any different position as to the registration of the name of the article than if he actually had a patent for the manufacture of the article. He considered that the trade-mark ought to be removed from the register on the other ground—namely, that the word was not such a word as could be registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act of 1883, the Act applicable to this trade-mark. On this part of the case he thought it only necessary to refer to the definitions given by Lord Justice Cotton, the present Master of the Rolls, and Lord Ludlow, in the case of "Van Duzer's Trade Mark" (34 Ch. D., 623; 3 The Times Law Reports, 322), of a "fancy word not in common use." He read the definitions given by their lordships, and said that a fancy word to be used as a trade-mark must be one not descriptive of the article to which it was to be applied. He said the word "triticum" was a well-known Latin word meaning wheat, and the articles to which it was applied by the plaintiff company were made from wheat, therefore the word "triticum" with a termination was clearly descriptive. On this ground he allowed the motion with costs.

MUDDOCK V. BLACKWOOD.*

Copyright — Book — Infringement — Remedies —
Copyright Act, 1842, secs. 15 and 23.

Plaintiff in an action for infringement of copyright may sue under both sec. 15 and sec. 23 of the Copyright Act, 1842, and may sue under sec. 23 in both trover and detinue.

This was a copyright case of some importance. Two copyright actions had been brought, one having been commenced in the Chancery Division and the other in the Queen's Bench Division, but they had since been consolidated by an order in the Chancery action. The writ in the Chancery action was issued on November 24, 1896, by the plaintiff, Mr. James Edward Muddock, the author of and the registered proprietor of the copyright in a work called "A Wingless Angel," against Mr. James Blackwood, a publisher, and a firm of publishers called J. Blackwood and Co., claiming an injunction, an account of profits, and delivery up of copies in respect of a work published by the defendants under the same title, and being, in fact, a reprint of the plaintiff's work. On December 10 the principal defendant, Mr. James Blackwood, wrote to the plaintiff offering to submit to an injunction, to pay £10 as damages, to deliver up all copies in his hands, and to pay the plaintiff's costs as between party and party. The plaintiff, however, refused the offer, and on December 18 made a demand in writing on the defendants under section 23 of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45), for all copies of the book unlawfully printed or imported, and then, on December 23, 1896, issued the writ in the Queen's Bench action, claiming damages for wrongful conversion of copies of the book unlawfully printed without the consent of the plaintiff. Then he delivered a statement of claim in that action, and on February 1, 1897, obtained an order in Chambers in that action transferring it to the Chancery Division, but expressly reserving the costs of that action to be dealt with by the Chancery Judge at the trial. On February 8 Mr. Justice Kekewich, on the plaintiff's application, made an order that the two actions should be consolidated and proceed as one action, and in the consolidated action the plaintiff delivered a statement of claim, claiming an injunction, delivery up of all copies in the defendants' possession, an account of profits made by the defendants by the infringement, or, alternatively, damages in respect of the infringement, with an inquiry as to the amount thereof, £250 damages for conversion as in an action of trover, and costs. It appeared that the plaintiff had not published any copies of his work since 1875; that in 1886 the defendant Mr. James Blackwood bought the stereotyped plates of the work at an auction sale at Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's, of Leicestershire-square, and had used them without demur until last year. An account furnished by the defendant showed that in 1886 he sold 1,010 copies at a total price of £33 19s. 9½d. and at a profit of £8 10s. 4½d.; also that in 1896 he sold 29 copies at a profit of £1 4s. 2d., his total profits thus amounting to £9 14s. 6½d., also that, after taking into account the purchase of the plates and repairs, amounting altogether to £10, there had been a net loss on production and sale of the book of 5s. 5½d.

Mr. WARRINGTON, Q.C., and Mr. J. G. JOSEPH, for the plaintiff, relied on section 23 of the Copyright Act, 1842, 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45 (Scrutton on Copyright, p. 246), which provides that "all copies of any book wherein there shall be copyright, and of which entry shall have been made in the said registry book, and which shall have been unlawfully printed or imported without the consent of the registered proprietor of such copyright, in writing under his hand first obtained, shall be deemed to be the property of the proprietor of such copyright, and who shall be registered as such, and such registered proprietor shall, after demand thereof in writing, be entitled to sue for and recover the same, or damages for the detention thereof, in an action of detinue, from any party who shall detain the same, or to sue for and recover damages for the conversion thereof in an action of trover."

Mr. RENSHAW, Q.C., and Mr. J. W. BAINES, for the defendant Blackwood, referred to section 15, which enacts that "if any person shall, in any part of the British dominions, after the passing of this Act, print or cause to be printed, either for sale or exportation, any book in which there shall be subsisting copyright, without the consent in writing of the proprietor thereof, or shall import for sale or hire any such book so having been unlawfully printed from parts beyond the sea, or, knowing such book to have been so unlawfully printed or imported, shall sell, publish, or expose for sale or hire, or cause to be sold, published, or exposed for sale or hire, or shall have in his possession, for sale or hire, any such book so unlawfully printed or imported, without such consent as aforesaid, such offender shall be liable to a special action on the case at the suit of the proprietor of such copyright, to be brought in any Court of record in that part of the British dominions in which the offence shall be committed." They submitted that the two sections were inconsistent, and that the plaintiff was wrong in claiming, as he had done, both in detinue and in trover, for under section 23 he must select the one mode of action or the other, not both. As to the alleged profits made by the defendant, when the price of the plates and the usual trade discount were taken into consideration, it was clear there could be no profits. The plaintiff had resorted to a "multiplicity" of actions, when he might have sought relief by one action. The action had been, in fact, continued without any necessity, the defendant having offered all the plaintiff could justly claim.

MR. JUSTICE KREKOWICH said it was somewhat strange that in the end of the year 1897 he should be called upon for the first time to say what was the meaning of section 23 of the Act 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45—whether the remedy given by that section was inconsistent with that given by section 15; but he supposed he was really called upon to do that because no counsel had suggested to him that there was any decision; and, moreover, the book on copyright which was in the hands of the profession, and to which reference was usually made on all questions of copyright, did not give any case on the subject. Two points had been raised. First, it was said on behalf of the defendant that section 15 gave the proprietor of copyright a remedy by special action on the case; that that meant that this was the remedy which he was intended to pursue, except so far as his remedies at common law were not interfered with; that the offender under section 23 was a different person to the offender under section 15; that under section 15 he was dealing with a person who had "unlawfully printed or imported" a book in which there was a subsisting copyright, and that the other section, 23, provided a remedy against the accidental possessor of the infringing book, so as to give a right of action against that accidental possessor independently of his being otherwise a wrong-doer. That might be the right view, but the language of the sections was not sufficiently clear to compel his Lordship to adopt it. No doubt there were words in section 15 which were not to be found in section 23, and he was unable to suggest why the two sections should not have been put into one, and why they should have been separated as they were. But, on the other hand, he did not see why, because the proprietor of copyright had a remedy under section 15 against the wrong-doer, he could not sue that wrong-doer, if so advised, under section 23. Then the next point was this. The book being vested in the proprietor of the copyright, section 23 said he "shall, after demand in writing, be entitled to sue for and recover the same or damages for the detention thereof, in an action of detinue, from any party who shall detain the same, or to sue for and recover damages for the conversion thereof in an action of trover." That provided an alternative remedy; and the argument on behalf of the defendant was that the plaintiff claiming to sue under that section must elect to sue either in detinue or in trover, and could not sue in both. That was an easier point than the other. There was an alternative remedy. It would, in his Lordship's opinion, be adopting an extremely narrow construction of the Act to say that the proprietor of the copyright in a book, knowing that a person had a certain number of copies in his hands and that he had sold other copies, could not sue that person in respect of the copies that he detained and also in respect of those that he had converted to his own use. It seemed tolerably plain upon the Act itself, and in accordance with what was the apparent intention of the Legislature, that the two actions might be reduced to one action distributed in the way he had suggested—that is to say, the plaintiff might sue in detinue in respect of the copies the defendant had detained, and might sue in trover in respect of the copies he had sold and converted to his own use. Having got so far, the plaintiff in the present case, who was the proprietor of the registered copyright in a book called "A Wingless Angel," was entitled to sue under section 23, and to sue the defendant notwithstanding that he might have brought what was called "a special action on the case" under section 15; and he might have exercised his privilege of bringing an action on the case by proceeding in the Chancery Division. What, then, was the plaintiff's remedy? In his Lordship's opinion he was entitled to the delivery-up on oath of all books in the possession of the defendant—that is to say, delivery-up, and also damages as in an action of trover for the books the defendant had sold. The defendant had sold twice. In 1886 he sold 1,010 copies and realized £38 19s. 9½d., or, say, £39, making a profit of £8 10s. 4½d.; and then he published the book again in 1896, and sold 29 copies, and made a profit of £1 4s. 2d., which on his own showing was rather more than one-eighth of what he had made in 1886. His Lordship declined to order an inquiry as to damages. It would be almost wicked to send the case to the Master or to an official referee to find damages for conversion; if necessary, he should have the inquiry before himself. Mr. Warrington had asked him to fix a sum, and if he added 40 guineas for the whole he thought he was giving the plaintiff as much as he was entitled to. The plaintiff was also entitled to an injunction as part of the order. Upon the question of costs, his Lordship said that the plaintiff might have obtained all the relief he sought by one action in the Chancery Division. He seemed, however, to have determined to multiply costs in every possible way, and his Lordship would do his best to mark his sense of that proceeding. He should therefore give him only the costs of the Chancery action; the costs of the other proceedings he must be ordered to pay.

WHITE V. TURNBULL, MARTIN, AND CO.*

Ship—Charterparty—Broker's commission——"Commission payable on all hire earned" —Construction—Rescission of charterparty.

A charterparty for 12 months provided that plaintiff, the broker, should receive a commission on all hire earned. Hire was payable monthly in advance. In the third month the charterparty was rescinded by consent of both shipowner and charterer.

Held, plaintiff was only entitled to commission on such hire as was actually earned.

This was a claim for commission in respect of a time charterparty entered into through the agency of the plaintiff between the defendants, who were the owners of the steamship Elderslie, and certain charterers. The charter was for a period of 12 months, hire was payable monthly in advance, and the charter provided that a commission of 5 per cent. should be paid to the plaintiff "on all hire earned." The hire was at the rate of £1,050 per month. The first two months' hire was duly earned and commission was paid to the plaintiff. The third month's hire was paid in advance, but during the currency of that month the charterers rescinded the charter on the ground that certain warranties as to the condition of the ship contained in the charter had been broken by the defendants. In an action between the defendants and the charterers which was tried before Mr. Justice Mathew in July, 1897, judgment was entered by consent after a trial of several days by which the cancellation of the charter was upheld, and £700 of the £1,050 hire paid in advance was returned to the charterers. The plaintiff White claimed commission on the £1,050 paid in advance and on a like sum for each of the remaining nine months of the charter. The defendants paid into Court £17 10s., being commission on the £350 not returned, without a denial of liability; and a further £35, being commission on the £700 returned, with a denial of liability.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. BANKES appeared for the plaintiff. They cited "Prickett v. Badger" (1 C.B., N.S., 296), "Green v. Lucas" (33, L.T., N.S., 584), "Inchbold v. Western Neigherry Tea and Coffee Co." (17 C.B., N.S., 733), "Fisher v. Drewitt" (48 L.J., C.L., 32), "Fuller v. Hames" (8 The Times L.R., 278), and "Roberts v. Barnard" (1 Caabae and Ellis, 336).

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. LEOK appeared for the defendants. They referred to the cases cited for the plaintiff and cited the following cases:—"Hamlin v. Wood" ([1891] 2 Q.B., 488), "In re Railway and Electric Appliance Co." (38 Ch.D., 597), "Emanuel v. La Compagnie Fermiere" ([1889] W.N., 150), and "Peacock v. Freeman" (4 The Times L.R., 541).

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said the question in the case was whether the plaintiff was entitled to be paid any commission at all. The circumstances of the case were these:—The defendants were the owners of the steamship Elderslie, a vessel fitted with refrigerating machinery, and a company, called the Jamaica Fruit Importing Company, desired to find such a ship for the purpose of importing fresh fruit from Jamaica, and accordingly they chartered this vessel from the defendants, Messrs. Turnbull, Martin, and Co. The charter provided that the vessel should be hired for 12 calendar months, and that the charterer should pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of £1,050 per month in advance; it also provided that payment of the hire should be suspended or reduced in certain cases, as, for instance, "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores or breakdown of machinery," and "in the event of the steamer being delayed by certain repairs," and in the event of the loss of the vessel, in which case hire was to cease. The charter contained the usual excepted perils and negligence clause. It provided for the payment of a commission of 5 per cent. to the plaintiff on all hire earned. The first question to be determined was whether any hire had been earned, the second whether, assuming it had not been earned, and the non-earning could be attributed to some breach of the charter by the defendants, the plaintiff was entitled to be paid his commission. No hire was earned. Counsel for the plaintiff said it was not earned because of the defendants' breach of the charter. Was there such a breach as to entitle the plaintiff to claim commission? He thought there was not. The intention of the parties was that only commission should be paid upon the hire that actually was earned by the ship and that, with the possible exception of the defendants' own wilful default, all risks should be equally shared by both parties, and that the plaintiff was to take the risk of losing his commission if the charter was put an end to in such circumstances as the present. The words of the clause seemed to have been inserted for the very purpose of preventing such questions as the present from arising. The learned Judge then described the circumstances in which the charter was put an end to—the parties came together and determined that the best thing to be done was to put an end to it. It was doubtful, therefore, whether it came to an end by any default of the defendants.

Judgment was given for the defendants with costs; the plaintiff to have costs on the High Court scale up to the time of payment into Court.

Revenue—Income-tax—Deductions—Annual profits or gains—Brewers' "tied houses"—Maintenance and repair.

In estimating the balance of profits and gains for the purposes of income-tax brewers are not entitled to deduct sums expended by them in repairing their tied houses.

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 542) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment (13 The Times L.R., 542) of a Divisional Court (Mr. Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Ridley) on a special case stated by Commissioners of Income-tax. The case was to the following effect:—(1) At a meeting of the Commissioners for general purposes, held at Portsmouth, on December 1, 1896, Messrs. Brickwood and Co. (Limited), who are a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-1890, and carry on the business of brewers and maltsters at Portsmouth and elsewhere, appealed against an assessment of £20,973 made on them under 16 and 17 Vic., c. 34, section 2, Schedule D, in respect of the profits of their trade. (2) They claim to have the assessment reduced by the sum of £1,492, being the balance of a sum of £2,496 expended by them in the repair of certain licensed houses of which they were the owners, and which they had let to tenants, after deducting from such sum £1,004, being one-sixth of the annual value of such houses, under 16 and 17 Vic., c. 34, section 2, Schedule A. (3) The appellants have from time to time, in order to increase their trade, bought licensed houses, which they have let to tenants under written agreements, one of the terms thereof being that such tenants should buy from the appellants all the ale, beer, and other articles to be sold in such houses which the appellants might from time to time manufacture or sell. (4) The profits of the appellants have been earned by manufacturing ale, beer, and other articles and selling them, in part to private individuals, in part to the owners of what are generally known as "free" licensed houses, and in part to the tenants of their "tied" licensed houses. The whole of the profits so made by the appellants are included in the assessment. Such profits have been materially increased by the increased sale of their goods due to the possession by them of their tied houses, and also by their having been able to obtain, and having in fact obtained, for the same class of goods, a higher price from the tenants of their tied houses than they have obtained or are able to obtain from their other customers. (5) In no case have the tenants of the tied houses as a fact spent any money on the repairs to the tied houses let to them. Such repairs as have from time to time become necessary to such houses have been executed by the appellants, and, after deducting that portion of the cost which has been in the nature of capital outlay or which has tended to the permanent improvement of the premises, the balance properly attributable to revenue is the sum of £2,496 above mentioned. (6) Part of the said sum of £2,496 has been spent by the appellants in order to enable them to comply with the requirements as to repairs of the licensing authorities. (7) The tied houses in question are in the possession of the tenants in part for the purposes of the trade of licensed victuallers and beer retailers, and in part as the private dwelling apartments of themselves and their families. The repairs in question have been executed indifferently to both parts of such houses. (8) In addition to their tied houses the appellants own other licensed houses, which they have during the year occupied by their managers or servants, and in respect of these and of the brewery and other premises admittedly occupied by the appellants for the purposes of their trade they have been allowed for repairs before the assessment was made the full sum to which they are entitled under 5 and 6 Vic., c. 35, section 100, First Case, Rule III. They have also received in respect of the whole of the licensed houses owned by them the deductions from the annual value under 16 and 17 Vic., c. 34, section 2, Schedule A, to which they are entitled under the Finance Act, 1894, section 35. Such deduction has, in the case of their licensed houses not let to tenants and of their brewery and other premises aforesaid, been made before ascertaining the allowance to be made to the appellants for repairs under 5 and 6 Vic., c. 35, section 100, First Case, Rule III. It was contended on behalf of the appellants (a) that the purchasing and letting of licensed houses was an essential part of their business of brewers and maltsters, and alternatively that it was a separate business; (b) that but for such purchasing and letting their profits, as assessed under Schedule D, would not and could not have been earned; (c) that the repairs in question were a necessary outlay, without which such profits could not have been earned, and form a legitimate deduction in arriving at the balance of profits in respect of which they are chargeable under Schedule D; and (d) that the tied houses in question were "occupied" by them for the purpose of their trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade within the meaning of 5 and 6 Vic., c. 35, section 100, First Case, Rule III., and that in this respect there is no distinction between such houses and those licensed houses which, being owned by the appellants, are not let to tenants, but are conducted on their behalf by their managers or servants. The surveyor, in opposition, contended (a) that the tied houses were not "occupied" by the appellants within the meaning of 5 and 6 Vic., c. 35, section 100, First Case, Rule III.; (b) that the appellants must be deemed to have executed the repairs in question not qua traders, but qua landlords, and that as such they had received the one-sixth deduction from the annual value under 16 and 17 Vic., c. 34, section 2, Schedule A, to which they were entitled under the Finance Act, 1894. The Commissioners determined that the tied houses in question were not "occupied" by the appellants within 5 and 6 Vic., c. 35, section 100, First Case, Rule III., and that the appellants were not entitled to the deduction claimed. The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the Commissioners, and gave judgment for the Crown. The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the Crown was entitled to succeed and the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed. The appellants were a brewery company, and they had, like most brewers, what were called "tied" houses, and they also had untied houses. They found that in their tied houses they sold more beer and at a better price, and it was worth their while to spend considerable sums on the repairs of those tied houses. They now contended that in estimating the balance of their profits and gains, on which they were chargeable to income-tax under Schedule D, they were entitled to deduct the sums which they had expended on those repairs. Section 100 of the Income-tax Act, 1842, said that in estimating the balance of profits and gains of any trade no sum should be deducted on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade beyond the sum usually expended for such purpose according to an average of three years. He agreed that that amounted to a permission that such sum might be deducted. But did this case come within that permission? The permission applied to "any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade." He thought that meant premises occupied by the person assessed for the purpose of his trade. It was necessary to distinguish between the trade of the brewer and the trade of the publican. In his opinion the case did not come within the permission, and therefore it remained within the prohibition. Then a further rule in the same section said that in estimating the balance of profits and gains no deduction should be made for any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade. It was clear that the money spent on these repairs was not exclusively expended for the purpose of the appellants' trade. The appellants, therefore, were not entitled to the deduction which they asked for.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS concurred.

EDWARDS' MENU COMPANY (LIMITED) V. CHUDDEIGH.*

Contract — Agreement — Construction — Agreement by defendant to let refreshment bars at a theatre as long as it should "remain in his hands" — Injunction.

This was a motion by the plaintiff company for an injunction, until the trial or further order, to restrain the defendant, Mr. Arthur Chudleigh, who was or is the lessee of the Court Theatre, from excluding the plaintiffs from the bars, refreshment room, cloak-room, and wine cellar of the theatre, in breach of an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant. By the agreement in question, which was dated February 6, 1896, it was agreed that the defendant should, "so long as the Court Theatre should remain in his hands," let to the plaintiff company, at a weekly rent of £25, "the free and exclusive use" of the bars, &c., the agreement carrying with it the privilege of letting spaces for advertisements in the bars, &c., and selling programmes. The agreement was carried out until July 9, 1897, when the theatre was closed for the summer season. Upon its being re-opened in October, the defendant, as the plaintiffs alleged, refused to allow them the use of the bars, &c., and the plaintiffs then brought this action, and served the defendant with a notice of motion to the effect above stated. The defendant's case was that the agreement in question had been entered into by him on behalf of the Court Syndicate (Limited), who were the real tenants of the theatre, and that he was merely their manager; that the agreement came to an end on July 31 last; and that negotiations were in progress between the owner of the theatre and himself, acting on behalf of another syndicate called the Buckingham Syndicate (Limited), for a new tenancy of the theatre, but no lease had yet been executed. He admitted, however, that he had not yet given up possession of the theatre, but he contended that the theatre was no longer "in his hands" within the meaning of the agreement. It appeared that he had made an offer to relet the bars, &c., to the plaintiffs, but at an increased rent of £20 a week, in consequence, as he said, of his having improved and enlarged the bars.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. George Cave appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. A. A. B. Terrell for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said the real question was, What was the meaning of the words "in his hands" in the agreement? The word "remain" he would deal with directly. The words could not mean literally that the Court Theatre was to be in the defendant's manual possession. It was a more or less figurative expression. The defendant was described in the agreement as "manager." At the date of the agreement he was not treated as tenant, and was not the lessee at that time. But the theatre was under his control, though he was not lessee. In his Lordship's opinion, "in his hands" must mean that the control of the theatre was in his hands sufficiently to enable him to do what he had to do as manager. Then, as to the word "remain," the theatre did not "remain in his hands," in one sense, if the tenancy changed, but in point of fact it was under the defendant's control. His term came to an end on July 31, and his Lordship gathered that he immediately, if not before, entered into negotiations for a renewal of the term. What was his position? He did not throw the place up at the end of his term. He might, his Lordship supposed, have used it as a theatre if he so desired. At any rate, it was under his control, and remained under his control; therefore he could not get out of it by saying there had been a break in the occupation or tenancy. There must be an injunction in the terms of the notice of motion.

By consent his Lordship directed the injunction to be suspended pending an appeal, the defendant undertaking to apply to the Court of Appeal for a speedy hearing, and not to create any new tenancy of the bars, &c., in the meantime.

IN RE THE CROWN LEASE PROPRIETARY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Contract — Agreement — Construction — Underwriting agreement — Absolute contract.

This was an appeal from the refusal of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams to order that the name of Mr. Edwin Bonner should be struck off the list of contributories of the Crown Lease Proprietary Company (Limited), which was in liquidation. It appeared that the company had been promoted by a Mr. Oakden for the purpose of acquiring a lease of a site at the corner of the Haymarket, and that Mr. Bonner, at the request of Mr. Oakden, signed an underwriting letter, by which he agreed to subscribe for 200 preference shares in the company and to pay for the same on the conditions named in a prospectus to be issued to the public, and further agreed that he would sign and lodge with the company the necessary application for the shares and pay the deposit thereon in accordance with the terms of the prospectus, and that if he failed to do so the underwriting agreement should be sufficient authority to Mr. Oakden to apply for the shares in his name. Subsequently Mr. Oakden acted on this authority, and 189 preference shares were allotted to Mr. Bonner. But before Mr. Oakden applied for the shares it had become clear that the affairs of the company could not prosper, and the contract which had been entered into for the purchase of the site in the Haymarket was rescinded. Mr. Bonner claimed that he was entitled to have his name removed from the list of contributories, on the ground that he had authorized Mr. Oakden as his agent to buy shares in a company formed for a particular purpose, and that when that purpose was relinquished the authority came to an end. The learned Judge on the hearing of the summons refused to make the order asked for, and Mr. Bonner appealed.

Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Hay appeared for Mr. Bonner; Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Barnard Lailey for the liquidator.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, the underwriting letter was an irrevocable contract on the part of the appellant to take 200 shares if they were allotted to him. The appellant contended that it was conditional on the performance of a particular contract. He could not read in any such condition, and he thought that the judgment of the learned Judge was correct.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. He thought that the underwriting letter which they had to construe was an absolute undertaking by the signer to subscribe for 200 shares in the company in consideration of certain commission to be paid to him by the pro-motor. Oakden clearly had authority to apply for the shares on behalf of Bonner, and the allotment to the latter was good.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was also of the same opinion. It was said that the agreement was conditional. But it was clearly not subject to any condition to be imported from the prospectus; neither, in his judgment, was it subject to any general implied condition. The appellant sought to bring the case within the authorities which showed that in certain circumstances a contract came to an end when its object was defeated. He thought that all that could be said here was that the appellant had gone into a speculation which had proved to be unsuccessful, and those authorities did not apply to this case.

BARRY RAILWAY CO. V. TAFF VALE RAILWAY CO.*

Decision of Romer, J. (13 The Times L.R., 370), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer (reported 13 The Times L.R., 370). The question in dispute between the parties was whether the defendant company had complied with or evaded a clause providing facilities for coal traffic of the plaintiff company over the defendant company's system contained in the 23rd section of the Barry Dock and Railways Act, 1888, in the following terms:—"The Taff Vale Railway Company shall punctually and regularly forward and afford all reasonable facilities for goods and mineral traffic destined for or coming from the undertaking of the company (the Barry Company) from or to Treforest or any place northward thereof at rates per mile not greater than the lowest rate which shall for the time being be charged by the Taff Vale Railway Company for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry." Litigation had taken place between the parties as to how the coal traffic rates over the defendant company's line were to be computed. In that litigation it was decided in the result that the charges made to colliery-owners competing with the plaintiff company were, comparatively speaking, too low. The Taff Vale Railway Company revised these charges, but at the same time they reduced, by the exact amount the carrying charges were reduced, certain dock or tipping and weighing charges on the same coal, which was shipped in the defendants' dock. Mr. Justice Romer held that as matter of fact the defendants had not bona fide reduced their dock charges for all shippers equally, and had not complied with the statutory requirements as to posting notices of reduction of such charges, and granted an injunction to restrain them from charging preferential rates. The defendants appealed.

Mr. W. J. NOBLE (Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., with him) argued in support of the appeal.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Joseph Shaw, for the plaintiff company, were not called upon by their LORDSHIPS, who considered that no evidence had been adduced before them to show that the finding of fact by Mr. Justice Romer was not right, and they dismissed the appeal.

THE PRINZ HEINRICH.*

Ship—Carriage of goods—Theft—Negligence of officers—Liability.

This case, which was before the Court on November 16 and 17, was concluded to-day. The facts sufficiently appear in the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes this morning.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Carver for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in delivering judgment, said:—This is an action by the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China to recover for the loss of a quantity of gold coins which were stolen from a box shipped by them on the steamer Hohenzollern, belonging to the North German Lloyd, at Yokohama, on June 12, 1896, to be carried to London. The box was transhipped at Hong-kong into the Prinz Heinrich, by which vessel it was carried to England. The theft occurred on the Hohenzollern. The box was delivered to the purser of this vessel and placed by him in the mail room, which is in the 'tween decks abaft the engine-room on the starboard side of the vessel, and to which access is obtained by iron double doors opening outwards from the room and by a hatchway in the top of the room opening on the main deck and secured by a Chubb's padlock. The double doors are secured by a bolt at the top and another at the bottom of one door and two locks riveted on to the other door. The purser keeps the keys of the hatch and doors, the captain having a duplicate key of the hatch padlock. It appears from the evidence that the theft was committed by a quartermaster named Schmidt, who seems to have found an opportunity of secretly displacing the two bolts of the door when he was working in the mail room at Yokohama, and by this means to have been able on the night following the departure of the vessel from Yokohama to pull open the doors and get at the box. If the bolts were drawn the doors, though locked, could, as I understand, be pulled open outwards. The theft was not discovered till the box was opened in London, because, although it was transhipped at Hong-kong, Schmidt had fastened it up again and filled the place of the gold which he stole (being a portion only of the whole contents) with leaden bullets to make up the weight. Schmidt acted with the assistance or connivance of other quartermasters, one of whom, Adkin, was afterwards arrested and has since stated how the theft was committed. A portion of the gold was found in his possession. The other men have left the ship and have not been found. The loss sustained is £2,447 13s. 4d. The box was shipped under a bill of lading, which stated that the value of the coins was $51,656.36. The material conditions of the bill of lading are:—Clause 1—"Owners to be responsible that the vessel is properly equipped, manned, and fitted out, and in all respects seaworthy and capable of performing her intended voyage; also for the faults and negligence of their servants in all matters relating to the proper stowage, custody, care, and delivery of the goods. All provisions and clauses to the contrary shall be null and void and of no effect in law"; clause 2, which exempts the owners from inter alia "thieves and barratry," and clause 5—"Ship not accountable for gold, silver, bullion, specie . . . above the value of £100, unless bills of lading be signed therefor and the value therein expressed and a special agreement be made." In consequence of the cases of "Taylor v. the Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company" (L.R., 9 Q.B., 546) and "Steinman v. Angier Line (Limited)" ([1891] 1 Q.B., p. 619) the exception of "thieves" was not relied on. The defendants rested their case on the exception of "barratry" and the said fifth clause. Mr. Walton, counsel for the plaintiffs, conceded that the theft was a barratrous act, but contended that the defendants are not exempted from liability for the loss by the exception of barratry in the circumstances, because the loss would not have occurred but for the negligence of the defendants' servants in relation to the proper care and control of the box, and he relied on clause 1 of the bill of lading. It was not disputed by the defendants that they would be liable for such negligence subject to a point raised on clause 5. The question, therefore, in the case comes to be one of fact. The negligence complained of is that the purser or one of the officers neglected to see that the bolts of the iron doors were properly fastened when the doors were last closed before the steamer left Yokohama. The answer made is that Schmidt was properly treated as a trustworthy person who assisted the purser in putting the box into the room and locking the doors, and that there was no negligence on the part of the purser or officers if this man tricked them, or one of them, into supposing that the bolts were fast by apparently fastening them, and yet dexterously withdrawing them at the same time. It is not at all clear at what precise time Schmidt managed to displace the bolts. The doors were closed and locked by him when the box was put in. I gather from the purser's evidence that this was done in his presence, and the keys handed to him. The doors were again opened to put in some parcels in charge of the second officer, who seems to have obtained the keys from the purser for that purpose, but I cannot ascertain that Schmidt was in the room then. The room was again entered on June 13, when mails were put into it. This was done through the hatch, and it does not appear that the doors were opened then, nor whether Schmidt was in the room then. The second officer thinks he was, but the master says that he had nothing to do with the mails. The regulations of the defendants provide that the purser is responsible for the right and good reception of specie, and for the custody and correct delivery of same, but the captain has to decide in what manner the loading shall be carried out, and in his evidence the purser states that it was his duty to take charge of treasure, shipments, and mails. There appears to me to have been some laxity about the way in which the room was used for treasure, parcels, and mails, as the purser sometimes used the keys himself and at other times allowed the second and third officers to have them for the purpose of dealing with parcels. Since this loss another room has been allotted for parcels, a bar has been put inside the doors, and they can only be opened from the inside after access is obtained to them by the hatch, and the officers no longer have to use the room or the keys for it. There is no doubt that Schmidt had observed that owing to the manner in which the room was used there might be an opportunity for him to displace the bolts without being observed, and that during the time the vessel was at Yokohama, while he was working in the room, he found and used his opportunity. I have also the advantage of being assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, both of whom have had large experience in the carriage of treasure, and they advise me that, in their opinion, the facts to which I have adverted disclose a case of negligence on the part of those who had charge of this room. They consider that, taking a practical businesslike view of the matter, as I was invited to do by Mr. Aspinall, one responsible officer should have charge of this room, as in fact the defendants' regulations indicate, and that he should himself personally see that the fastenings and locks are properly secured after each occasion on which the doors are opened. They consider it desirable to point out that the officer should never part with the keys for a moment, because if the keys are parted with for a short time to a sailor or other subordinate, it affords him the chance of secretly taking an impression of the keys. I agree with the opinion of the Elder Brethren. For these reasons I find that the loss was due to negligence, for which the defendants are responsible. With regard to the point raised on the 5th clause, it is sufficient to say that the value of the package was expressed in the bill of lading, and a special agreement was made. That there was a special agreement appears from the evidence of Mr. Leopold, clerk to the defendants' agents at Yokohama, and according to it the freight charged was about 20 times as much as it would have been if there had been no declaration of value. My judgment must be for the plaintiffs for £2,447 13s. 4d., with costs.

ANNIE BROWN V. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NEW ZEALAND.*

Privy Council Appeals—New Zealand—Criminal Law—Husband and wife—Marital control—Criminal Code, sec. 24.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal at Wellington, New Zealand, of May 22, 1896, upon a case stated by his Honour Sir James Prendergast, the Chief Justice of New Zealand, under the Criminal Code Act, 1893, No. 56.

Mr. Mayne appeared for the appellant; Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Mr. English Harrison for the respondent.

The case was stated under subsection 6 of section 412 of the Criminal Code. Annie Brown was indicted jointly with her husband, John Henry Brown, that they, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a certain woman named in the indictment, unlawfully used an instrument. A separate trial was applied for on behalf of the defendants and was granted. Annie Brown was tried first and convicted. The Chief Justice asked the jury whether or not they found that the woman was married to the other defendant, and, if so, did she in the part she took in the commission of the crime act freely and voluntarily or under the control and coercion of her husband? The jury answered that they found that the defendant was married to the other defendant and that she acted under his control. At the request of the woman's counsel the Chief Justice reserved the question whether the fact that the offence had been committed under the control or by the command of the husband was a defence. There was no evidence of such compulsion as was mentioned in the 24th section of the Criminal Code, but merely command and control of the husband without such threats. The doubt in the mind of the Chief Justice was whether since the passing of the Criminal Code, section 24, marital control or command was a defence. The husband was convicted as well as the wife and was sentenced to 18 months' hard labour. The matter was argued before the Court of Appeal on the question stated as follows:—"Whether the fact that the offence had been committed under the control of the husband was a defence, or whether the circumstance that the appellant was not actually present, or if the jury thought so, not constructively present, made any difference as to the admissibility against her of the acts and declarations, accompanying, acts of the other defendant." The Court of Appeal adjudged that the conviction of the appellant should be affirmed, and she was therefore sentenced to two years' hard labour. From that judgment the present appeal was instituted.

The arguments were heard in February before a committee consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, Lord Hobhouse, Lord Davey, and Sir Richard Couch, when their Lordships dismissed the appeal, intimating that they would give their reasons for their report to her Majesty to that effect at a future sitting.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in now giving these reasons, said,—Their Lordships intimated at the hearing of this appeal that they would humbly recommend to her Majesty that it should be dismissed. They think it right to add now that if the facts had been understood at the time application was made for leave to appeal, that leave would not have been granted. It is a little difficult to understand why even at the original trial any question was reserved for the Court of Appeal in the colony. In the case stated by the Chief Justice it is said that at the request of the prisoner's counsel he reserved the question whether the fact that the offence had been committed under the control or by the command of the husband was a defence; and further on the learned Judge states that the doubt was whether since the passing of the 24th section of the Criminal Code marital control or command was a defence. That section is as follows:—
"Section 24.—(1.) Except as hereinafter provided compulsion by threats of immediate death or grievous bodily harm from a person actually present at the commission of the offence shall be an excuse for the commission by a person subject to such threats and who believes such threats will be executed (and who is not a party to any association or conspiracy the being a party to which rendered him subject to compulsion) of any offence other than treason, murder, piracy, offences deemed to be piracy, attempting to murder, assisting in rape, forcible abduction, robbery, causing grievous bodily harm, and arson. (2.) No presumption shall be made that a married woman committing an offence does so under compulsion only because she commits it in the presence of her husband." Whatever may be the proper solution of these questions their Lordships are of opinion that none of them arise upon the evidence set out in the case. There was no evidence, as the Chief Justice himself states in the case reserved, of any such compulsion as is referred to in the section in question. The offence charged was not committed by one in the presence of the other at all. The evidence upon which the prisoner was apparently convicted, and properly convicted, was the procuring and contriving the commission of the offence committed by the husband in her absence and under circumstances wherein the section above set out could have had no application at all. The Chief Justice states that the jury at the trial found that the prisoner was married to the other defendant and that she acted under his control. For the latter proposition there is not a scintilla of evidence, and no such question should have been left to the jury. The mere fact that the parties are married never even formed a presumption of compulsion by the husband. Even as early as Bracton's time, if the wife was voluntarily a party to the commission of a crime her coverture furnished no defence (see Bracton, Book 3, c. 32, who says):—"Quid erit si uxor cum viro conjuncta fuerit, vel confessa fuerit quod viro suo consilium presterit et auxilium? Numquid tenebantur ambo? imo ut videtur." and he goes on to add, "sic ut sunt participes in crimine, ita debent esse participes in pena." Questions have from time to time arisen how far the mere presence of the husband at the time of the commission of the offence should furnish a presumption of marital control, and the decisions on that subject have not been entirely uniform. But their Lordships are of opinion that here even that question does not arise. The acts attributed to the prisoner were acts done by herself in the absence of her husband, conclusively establishing that she was voluntarily acting and aiding and assisting in arrangements leading up to and intended to assist the commission of the offence which was afterwards consummated. Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that no such question was open upon the facts as detailed, and the finding of the jury is only intelligible on the ground that they supposed that the mere fact of coverture itself furnished legal evidence of compulsion within the rule of law, which view their Lordships are of opinion was entirely erroneous. It is for these reasons that their Lordships have thought it right humbly to advise her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed.

GANGADHAR TILAK V. THE QUEEN-EMPRESS.*

Privy Council Appeals—India—Leave to appeal—Indian Penal Code, sec. 124a—"Disaffection" to the Government—Direction to jury.

This was a petition from Bombay for special leave to appeal.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. Mayne, and Mr. Bannerman appeared for the petitioner; Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. J. H. A. Branson represented the Secretary of State for India.

MR. ASQUITH, Q.C., said the petition was for special leave to appeal against a conviction and sentence passed upon the petitioner by the High Court of Bombay. The petitioner was charged with an offence under section 124a of the Indian Penal Code. After a trial which lasted for some days before Mr. Justice Strachey and a jury of nine, he was, on September 14 last, found guilty by a majority of six to three of the jury, and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. The section in question was in these words:—"Whoever by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representations, or otherwise, excites or attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India shall be punished with transportation for life or for any term to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years." Then followed the explanation:—"Such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority is not disaffection. Therefore, the making of comments on the measures of the Government with the intention of exciting only this species of disapprobation is not an offence within this clause." Under that section the petitioner was charged—first, with exciting feelings of disaffection, and, secondly, with attempting to excite feelings of disaffection. The words relied upon in support of these charges were to be found in two articles published in the issue of June 15 of a newspaper called the Kesari, a newspaper published at *Reported by W. J. SOULEBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Poona, in the Mahratta language, of which the petitioner was admittedly proprietor and editor. The substantial ground upon which the application was raised was that the learned Judge in his summing up, having to direct the jury as to the meanings of the section and its application to the matter before them, misdirected them in serious and important respects. Two articles were relied upon by the prosecution. The first was a report of the proceedings which had taken place in connexion with a celebration of Shivaji, one of the heroes of the Mahratta race. It appeared that there had been of late years a revival of the memory of Shivaji. It had become customary to hold celebrations on the great anniversaries of Shivaji's life. The proceedings in question took place at one of such celebrations. Amongst those who took part in the proceedings was the present petitioner and two other gentlemen, Professor Bhanu, and Professor Jinsivale, whose speeches, as reported, were part of the incriminated matter. One of the incidents of the life of Shivaji, which had excited the greatest amount of controversy, was as to the circumstances under which he put to death one Afzul Khan. One party maintained that Shivaji treacherously murdered Afzul Khan; the other party contended that it was an act of self-defence. At the conclusion of his lecture Professor Bhanu said :—" Every Hindu or Maratha, to whatever party he may belong, must rejoice at this festival. We are all striving to regain our lost independence, and this terrible load is to be uplifted by us without any combination." It appeared from the proceedings that there had been doubt as to the exact English equivalent of the Maratha word translated "independence." One of the witnesses was of opinion that it referred to freedom of thought or speech. Professor Jinsivale said :—" If no one blames Napoleon for committing 2,000 murders in Europe, and if Caesar is considered merciful though he needlessly committed slaughter in Gaul many a time, why should a virulent attack be made on Shri Shiraji Maharaja for killing one or two persons. The people who took part in the French Revolution denied that they committed murders, and maintained that they were only removing thorns from their path. Why should not the same principle be made applicable to Maharashtra?" The learned counsel then read the report of Mr. Tilak's discourse, which was of a similar nature. The next matter upon which the prosecution was based was called Shivaji's utterances. It was in the same paper as the report before referred to, and was in the form of a poem. The evidence at the trial consisted of the proof that Mr. Tilak was proprietor and editor, and of a certain amount of controversy as to the proper translation of various words and phrases. It was elicited that some months before these articles were published the plague had been raging in Poona, and that there had been a controversy in the native community as to the measures adopted by the Government for stamping it out. It was shown that Mr. Tilak had very strongly taken the view that the native community ought to co-operate with the Government in the measures which were being taken. Mr. Tilak criticized some of the details of administration; but, on the whole, he thought that they ought to co-operate with the Government. It also appeared that this state of things had practically come to an end about May 18. The measures taken by the Government had proved successful, so that when the articles in question were published a month had elapsed since that state of things had come to an end. No evidence was called for the defence, and the learned Judge proceeded to direct the jury. The learned counsel read at considerable length the summing up of the learned Judge, and proceeded to say that, speaking generally, the objection which, on behalf of the petitioner, he had to take to that direction was that the learned Judge had defined the offence described in section 124a in terms far too wide, and that, if the jury accepted the ruling of the learned Judge as a conclusive and binding definition of the law they would have found Mr. Tilak guilty of "disaffection," when, in point of fact, the highest and strongest charge that could be fairly brought against him was that he had commented, or allowed other persons to use his paper as a vehicle for commenting, severely no doubt, upon what he conceived to be social and political abuses, but comment which was recognized in his country and in British India as well within the scope of the functions of a public journalist. The question really depended upon what was the meaning to be given to the word "disaffection" in section 124a, having regard to the context and to the explanation. It was noteworthy that those who framed the section had not used the word "sedition," which was a term of art in English law, but they had chosen the word "disaffection," which had no technical meaning in this country in our system of jurisprudence. He did not wish to pin the learned Judge to the expression that "disaffection" meant merely "the absence of affection." No one could say that that was anything but a very vague and loose definition; but he thought he was not misrepresenting the general effect of the charge when he said that the learned Judge defined feelings of disaffection as meaning any feelings of hatred or ill-will or enmity to the Government; and therefore, if it could be shown that the intention or effect of the words used would be to inspire in those to whom they were addressed feelings of enmity towards the Government as by law established, that was sufficient to bring the person within the scope of the penal enactment. The learned Judge fortified himself in taking what, it was submitted, was far too extensive a view of the meaning of the word in question by the explanation which he treated as if it were an exhaustive enumeration by way of a negative of the cases which are not intended to fall within the section. That, he submitted, was not the proper function of an explanation. The learned counsel desired to point out the absurdity which would follow from the way in which the learned Judge had dealt with the explanation. The learned Judge had said the explanation spoke only of the "measures" of the Government; therefore the making of comments on the measures of the Government was not an offence within the clause. The word "measures," the learned Judge thought, meant that a journalist who criticized a particular Act such as the imposition of a tax, or an Act dealing with an epidemic, provided that it was compatible with the disposition to render obedience to the authorities, would be safe; but the moment he got beyond measures and went to the general policy of the Government he fell within the penal enactment. That, he contended, was a most irrational and unpractical suggestion. What was intended by the clause was that feelings of disaffection were to be something beyond disapproval or dislike. The dividing line was passed when the feeling sought to be excited was incompatible with the disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government. In other words, it was intended to be an essential ingredient of the offence that the effect calculated to be produced should be such a state of enmity as was incompatible with the disposition to obey. It might be that the object was to excite active resistance. The case then would of course be too clear for argument. It might be the object was only to excite passive resistance; that again would not be compatible with the disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government. It was quite sufficient for the purpose of bringing a man within the section that he should seek to inspire enmity, ill-will, or hatred to the Government, and the protection given by the explanation only applied to criticisms of particular measures, and it was only then that they had to consider whether the disapprobation excited was compatible with the disposition to render obedience to the authority of the Government.

LORD HOBHOUSE.—You say “measures of the Government” ought to be read as if it were the whole course of Government?

MR. ASQUITH.—Yes; inasmuch as criticism upon the Government generally takes the form of criticism of some one or other measures. The word “measures” is not the governing word.

LORD DAVEY.—You would, I suppose, include administrative Acts and not merely legislative Acts?

MR. ASQUITH.—Certainly.

LORD HOBHOUSE.—Suppose a man said the Government was very wasteful, that it was neglecting irrigation and education and other things, that would not be a comment of any particular measure.

MR. ASQUITH.—It would not. The learned Judge ought to have told the jury that they must keep in their minds the question—Is the spirit of hostility which it was stated was engendered compatible with the disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority; and so long as the speeches at the meeting and the rhetorical poem were merely intended as a general attack upon the policy of the British Government in India or upon the change of social habits and institutions which had been brought about since the time of Shivaji, since the time when the Mahratta rule was founded, by the introduction of foreign laws and foreign customs, could it be said that there was anything there which necessarily tended to create a disposition not to render obedience to the lawful authority? It was not a case, perhaps, which ought to have been withheld from the jury, but that was the question to which their minds ought to have been directed. At various stages in his charge the learned Judge had assumed, without any evidence to warrant him in so doing, a state of inflamed feeling and of exasperation in the minds of those to whom the request was addressed, which, as he said, would almost require the jury to put a more severe construction upon the language than if it had been used in another place or at another time and in other cases, as in the reference to a thousand swords leaping from their scabbards and the comparison between Napoleon and Shivaji and the morality of ordinary men and of great men. The learned Judge had suggested a construction of words which those words would not legitimately bear. He was aware that such an application as the present, although not altogether unusual, yet, according to the decisions of their Lordships, required very strong grounds to support it. It had been said that a mere ordinary case of misdirection of a jury would not justify their Lordships in advising her Majesty to exercise her special prerogative. An application had been made to the Court in Bombay for leave to appeal, which application had been refused by the Chief Justice and two other Judges; but it was submitted that the present was not an ordinary case.

LORD HOBHOUSE.—Has the High Court complete discretion in a criminal case as to allowing an appeal?

MR. ASQUITH.—Yes; they can give leave to appeal, but they could not have heard the case themselves unless the Judge reserved a point or unless the Advocate-General certified that it was a case that ought to be reheard. As regards the general question whether the case was one in which the point had been made good, that where there was a substantial misdirection their Lordships would give leave to appeal, the matter was one which was entirely within their Lordships' discretion. He would refer to what was said by their Lordships in the case of “The Queen v. Bertrand” (L.R., 1 P.C., 520), in which their Lordships said:—“The exercise of this prerogative is to be regulated by a consideration of circumstances and consequences; and interference by her Majesty in Council in criminal cases is likely in so many instances to lead to mischief and inconvenience that in them the Crown will be very slow to entertain an appeal by its officers on behalf of itself or by individuals. The instances of such appeals being entertained are therefore very rare. The opinions stated by this Committee in the case of ‘Ames and others’ (1), ‘The Queen v. Joykissen Mookerjee’ (2), and ‘The Falkland Islands Company v. the Queen’ (3) establish these positions. The result is that any application to be allowed to appeal in a criminal case comes to this Committee labouring under a great preliminary difficulty—a difficulty not always overcome by the mere suggestion of hardship in the circumstances of the case; yet the difficulty is not invincible. It is not necessary, and perhaps it would not be wise, to attempt to point out all the grounds which may be available for the purpose; but it may safely be said that where the suggestions, if true, raise questions of great and general importance, and likely to occur often, and also where, if true, they show the due and orderly administration of the law interrupted, or diverted into a new course, which might create a precedent for the future, and also where there is no other means of preventing these consequences, then it will be proper for this Committee to entertain an appeal, if referred to it for its decision.” This case, he contended, fell within the criterion there laid down. With the exception of the decision of Sir Comer Petheram, this was the first time that the particular section had come under judicial consideration. If there was no appeal from the construction which had been put upon the section by the learned Judge of the Court below, that, of course, would have to afford a precedent when the law was again invoked, and as the whole law as regards the rights and liabilities, not only of journalists, but of speakers throughout British India, depended upon whether or not that was the true construction of the section, it was, he submitted, a question of great and general importance likely to occur often, and also a case which must create a precedent for the future. In these circumstances he submitted that it was a fit case for granting the leave which the petitioner asked.

MR. ARTHUR COHEN, Q.C., on behalf of the Secretary of State for India, thought that he might perhaps direct their Lordships' attention to the last case before the Board in which the rule on which the Board proceeded was laid down. The judgment was delivered by the Lord Chancellor on July 14, 1897. He said the rule was accurately stated in the course of the argument in the case “Re Abraham Mallory Dillet” as follows:—“Her Majesty will not review or interfere with the course of criminal proceedings unless it is shown that by a disregard of the forms of legal process, or by some violation of the principles of natural justice, or otherwise, substantial and grave injustice has been done.” He did not wish to do more than remind their Lordships of the principle there laid down, and he did not think that at the present stage he should argue the case.

Counsel were directed to withdraw, and their Lordships deliberated for some time. Upon readmitting counsel and parties, their Lordships proceeded to deliver judgment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said:—Their Lordships are of opinion, taking the view of the whole of the summing up, which is of very great length, that there is nothing in that which, in their Lordships' opinion, calls upon them to indicate any dissent from or necessity to correct what is therein contained, looking at the summing up as a whole, and looking at each part of what was said by the light of what else was said. Speaking generally of the argument which has been presented to their Lordships, they are of opinion that no case has been made out consistently with the rules by which their advice to her Majesty has been guided hitherto in giving leave to appeal in criminal cases, and therefore they will humbly advise her Majesty that this is not a case in which leave should be granted.

Special leave to appeal was therefore refused.

HUNT V. HUNT.*

Husband and wife—Separation deed—Covenant not to molest—Divorce proceedings in foreign country.

A husband living apart from his wife under a separation deed instituted divorce proceedings in the Courts of Texas; Held, that he had not committed a breach of the covenant not to molest contained in the separation deed.

Decision of Wright, J. ([1897] 2 Q.B., 304), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright at the trial of the action without a jury; reported in (1897) 2 Q.B., 304. The action was brought by a wife against her husband to recover damages for breach of a covenant in a separation deed not to molest her, and for an injunction to restrain him from continuing or prosecuting proceedings commenced by him against her in the district Court of the county of El Paso, in the State of Texas, in the United States. The defendant counterclaimed for damages for breach of a similar covenant by her not to molest him, alleging that in bringing the present action against him she had committed a breach of covenant. The plaintiff and defendant were married in Ireland on June 18, 1868. On November 24, 1880, a separation deed was executed, under which the parties agreed to live separate, and there was a covenant by the defendant "not in any way to molest her or institute any legal proceedings to compel her cohabitation with him." There was a similar covenant by the plaintiff. The parties accordingly lived separate, and in September, 1896, the defendant went to reside in Texas, and on December 5, 1896, he there filed a statement in the district Court of El Paso setting forth that he was resident there, and that he anticipated instituting a suit in that Court against his wife for dissolution of their marriage on the ground that she had, without cause, in October, 1880, abandoned him, and had continued to live apart from him, and stating that he desired to take the depositions of certain specified witnesses in England for the purpose of perpetuating their testimony, and using the same upon the trial of the suit. The defendant prayed for the issue of a copy of the statement to be served upon the plaintiff, in order that he might take out the necessary process to secure the depositions of the witnesses. The Court of El Paso issued a notice to the plaintiff reciting the above statement, and stating that, after the service thereof upon her, the defendant would apply to the clerk of the Court of El Paso for a commission to take the depositions of the witnesses. This notice and the defendant's statement were served upon the plaintiff in England, when she was asked whether she would accept service by post of the proceedings in the district Court of El Paso. She refused to do so, and brought this action. Mr. Justice Wright held that there was "molestation," and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £15 damages, and granted an injunction restraining the defendant from doing any act or taking any proceedings in this country for continuing or prosecuting the proceedings commenced by him, or any similar future proceedings, in the district Court of El Paso against the plaintiff for dissolution of marriage. The defendant appealed.

The defendant appeared in person, and contended that there was no "molestation" on his part, and referred to "Thomas v. Everard" (6 H. and N., 448); "Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford" (14 Q.B.D., 792); "Flower v. Flower" (20 W.R., 231); "Rowley v. Rowley" (L.R., 1 H.L. Sc., 68).

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON, Q.C., and Mr. HERBERT JACOBS, for the plaintiff, contended that it was sufficient if there was, in fact, an annoyance. There was an annoyance here. Further, if intention to annoy was necessary to cause molestation, there was evidence of such intention.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the separation deed did not contain a covenant by the defendant not to take proceedings for divorce against his wife, but merely a covenant not to molest her. The defendant went to Texas in September, 1896, and the inference which his Lordship drew from the facts was that he went to Texas in order to get a divorce from his wife, it having been stated by the plaintiff's counsel that the Courts in Texas did not recognize separation deeds, and therefore the defendant, in relying in those Courts upon desertion, would not be hampered by the separation deed. The question was whether there was molestation. In "Thomas v. Everard" it was held that the bringing of a suit in the Divorce Court for judicial separation was not a breach of a covenant not to molest. In "Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford" it was stated, as it seemed to him, by Lord Esher and Lord Justice Cotton that, to constitute molestation, there must be an act done which in fact annoyed and which was done with the intention of annoying. Lord Justice Cotton said that there must be an act done with the purpose and intent to annoy and injure, and, of course, when a person did an act the natural tendency of which was to annoy and injure, prima facie that person must be supposed to have that intention. With that statement of the law he agreed. Of course, there might be some acts done as to which it was obvious that an intention to annoy existed. But if the acts were of such a nature that they did not necessarily show an intention to annoy, the circumstances must be looked at. What were the circumstances in this case? In Texas the defendant could get a divorce more easily than in this country. Did the defendant go to Texas to annoy the plaintiff or to get a divorce? Mr. Justice Wright did not deal with the question of intention. He merely said that it was vexatious to take proceedings in Texas. The only inference he (the Lord Justice) could draw was that the defendant merely intended, in going to Texas, to take divorce proceedings against his wife. That being so, it was not a breach of the covenant not to molest; though, if the covenant had been not to take proceedings, it would have been a breach of that covenant.

Company—Winding up—Contributories—Application to remove name—Conditional application for shares.

T. applied for an allotment of shares in a company "provided that the total number of shares are applied for." He was allotted shares, and subsequently in the winding up of the company discovered that the total number of shares had not been applied for.

Held, on the facts, that he had done nothing to estop him from denying that he was a shareholder, and that he was entitled to have his name removed from the list of contributories.

Mr. G. W. F. Tomlin was attracted by a prospectus issued by the abovenamed company—which has on several occasions been before the Courts—and on July 24, 1896, he signed and sent in the following application:—

"Form of Application for Shares.—Thomas Edward Brinsmead and Sons (Limited).—To the Directors of Thomas Edward Brinsmead and Sons (Limited), 94, Cannon-street, London, E.C.—Gentlemen (Having paid to your bankers the sum of £ — being a deposit of 10s. per share payable on application for — shares of £5 each in) Thomas Edward Brinsmead and Sons (Limited), I request you to allot me five hundred pounds in [that number of] one hundred shares, and I agree to accept the same, or any smaller number that may be allotted to me, upon the terms and conditions of the prospectus and memorandum and articles of association of the company. I request you to place my name on the register of members in respect of the shares so allotted to me, and I undertake to pay the further instalments upon such allotted shares as and when the same become due, provided the total number of shares are applied for, and I undertake to pay in full on allotment.—Ordinary signature, —.— Name (in full), George William Flowers Tomlin.—Address, Dudley-street, Leighton Buzzard.—Description, No occupation.—Date, 24th July, 1896.—If you desire to pay in full on allotment sign the following:— I desire to pay in full on allotment. This form is to be filled up, cut out, and forwarded, together with cheque or cash for the amount payable on application to the bankers, &c., or to the secretary at the offices of the company, 94, Cannon-street, London, E.C."

The application was made upon one of the usual printed forms, but Tomlin altered the form in ink by striking out the portions which are above enclosed in square brackets, and by adding the words which above are printed in italics. He did not sign at all at the end of the words "I desire," &c., and he never paid any money to the company. The company shortly afterwards went to allotment, but all the shares in it were not applied for, and only about 58,000 (including those applied for by Tomlin) out of a larger number were allotted. No notice of the allotment was given to Tomlin, but he soon afterwards found that there was something wrong with the company, and on August 17, 1896, he served on the company a notice of motion, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register by removing his name therefrom on the ground of misrepresentation in the prospectus. It was admitted that had this motion been proceeded with, and Tomlin had done nothing to affect his position, he would have been entitled to the relief claimed. The motion stood over by consent until certain test proceedings of the same nature had been disposed of, but before these came before the Court a petition was presented to wind up the company. Tomlin gave the usual notice as a contributory that he intended to appear and oppose the petition; and he actually did appear and oppose it. A winding-up order was made by Sir R. Vaughan Williams, and the notice of appeal from that order was given on behalf of Tomlin and others. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal with costs against the appellants. Tomlin now applied that his name might be struck off the list of contributories in the winding up. It was contended on his behalf that there was no contract with the company; and that even if there was a voidable contract he had done nothing which prevented him from applying for relief. The following passage from Palmer's Company Precedents, 7th edition, Part II., p. 353, was read to the Court:—"A number of shareholders"—in this company—"had repudiated their shares on the ground of misrepresentation, and had taken proceedings to enforce such repudiation, and had thus definitively elected to avoid their contracts, they could have voted without danger, for 'if a man once determines his election it shall be determined for ever' (Com. Dig., Elections, c. 2), so held by the Court of Appeal in 'Foulkes v. Quartz Hill Company' in 1884 (Em. Dig., 1884, p. 102)." In "Foulkes v. Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Company" (reported in Cababe and Ellis's Reports, p. 156), after issue joined and notice of trial given in an action by a shareholder to have his name removed from the register of shareholders on the ground of fraud, the plaintiff attended and voted at a meeting of shareholders held in the liquidation of the company, and it was decided by Baron Pollock that the shareholder's conduct debarred him from prosecuting his action for fraud; but the following note appears at the foot of the report:—"The Court of Appeal reversed the above decision, holding that the issue of the writ was a distinctive election to rescind, and that this election was not affected by the subsequent voting at the meeting." On behalf of the liquidator, it was contended that there was a voidable contract, but that Tomlin, notwithstanding his notice of motion, had by his subsequent conduct deprived himself of the right to relief.

Mr. Norman Craig was for the applicant, Tomlin; and the Hon. Frank Russell for the Official Receiver and liquidator.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered judgment to the following effect:—"The case has been concisely and ably argued, and I think that no point has been overlooked. The applicant in July, 1896, applied for shares, altering the printed form of application by inserting a proviso which must, I think, be taken to be general in effect and to affect the whole of the previous words. It was, therefore, a conditional application for shares, and the whole of the shares were not allotted. The shares applied for by the applicant were allotted to him, but no notice of allotment was given to him, and he has never paid the company anything in respect of the shares. He discovered that there was something wrong with the company, but whether he knew that the total amount of shares was allotted or based his objection on another ground is not apparent. In August, 1896, he served notice of motion under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register on the ground that he had applied for the shares on the faith of misrepresentations in the company's prospectus, and not on the ground of non-performance of the condition on which he applied. The motion by consent stood over to abide the result of some test cases, and in due course the test motions would have come on. But the motions were out short by the presentation of a petition to wind up the company. The applicant cannot, therefore, be said to have been in default prior to the hearing of the winding-up petition. But he gave notice of his intention to appear as a contributory at that hearing and oppose the petition. There was, however, nothing in that amounting to a deliberate election to be a shareholder if he was not already one, or to alter the applicant's position. He also appeared at the hearing and opposed, and was a party to the appeal from the decision, but he never voted at any meeting of shareholders. There was no contract at first between the applicant and the company—that is, prior to notice (if any) of the fact of allotment being communicated—because the application was subject to a condition which was never complied with, or, so far as the evidence goes, waived. It is said that it was waived by the attendance in Court and by the notice of motion to rectify, and that the appearance in Court amounted to adoption of the contract. I must, however, hold that the applicant did not intend to render himself liable for the shares; throughout he was endeavouring to obtain relief from liability. When he gave his notice of motion he probably did not know that he could escape on the ground of non-compliance with the condition; but in my judgment he has done nothing to estop himself from denying that he was a shareholder; indeed I do not see what else he could have done, and in my judgment he is entitled to have his name taken off the list of contributories. It is unfortunate that the decision of the Court of Appeal in “Foulkes v. Quartz Hill Company” was not fully reported, as it is a very important one; but I doubt whether the Court meant to lay down the rule so absolutely as is stated in the note to the report. I do not think that note goes so far as the note in Mr. Palmer's book.

and a Special Jury } Nov. 19.

TREGELLAS V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

County Council—Liability—Personal injuries—Nonfeasance.

The plaintiff suffered personal injuries through the defendants' neglect of their duty to lop the branches of the trees in Victoria-park; Held, that this being mere non-feasance defendants were not liable.

In this action Mr. Thomas Tregellas, an estate agent, carrying on business at 12, Hobart-place, Eaton-square, claimed damages from the London County Council for the loss of his left eye, owing to a blow from the branch of a tree in Victoria-park, which extended over the highway and struck him while he was travelling on the top of a tramcar along Grove-road. The defendants denied that there had been any negligence on their part, and contended that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

Lord Coleridge, Q.C., and Mr. Lindsey Smith were counsel for the plaintiff; and Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. English Harrison appeared for the defendants.

The accident in question occurred on June 26, 1896. The plaintiff was travelling on the top of a tramcar in Grove-road, when he received a blow in the eye from a branch of one of the trees overhanging the road from Victoria-park. At the time he did not know his eye was much injured, but on going to the Oval to play cricket he found he could not see the ball. He thereupon consulted several oculists, and it was found necessary at once to remove the eye. In consequence of his injuries the plaintiff had been put to considerable suffering and expense, and had incurred serious business losses.

Evidence was given by the plaintiff, and by other persons who had been struck by the branches of trees in Grove-road when travelling by tram.

The facts were not disputed, and at the close of the plaintiff's case Mr. DICKENS contended that this action would not lie against the London County Council. Victoria-park was a Royal park, and the trees were the property of the Crown, and, assuming that it was the duty of the County Council to lop the trees, they would not be liable for non-feasance thereby. There was nothing in the Acts of Parliament under which the management and control of Victoria-park became vested in the London County Council which imposed upon them liability for mere non-feasance. The learned counsel cited “Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board” (1892) Ap. Cas., 345, “Sanitary Commissioners of Gibraltar v. Orfila” (15 Ap. Cas., 400), “Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert” (1893) Ap. Cas., 524, and “Saunders v. Holborn Board of Works” (1895, 1 Q.B., 64).

LORD COLERIDGE contended that the doctrine of non-liability of a public body for non-feasance applied only to highway authorities and sewerage authorities, and in support of this contention he cited “Cowley v. Mayor of Sunderland” (30 L.J., Ex., 167), “Glossop v. Iseworth Local Board” (12 Ch. D., 102), “Gilbert v. Trinity House” (17 Q.B.D., 795), “Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson” (4 Ap. Cas., 256), “Thompson v. Mayor of Brighton” (1894) 1 Q.B., 332, and “White v. Hindley Local Board” (44 L.J., Q.B., 114). The learned counsel also argued that the negligence in this case was misfeasance, and not non-feasance.

After hearing the arguments of counsel the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE asked the jury, assuming the defendants were liable, to assess the amount of damages.

The jury fixed the damages at £1,250.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE held, on the point of law, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. It was the duty of the London County Council to do all that was reasonably necessary for the proper regulation of the parks and to insure the safety of people using them. They were bound to see that the trees should not be allowed to extend beyond the confines of the park so as to be a danger or nuisance to persons lawfully using the highways, and it was the duty of the park-keepers or some such persons to report such an evil if it existed, so that the trees might be lopped. Trees had been allowed to extend their branches so as to be a danger and a nuisance, and the plaintiff had suffered injury. The trees, however, were not planted by the defendants, nor during the period in which they were charged with the control and management of the park. They neglected their duty of lopping the branches, but that was an act of non-feasance only. There was no statute which put an exceptional liability on the London County Council beyond that which the general law imposed. The state of the law on this matter was, his Lordship said, unsatisfactory. If the servants of the London County Council had in pursuance of their duty lopped the trees so as to prevent them from being a nuisance and in the course of doing so had negligently let a branch fall on a passer-by, and so caused an injury, then that would have been a misfeasance, and the London County Council would have been liable. After considering the cases on the subject he was of opinion that the defendants were not liable for an act of non-feasance, and he therefore gave judgment for them.

Nov. 19.ROBSON V. THE PALACE CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Light—Interference—Building on adjoining land.

Having regard to the circumstances existing at the date of the lease, and known to both parties, Held, that the defendants had committed no breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment by building on adjoining ground, and so interfering with plaintiff's light and air.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in an agreement in writing dated April 1, 1880, whereby the defendant company demised to a Mr. Whichcord certain rooms in Palace-chambers, Westminster, for a term of 21 years, at a yearly rent of £210. The plaintiff, who was an architect, claimed as assignee of Whichcord's interest under the agreement. The covenant in question was in the following terms:—"The tenant, on payment of the rent hereby reserved and performing the agreement herein contained, shall have quiet enjoyment of the said rooms during the said tenancy." The breach complained of was that the defendant company had let certain vacant land belonging to them and adjoining Palace-chambers on a building lease, and had permitted a high building to be erected thereon within about 26 feet of one of the plaintiff's rooms in which he carried on his work as an architect, whereby the said room was rendered dark, unwholesome, and of less value to the plaintiff. The defence raised was that the plaintiff had notice when he took the premises that the vacant land would be built upon, that if he ever had a right to light he had abandoned it by his conduct, that the rooms had been let to Whichcord at a specially low rent because this land was to be built upon, and that the plaintiff was bound by an equity arising from that arrangement. It was admitted that there was an obstruction to the light of the room.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Ram appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Sargent for the defendant company.

The plaintiff was called and stated that one of his rooms was specially valuable to him as having a good north light, and that he did his finest work in it. He estimated that the annual value of the rooms had decreased to the extent of £65. He claimed £325 on that head, £190 as the unexhausted value of certain improvements he had made, and £25 for time lost in looking for other offices.

Mr. Henry Currey, the well-known architect, estimated the depreciation of the value of the north room at the capitalized sum of £225.

Mr. SARGENT, for the defendant company, submitted that the implication that Whichcord by the agreement took a right of light over the adjoining land of the defendant company was in this case rebutted by the particular circumstances existing at the date of the agreement. He cited "Birmingham District Bank v. Ross" (38 Ch. D., 295). Secondly, if Whichcord had ever acquired an easement of light, it had been subsequently abandoned. On this point he referred to "Moore v. Rawson" (3 B. and C., 334).

Mr. James S. Beale, solicitor, said that he recollected the formation of the defendant company in 1880. He, Whichcord, and Mr. Driver, the surveyor, were the first directors. At the time Whichcord entered into his agreement of tenancy it was perfectly well understood by him that the light to his rooms would eventually be obstructed by the buildings which it was intended should be erected on the company's vacant land. The matter was discussed at a meeting of the directors in March, 1880, and the rooms were on that account let to Whichcord at a rent 25 per cent. less than their then value. After the agreement Whichcord himself prepared plans for the new buildings which would have caused an obstruction to his light, and Whichcord negotiated with several intending lessees of the vacant land. When the plaintiff was in occupation of the rooms after Whichcord's death, he entered into negotiations with the company on behalf of intending purchasers of the vacant land.

Mr. Conder, manager of the company, stated that when the plaintiff was thinking of taking the rooms after Whichcord's death, he (the witness) informed him that the light would be obstructed when the adjoining land was built upon. This witness estimated the damage to the value of the premises at £20 per annum.

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON contended that the express language of the covenant could not be limited by a previous verbal arrangement between Whichcord and the company. The lessor could not derogate from his own grant. The premises must be taken as they existed at the time of the agreement. No authority had been quoted to show that a verbal agreement between the parties before the lease was signed could limit or control the express terms of the document itself. The contention of the defendants was contrary to one of the most fundamental principles of the law.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the action was brought upon a covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in an agreement for a lease entered into by the defendant company with Whichcord, an architect, by which four rooms in a building known as Westminster Palace-chambers were demised to Whichcord for a term of 21 years. The lessee took the rooms for the purposes of his profession as an architect. It was important to remember the circumstances under which the rooms were taken by Whichcord. The defendant company was formed in 1880, Whichcord being one of the promoters, with the object of acquiring these very buildings and some adjacent land which was at that time vacant. The scheme was that buildings should be erected on that vacant land, either by the company or by lessees from them. His Lordship was satisfied that Whichcord and the other directors all knew perfectly well that the new buildings, when erected, would interfere with some of the light of the old building, and in particular with the light of one of the rooms let to Whichcord. His Lordship accepted Mr. Beale's statement that when Whichcord, who was to act as architect to the company, negotiated with the board of directors for the term of 21 years of these rooms, he obtained them at a rent considerably below the rack rent because he knew, and the company knew, that the value of the rooms would be decreased by the erection of the new buildings. In these circumstances the question was, What did the covenant for quiet enjoyment mean, especially with reference to light? What was the light which the defendant company undertook that Whichcord should enjoy? His Lordship was of opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that the light to be enjoyed by Whichcord was all that light which would, during the term, come through the window after the new buildings had been erected. All the parties knew of the intention to erect new buildings, and the contract was made with reference to that existing state of things. It was true it was only an intention, but the intention was just as much a part of the existing state of things as the old building itself. It was not contended that the plaintiff's rights were any better than those of Whichcord, but his Lordship found as a fact that the plaintiff when he took over the rooms was well aware of all the circumstances under which the agreement was entered into by Whichcord. His Lordship came to the conclusion that no right granted to Whichcord by the defendant company had been interfered with, and as the plaintiff had no better right than Whichcord, his judgment must be for the defendant company. In the event of the plaintiff being held by another Court to be entitled to recover, his Lordship, to save further expense, assessed the damages at £150.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1897.
Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J. } Nov. 20.

RYNER V. BULLARD, KING, AND CO.*

Negligence—Ship, loading of—Tallying clerk—Insufficient means of access from barge to ship—The maxim volenti non fit injuria held not to apply.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the late Mr. Justice Cave at the trial of the action with a jury. The action was brought under Lord Campbell's Act by a widow to recover compensation for the death of her husband. The deceased was a tallying clerk in the service of the defendants, who were shipowners. It appeared that the deceased had occasion to go on board one of the defendant's ships from a barge, which was lying alongside, and on which he had been engaged in tallying cargo. He was in the act of climbing up by means of a rope attached to the ship when he fell and was killed. It was proved that the defendants knew that the rope was used for the purpose of getting on board, and that complaints had been made to them that no ladder was provided for that purpose. The jury found that there had been negligence on the part of the defendants in not supplying a ladder as a means of communication between the barge and the ship, and the learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff accordingly. The defendants appealed, and asked that judgment might be entered for them on the ground that there had been no evidence to connect the accident with the negligence. They also contended that there was no evidence that the deceased was acting in the course of his employment when he fell from the rope, and further that the proper inference to be drawn from the case presented by the plaintiff was that the deceased well knew the risk he was running, and the defendants therefore were entitled to rely on the doctrine volenti non fit injuria.

Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., and Mr. Disturnel appeared for the defendants; Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Herbert Jacobs for the plaintiff.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the defendants asked for judgment on the ground that there was no evidence to support the plaintiff's cause of action. The plaintiff in order to succeed had to establish that the defendants had been guilty of negligence in not providing a safe means of access from the barge to the ship, and that the deceased while acting in the course of his employment had lost his life in consequence of that negligence. It was true that no evidence was actually given at the trial to show what duties the deceased was engaged on at the time of the accident. But it was proved that he was a tallyman in the service of the defendants, and that he had been engaged on the barge in tallying cargo which was being loaded, and the point was not taken at the trial that he was not acting in the course of his employment when he left the barge to go on board the ship. It must, therefore, now be taken that he was at the time carrying out his duties. In his opinion there was evidence to go to the jury that the defendants had provided insufficient means of access from the barge to the ship, and the jury had so found. But the defendants now said that the deceased had voluntarily incurred the risk of danger, and that on that ground no action lay. But after referring to the case of "Smith v. Baker" ([1891] A.C., 325) he thought that the true inference to be drawn from the facts in this case was that the deceased did not undertake the risk so as to make the maxim volenti non fit injuria apply. In his opinion, therefore, the accident was consequent on the defendants' negligence only, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. The important point in the case was whether the maxim volenti non fit injuria applied. The question whether a workman who undertook dangerous employment with knowledge of the danger undertook the risk of danger so as to make the maxim apply was a question of fact for the jury. And in his opinion there was plenty of evidence here that the deceased had not taken on himself that risk in discharge of his employers.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he had felt considerable doubt, but he thought that the learned Judge at the trial had acted rightly. The question was whether there was evidence in support of the plaintiff's case fit to be left to the jury. The evidence was of a very meagre description. The plaintiff had to show a breach of duty towards the deceased himself, and that the accident was caused by that breach and not by anything else. It was assumed at the trial that it was necessary for the deceased to go to and from the ship in the performance of his duties, and evidence was given to show that the defendants were negligent in substituting a rope for a ladder. The difficulty was as to whether the accident was due to this default on the part of the defendants. He thought that the plaintiff had just succeeded, but only just succeeded, in giving prima facie evidence of negligence causing the accident. He therefore agreed that the appeal must be dismissed.

BAGLEY V. BUTCHER AND ANOTHER.*

Election Law—Parliament—Registration—Statement of qualification—Validity—Joint occupation of a dwelling-house.

A claim in respect of the joint occupation of a dwelling-house is good, provided the dwelling-house is of sufficient value.

This was an appeal, by case stated, from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the Eastern Division of the county of Wilts, sitting at Marlborough and, afterwards, at Devizes. An important question was raised with regard to certain persons claiming to be placed on the occupiers' list of voters under a qualification the nature of which was stated to be "dwelling-house joint." The Revising Barrister, having expunged the names of these persons from the list of voters, stated a case for the opinion of the High Court.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. W. Graham appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Lewis Thomas for the respondents.

In Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters for the parish of Presbute the names of three persons—Christopher Pearce Hussey, John Compton Hussey, and William James Hussey—appeared, the nature of whose qualification was stated in the third column to be "dwelling-house joint," and the property, in respect of which the vote was claimed, Clatford-house. Two other names—Alexander Taylor and Thomas Taylor—appeared with the same qualification and with the property stated to be Manton-house. In Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters for the parish of Pewsey the names of Charles Arthur Dixon and Henry Partridge Dixon appeared with the same qualification, the property being stated to be Southcote. All seven persons were objected to on the ground that the nature of their qualification was expressly forbidden by the proviso to section 3 of 30 and 31 Vict., c. 102. In each instance the dwelling-house was used only as a residence, and was of more than sufficient value to give £10 a year annual value to each joint occupier. No claim for amendment was made, nor was any statutory declaration under section 24 of 41 and 42 Vict., c. 26, made, and the Revising Barrister did not, in fact, make any amendment of the entry in the list.

Mr. GRAHAM said that the question was decided by two cases—"Townsend v. St. Marylebone" (L.R., 7 C.P., 143) and "Druitt v. Gossling" (20 L.T., 325).

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—It seems as if there might be a good objection to the names on the ground that the joint occupants of some of the houses are father and son, and therefore no such occupation as the statutes contemplate.

Mr. GRAHAM said that there was no finding to that effect. The only ground of objection raised was that the qualification named was forbidden by law. The Reform Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 45), section 27, gave the franchise in cities and boroughs to persons occupying, as owner or tenant, houses of the annual value of £10 and upwards. Section 29 provided that where any premises in any such city or borough should be jointly occupied by more persons than one as owners or tenants, each of such occupiers should be entitled to vote if the clear yearly value of such premises should be of an amount which, when divided by ten, should give not less than £10 for each of such occupiers. That was the state of the occupation franchise in boroughs until the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 102), was passed, the scheme of which was to give the franchise to all inhabitant occupiers of dwelling-houses in boroughs. By section 3, every man was entitled to vote in a borough who was of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, and was an inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant, of any dwelling-house within the borough. To that clause there was a proviso "that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling-house." The object of that proviso was to prevent a number of votes being derived from one house which might be of very small value. Section 6 conferred the franchise in counties upon occupiers, as owner or tenant, of lands and tenements of not less than £12 yearly value. That section was repealed by the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict., c. 3) section 5, but only for the purpose of reducing the qualification from £12 to £10. Section 27 of the Act of 1867 provided that in counties "where premises are in the joint occupation of several persons as owners or tenants, and the aggregate rateable value of such premises is such as would, if divided amongst the several occupiers, so far as value is concerned, confer on each of them a vote, then each of such joint occupiers shall, if otherwise qualified, and subject to the conditions of this Act, be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election for the county; provided always that not more than two persons, being such joint occupiers, shall be entitled to be registered in respect of such premises, unless they shall have derived the same by descent, succession, marriage, marriage settlement, or devise, or unless they shall be bona fide engaged as partners carrying on trade or business there." The Act of 1884, section 5, provided that every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or borough of the clear yearly value of not less than £10 should be entitled to a vote. In "Townsend v. Overseers of St. Marylebone" it was held that a qualification in the list of voters for a borough described as "dwelling-house" was good and needed no amendment, the voter having shown that he was in such joint occupation of a dwelling-house as amounted to a qualification in respect of a "house" under the Reform Act, 1832, sections 27 and 29. The point raised in the present case was that if the qualification was described as a dwelling-house it was under section 3 of the Act of 1867 and subject to the proviso in that section.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Is it conceded that there would have been a good claim if the qualification had been described as "land or tenement joint?"

Mr. THOMAS.—Yes; but here they have made a claim under a qualification forbidden by law.

Mr. GRAHAM, continuing, said that the person claiming had a good claim under section 5 of the Act of 1884.

Mr. THOMAS said that the question was whether there could be a qualification described as "dwelling-house joint." The occupation franchise was first conferred by what was called the Chandos clause in the Reform Act, 1832, which entitled every man to a vote who occupied lands or tenements of a yearly value not less than £50. The Act of 1867, section 6, reduced the qualification to £10. That went on till 1884, but by the Act of 1867, section 3, a new qualification was given in boroughs which stood side by side with the old occupation franchise. That was the franchise in respect of dwelling-houses, and it was confined to boroughs. To prevent the creation of faggot votes the proviso against joint occupation was inserted. The Act of 1884 expressly extended to counties the dwelling-house franchise conferred on boroughs by section 3 of the Act of 1867, the object being to produce a uniform franchise in boroughs and counties. The qualification claimed was that conferred by section 3 of the Act of 1867 and is subject to the proviso. There were two occupation qualifications—(1) occupation as owner or tenant of lands or tenements; (2) occupation of a dwelling-house, which was an absolutely distinct qualification and did not permit of joint occupation. If the claim had been made in respect of the occupation of "lands or tenements," it would have been good. The Revising Barrister had no power to amend the claim actually made, because the amendment would have involved not merely a change in the description, but a complete alteration of the qualification. The learned counsel referred to the terms of section 27 of the Act of 1867 as supporting the contention he made, because the provisions in that section were all applicable to cases where there was land of a money value, and could not apply in the case of a dwelling-house qualification with no money value. Counsel also referred to the Local Government Act, 1888, section 76 (7), and the Registration Order of 1895, made thereunder, Part I, General Instructions, sections 7 and 8. He further contended that "Townsend v. St. Marylebone" did not cover this case, because the entry in the list in that case was "dwelling-house," and not, as in the present case, "dwelling-house joint," which was expressly forbidden.

Mr. GRAHAM replied.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE gave judgment allowing the appeal. He said,—We have to deal with this case in the way in which it is presented to us. It is not open to us to consider objections which might have been, but have not in fact been, taken. One cannot look into the circumstances of this case without seeing that the claims of the three persons named Hussey could not have been supported, for this being a county two joint occupants only are allowed to be on the register by section 27 of 30 and 31 Vict., c. 102. It is probable also that the names of the persons jointly occupying the other two houses were the names of father and son, who might not be able to prove such occupation as the statutes require—viz., as "owner or tenant." The short point is this. There is an entry in the occupiers' list of persons whose qualification is described as "dwelling-house joint." The question seems to me to be whether we are bound to treat this claim as one for the household franchise, in which case it would be bad, or whether it may not be treated as a claim for the occupation franchise. So regarded, there is authority which settles the question. "Townsend v. Overseers of St. Marylebone" covers the point, supported by the later case of "Druitt v. Gosling." The language of the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher), who, in "Townsend v. St. Marylebone," differed from Mr. Justice Willes, shows that that learned Judge regarded the decision in the case as bearing the interpretation which this Court prefers to place upon it—namely, that where a qualification is named which may in fact be supported by the Reform Act of 1832, the mere fact that the word "dwelling-house" is used does not prevent the claim from being capable of being substantiated for a qualification other than the household franchise. Mr. Justice Darling has called my attention to another case—"Ford v. Boon" (L. R., 7 C. P., 150)—in which the same Judge again refers to "Townsend v. St. Marylebone." He says (p. 156):—"As to the main point, I confess that, but for the decision of this Court in 'Townsend v. St. Marylebone,' I should have had considerable doubt. The claim is in a borough in which there are qualifications in respect of the occupation of a house, and also in respect of an ownership of a freehold; and the claimant describes his qualification simply as 'house.' It was urged by Mr. Kingston that that description was not merely insufficient, but that it leaves out a material part of the qualification, and throws upon the objector the burden of preparing himself to meet a claim before the Revising Barrister which may be put in either of two ways; and in support of his argument he cited passages from the judgments of Mr. Justice Erie, in 'Daniel v. Camplin,' and of Mr. Justice Williams, in 'Howitt v. Stephens.' I must confess I should have thought the objection a very forcible one but for the case of 'Townsend v. St. Marylebone.' There the claimant, whose qualification was as joint occupier of a house of the value of more than £20 a year, described his qualification as 'dwelling-house.' Under that he might clearly have shown a qualification as an inhabitant occupier under the Representation of the People Act, 1867; and the decision of the Court, as I understand it, was, not that 'dwelling-house' did not sufficiently describe the qualification under that Act, but, assuming that it did, it also described a qualification under the old Reform Act, and might therefore be applied to that qualification. It is conceded by the learned counsel that a very slight alteration would be enough—if the qualification had been described as 'house and land' or 'house and garden,' for instance. The point is not one of substance, and, in our opinion, it is decided by the cases cited.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT and MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—I ought to have added that, even if we did not agree with the decision in "Townsend v. St. Marylebone," that case is one from which we should not dissent, but we do agree with it.

Leave to appeal was given.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1897.
Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Nov. 22.

DIEDERICHSSEN V. FARQUHARSON BROTHERS AND CO.*
Ship—Bill of lading—Charterparty—Incorporation of conditions.

The clause "Freight and all other conditions as per charterparty" held not to incorporate in the bills of lading a condition in the charterparty that the cargo should be at merchants' risk (Rigby, L.J. dissenting).

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 437) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence) reversing a judgment of the Common Serjeant, sitting at the Mayor's Court, London, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 437. The plaintiff was the owner of the ship Thes, and the defendants were the endorsees of a bill of lading for timber shipped upon the vessel at a port in Sweden for London. The ship was under charter, and by the charterparty the ship was to load a full and complete cargo of battens, including a deck cargo "at merchants' risk, . . . and . . . proceed to London . . . and deliver the same." The timber, which was carried on deck, was shipped under bills of lading which stated that the goods were "shipped in good order and well-conditioned, . . . and to be delivered in like good order and condition. . . . Freight and all other conditions as per charterparty." The action was brought in the Mayor's Court for freight. The defendants counterclaimed for damage to the goods. The defendants were also the endorsees of the other bills of lading for the cargo carried. The jury found that the goods were damaged while on the voyage to the extent of £10, that the damage was not caused by the negligence of the shipowner or his servants, that the ship was seaworthy when she sailed, and that the damage was not caused by unseaworthiness. The question of law, which arose upon the counter-claim, no question arising upon the claim, was whether the condition in the charterparty that the timber should be "at merchants' risk" was incorporated in the bills of lading. The Common Serjeant held that it was and gave judgment for the plaintiff upon the claim and counter-claim. The Divisional Court held that the words "at merchants' risk" were not incorporated in the charterparty and entered judgment for the defendants upon the counter-claim for £10. The plaintiff, by leave, appealed.

MR. J. LAWSON WALTON, Q.C., and MR. E. BEAVY, for the plaintiff, contended that the words "all other conditions as per charterparty" included all those conditions in the charterparty which were not inconsistent with and were applicable to the bill of lading—"Porteus v. Watney" (3 Q.B.D., 534); "Gullischnen v. Stewart" (13 Q.B.D., 317); "Gardner v. Trech- mann" (15 Q.B.D., 154); "Hamilton v. Mackie" (5 The Times Law Reports, 677). In most of those cases, and also in "Russell v. Niemann" (17 C.B., N.S., 163), "Gray v. Carr" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 522), and "Serraino v. Campbell" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 283), the words "all other conditions as per charterparty" followed the words "paying freight," and the general words were consequently limited to those conditions which were to be performed by the receiver of the goods. Here the general words followed "freight" alone, and could not be limited to conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. The words "at merchants' risk" were therefore incorporated in the bill of lading.

Mr. J. A. HAMILTON, for the defendants, contended that the word "freight" preceding the words "and all other conditions as per charterparty" was the same as if the words "paying freight" preceded those words, and that the rule of construction laid down in "Serraino v. Campbell" and "Manchester Trust v. Furness, Withy, and Co." ([1895] 2 Q.B., 539) was applicable. The terms as to the carriage were not "conditions" and were not incorporated. Again, the contract in the bill of lading was an absolute contract to carry. Apart from custom, of which no proof was given in the present case, it was implied in a contract to carry that the cargo should be stowed below deck, and if the cargo was carried on deck, it was carried at the shipowners' risk, "Royal Exchange Shipping Company v. Dixon" (12 App. Cas., 11). Therefore, liberty to carry the timber on deck and to do so "at merchants' risk" could not be incorporated in the bill of lading, as it would contradict it.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice Rigby dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment, in the course of which he said that they were called upon to consider the at one time much debated question as to how much of a charterparty is incorporated into a bill of lading which contained the words "he or they paying freight and all other conditions as per charterparty." The question in this case was whether the form of the charterparty as to the deck cargo being carried "at merchants' risk" was incorporated into the bill of lading by the words "freight and all other conditions as per charterparty," for, if not, the plaintiff was liable under the counter-claim to the defendants. There was a body of authority which had established conclusively that the words in a bill of lading, "paying freight for the goods and all other conditions as per charterparty," did not incorporate all the conditions of the charterparty, but only those conditions "which would apply to the person who has taken the bill of lading and is taking delivery of the cargo, such, for instance, as payment for demurrage, the payment of freight, the manner of paying, and so on." Those were the words of Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords in "Taylor v. Perrin" (cited in [1891] 1 Q.B., at p. 295). It would be a waste of time to go through all the cases upon this question, especially as this was done by Lord Justice Kay in this Court in 1890 in "Serraino v. Campbell" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 283), and he would only take three cases to show what had been held to be incorporated in a bill of lading containing the words "paying freight and all other conditions as per charterparty," and what was the rule of construction to be applied thereto. Thirty-three years ago, in the case of "Russell v. Niemann" (17 C.B., N.S., 163), Mr. Justice Willes gave the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas upon this point as follows:—"We now proceed to dispose of the second point—that is, whether the exception contained in the bill of lading is expanded by the exception in the charterparty. That depends upon whether the words 'and other conditions as per charterparty' include all the stipulations and conditions contained in that instrument, or whether they are not limited to conditions ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned—viz., payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It is a mere question of language and construction, and we think it is enough to say that the latter is the construction we put upon those words." That case had never been overruled, but, on the contrary, this Court in "Serraino v. Campbell" pointed out that it had been expressly approved of by the House of Lords. In "Serraino v. Campbell" Lord Esher, M.R., laid down the rule of construction thus:—"After full consideration, I think the words ought to be construed as meaning all the conditions of the charterparty which would have to be performed by the receiver of the goods." Lord Justice Lopes and Lord Justice Kay arrived at the same result. Again, in "Manchester Trust v. Furness, Withy, and Co." ([1895] 2 Q.B., 282, 539), Mr. Justice Mathew treated this rule of construction as then well known and settled, and in the same case on appeal the present Master of the Rolls said that the effect of the reference was to incorporate so much of the charterparty as related to the payment of freight and other conditions to be performed on the delivery of the cargo, but there was no authority whatever for incorporating more than that. The rule of construction was therefore settled by conclusive authority. It was now insisted by the plaintiff that when he by his captain signed this bill of lading containing the words "freight and all other conditions as per charterparty," the word "paying" being left out, he, by so doing, incorporated into the bill of lading conditions which otherwise would not have been incorporated. His Lordship could not agree with the contention that the word "freight" did not mean "paying freight" in this mercantile document. The words meant the same thing. If they were to accede to the plaintiff's contention they would, in his opinion, be unsettling that which had been long settled and upon the faith of which business had been transacted for years. In his opinion, the rule of construction above-mentioned applied to all bills of lading which sought to incorporate parts of a charterparty by the words "paying freight and all other conditions as per charterparty," or "freight and all other conditions as per charterparty," unless there was something therein clearly showing that the well-known rule was to be excluded. To point out that the contract of carriage contained in the bill of lading in the present case was absolute and without exceptions did not avail the plaintiff, for it did not, in his opinion, show that the rule was to be excluded, it being a rule as applicable to a bill of lading containing no exceptions as to one containing exceptions. He did not propose to discuss the question whether the term in the charterparty, "including a deck cargo at merchants' risk," was or was not inconsistent with the bill of lading, which was silent as to a deck cargo, and only covered a cargo which was to be carried at shipowners' risk. In his opinion the Divisional Court were right in holding that the clause in the charterparty was not incorporated into the bill of lading, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read a judgment in which he said that he was unable to concur in the conclusion that the counterclaim of the defendants should succeed. The question was one of construction only, and the issues were two:—(1) Whether the words "freight and all other conditions as per charterparty" in the bill of lading were to be construed to extend only to conditions to be performed by the holder of the bill of lading, in which case none of the terms of the charterparty relieving the shipowner from responsibility would be introduced; (2) whether the clause relied upon as a defence to the counterclaim ought not to be treated as incorporated by the general words of reference on the ground of its being repugnant to the other terms of the bill of lading. As to the first issue, the argument depended entirely upon the decisions of which "Serrano v. Campbell" was a conspicuous example. He had not the slightest intention of laying down anything inconsistent with that class of case. The real question was what those cases in fact decided, and it was as important not to extend them so as to cover a case not really included as to preserve their authority with reference to cases really covered by them. None of those cases went beyond what was laid down by Mr. Justice Willes in "Russell v. Niemann." In all of them the words were "paying freight and all other conditions as per charterparty," or their equivalent. Mr. Justice Willes held that they were limited to conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. That learned Judge and the Court of Appeal in "Serrano v. Campbell" treated the matter purely as a matter of construction of the very words used, and had no intention of laying down any general rule as to the meaning of the words "all other conditions" independently of the introductory words "paying freight." The Court of Appeal in "Gardner v. Trechmann" (15 Q.B.D., 154) seemed to him to have held that the words "all other conditions as per charterparty," when not controlled by the context, were sufficient to introduce all the terms of the charterparty not repugnant to the contract contained in the bill of lading. What was the effect of "freight" preceding the general words? Was it equivalent to the words "paying freight"? The word "performing" could not be brought in without first getting in "paying." "Freight as per charterparty" meant freight as fixed by the charterparty, and nothing else. The phrase did not convey the idea of payment any more than if the rate followed the word in the bill of lading itself without having to be imported from the charterparty. In each case the obligation to pay would be involved as an implication of law. But on the question of construction it was necessary to distinguish clearly between the interpretation of the language used and the consequences arising in law from using it. In his opinion the authorities relied upon were not applicable, and the reference could not be cut down to mean only conditions to be performed by the holder of the bill of lading. As to the second question—namely, whether the term "that a deck cargo was to be carried at merchants' risk" was to be rejected as repugnant to the bill of lading—the bill of lading was a contract of carriage, and in so far as the charterparty might contain terms not applicable to such a contract they would not be treated as incorporated. But here the term proposed to be introduced had direct reference to the carriage of the goods. In nearly every bill of lading and in nearly every charterparty there were provisions cutting down and limiting the absolute obligation of the shipowner to deliver. Was it more reasonable to suppose that the parties intended the contract to be interpreted literally, and so to incorporate the terms of the charterparty, or not? In the first case, the shipowner would be getting in freight a consideration commensurate with a limited obligation. In the second he would be entering into an exceptional contract. In his opinion the literal interpretation of the contract was the most reasonable one, and therefore the correct one.

Mandamus — Prerogative writ — Application granted—Admission of copyholder.

This was an application for a rule nisi for a prerogative writ of mandamus calling upon the lord and the steward of the manor of Kingsland to admit the applicants, who were the devisees of a copyholder of the manor, as tenants of a copyhold tenement in the manor.

Mr. A. LYTTELTON, for the applicants, said that the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy) had refused (ante p. 34) to grant a rule nisi for a prerogative writ of mandamus upon the ground that an action for a mandamus was the more convenient remedy. But the remedy by an action for a mandamus was only ancillary to an existing remedy at law, and in this case the applicants had no cause of action at law against the lord or the steward. There was an old equitable remedy by subpoena before 1760, but that remedy had fallen into decay, and since that date the only remedy had been by prerogative writ of mandamus. In this case the lord became entitled to a heriot on a tenants' admission, and by the custom of the manor the heriot payable was either the best beast, or the best jewel, or the best suit of wearing apparel of the deceased tenant. The farmer who had been tenant of this small copyhold farm had no beast, as he owned his cattle in common, and naturally he had no jewels, and so the farmer's best suit of wearing apparel was tendered to the lord (laughter), which he rejected, demanding a fee of 20 guineas. The learned counsel submitted that a prerogative writ of mandamus was the only remedy now available, and that therefore the well-known rule that a prerogative writ of mandamus would not be granted when there was another sufficient remedy did not apply; and he referred to "Reg. v. Lambourn Valley Railway Company" (22 Q.B.D., 463); "Smith v. Chorley District Council" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 532, 678); and "Baxter v. London County Council" (63 L.T., N.S., 767).

The COURT granted a rule nisi.

IN THE GOODS OF MARIA STILES, DECEASED.†

Executor—Renunciation—Retraction of renunciation.

The Court has power to permit an executor, who has renounced his executorship, to retract his renunciation.

This was a motion on behalf of Henry Tournay Stiles for liberty to retract his renunciation of his executorship to the will of the deceased, and, further, it was prayed that probate of the will might be granted to him as executor.

Mr. BARNARD appeared in support of the motion, and said that Maria Stiles had made a will on November 3, 1877, and subsequently, on August 18, 1879, executed a codicil. The executors to these testamentary documents were Mr. H. T. Stiles and Mr. Edmund Cammack. On her marriage the testatrix settled £1,000 which was invested by the trustees of the settlement. The continuing trustees of this settlement were a Mr. William Armstrong and Mr. Edmund Carmack. The deceased died on October 24, 1880, and on November 16, 1884, Henry Tournay Stiles renounced his executorship on the ground that the estate would be saved expense thereby, and on the ground that his co-executor, being a solicitor, would be better suited to fulfil the duties entailed. On December 3, 1884, probate of the will and codicil was granted, and in January, 1895, Edmund Carmack absconded, and he had never been heard of since. Inasmuch as part of the estate relating to the £1,000 invested under the settlement had still to be dealt with, the learned counsel said that he now applied to the Court to allow Mr. Stiles to withdraw his renunciation for this purpose. Whether or no the Court had power to do this did not appear to be very clearly decided, but it was submitted that there was power. If, however, the learned President decided that he was unable to do that, counsel said that he would ask that a grant of administration in a limited form should be made under the Act of 38 Geo. III., cap. lxxxvii., sections 1 and 3; but he put this merely as an alternative course.

The PRESIDENT.—Can a valid renunciation be retracted, do you say?

Mr. BARNARD.—Certainly, my Lord. What I contend is that section 79 of the Probate Act of 1857 has not interfered with the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts in regard to this matter. What that practice was, I submit, can be gathered from the cases I shall ask your Lordship to be good enough to consider. The meaning of section 79 of the Probate Act with regard to this point is limited to this—that where an executor has renounced his executorship it is not necessary to cite him in subsequent proceedings. In the case of “In the goods of George Badenoch,” reported in 3 Swabey and Tristram, p. 465, the headnote says:—“Where one of several executors, who, after intermeddling in his testator’s estate, executed a renunciation, and probate had been granted to his co-executors, the Court, on the application of the renunciant, declared his renunciation to be invalid and directed the record of it on the probate to be cancelled.” Lord Penzance in the course of the case, referring to the 79th section of the Act in question, said:—“There is nothing in it to prevent the Court from allowing a retraction according to the old practice in a case fit for it.” Of course this was but an obiter dictum, but coming from such a high authority no doubt your Lordship will give it due consideration. “In the goods of Gill” (L.R., 3 P. and M., 113), the headnote to the case reads as follows, “It has never been decided that an executor who has filed a renunciation of his rights may not afterwards retract such renunciation (notwithstanding section 79 of the Probate Act, 1857), but he certainly would not be permitted to do so unless he can show that such retraction will be for the benefit of the estate or of those interested under the deceased’s will.” There again the learned Judge said:—“Unless on fuller consideration I should feel that the words of the statute are imperative, I should not hastily decide that this Court is powerless to permit an executor who has renounced on good grounds to retract his renunciation. I do not decide the point on the present occasion.” In the case of “In the goods of Morant” (L.R., 3 P. and M., 151) it was held that “a party may retract a renunciation at any time before it is filed and recorded in the registry.” Lord Hannen there laid it down that “a renunciation does not exist as an effective instrument until it has been recorded.” Whether it can afterwards be retracted is another question. Your Lordship no doubt has in mind the case of “In the goods of Whitham” (reported at page 303 in L.R., 1 P. and M.). I think, however, that it is my duty to bring it under your Lordship’s notice, inasmuch as it appears that it is an authority against me.

The PRESIDENT, after listening with great attention to the argument of counsel, said that this point had long remained undecided. As far as he could see, he saw no indication that the Legislature had intended that the relief which the Court was now asked to give should be withheld. With regard to the case of “In the goods of Whitham,” referred to by Mr. Barnard, he thought that that case was quite distinct from the present case, as the retraction in that case was wanted for the specific purpose of renouncing a second time. The other cases cited showed clearly that the point had never yet been decided. He thought, therefore, that as it was for the benefit of the estate, there being the special circumstances alluded to by the Court in the cases referred to, since the co-executor in this case had absconded, he could properly grant the relief asked for, and therefore probate would issue to the applicant and leave be given to retract the renunciation.

Company—Debentures—Equitable and legal debenture-holders.

This was a claim in a debenture-holder’s action by a person to whom the defendant company were under an obligation to issue second debentures to rank in the receipt of dividends pari passu with the actual holders of debentures of the second series. Mr. Pegge was one of two plaintiffs, holders of debentures forming a first charge on the assets of the company. He had severed for the purpose of making this claim. In November, 1882, Mr. Pegge was a director of the company; the company required money to pay off debentures then falling due. Mr. Pegge and some other persons found the requisite money. The sum then advanced by Mr. Pegge was £300; he took as security a promissory note of the company for £800, carrying interest at 5 per cent., and an undertaking by the company at any time to issue to him debentures to a like amount of a series then being issued and forming a second charge on the assets of the company. In 1884 Mr. Pegge lent the company a further sum of £100 on similar terms. Judgment in the action was given in January, 1895. At the end of 1896 Mr. Pegge carried in a claim to be allowed to exercise his option to take debentures in lieu of the promissory notes he held, and to be treated as the holder of second debentures and to be paid pari passu with them. He had received interest on his promissory notes down to judgment. Some of the second debentures had not been issued. The Master before whom the matter was heard in Chambers rejected the claim, which was adjourned to Court by way of appeal, and now came on with the further consideration of the action.

Mr. Dighton Pollock, for Mr. Pegge, supported the claim; Mr. Ashton Cross (Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., with him), for the other plaintiff, opposed; and Mr. Hume Williams was for the company.

As there would not be enough, he understood, to pay interest, it was not necessary to go into the question whether he would be entitled to interest previously to his exercising his option.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY
V. THE RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL OF RUNCORN.*

Local Government—Sewers—Vesting in public authority—Exceptions—"Sewers made under local or private Act"—Public Health Act, 1875 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 55), sec. 13 (2).

The plaintiffs in this case were the London and North-Western Railway and the Great Western Railway Companies and they claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from connecting certain new sewers of the defendants in the township of Helsby and parish of Frodsham, in the county of Chester, with certain land drains and ditches belonging to the plaintiffs, and from causing or permitting sewage or water to flow from the said new sewers into the said land drains and ditches of the plaintiffs. The question at issue in the case was whether the land drains and ditches, which had been constructed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title on their own lands, were now vested in the plaintiffs, or, as the defendants alleged, had under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, become vested in the defendants as the rural sanitary authority of the district. The plaintiffs were the successors of a railway company constituted by an Act of 1846 (with which was incorporated the Railway Clauses Act of 1845) for the purpose of making a railway from the Chester and Birkenhead Railway to the Manchester and Birmingham Railway. This railway was made about the year 1850, and subsequently by an Act of 1861 was, together with all the rights and obligations of the original company, transferred to the plaintiffs. At the trial the defendants' case was rested on the alleged user of the ditches in question for the purpose of carrying off the sewage from certain houses near the line. This sewage, it was alleged, passed from the ditches into a system of pipes and drains which had been constructed by the plaintiffs for the purpose of land drainage, and consequently it was contended that these had become sewers within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, and were now vested in the defendants.

Mr. Hastings, Q.C., and Mr. Shearman were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. Hewitt for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment this morning, came to the conclusion upon the evidence that a certain quantity of sewage did find its way from the houses in question into the pipes or drains on the plaintiffs' lands, but that at the same time there was nothing to affect the plaintiffs with knowledge that before 1896 such sewage did so pass into their system of drains or pipes. His Lordship further came to the conclusion of fact that these drains and pipes were not constructed for the purpose of carrying away sewage from any house, but were constructed (in the language of the Act of 1845) for the purpose of carrying the water "as clearly from the lands lying near or affected by the railway as before the making of the railway." After referring to sections 4, 13, 15, and 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, his Lordship then said that the contention on behalf of the defendants might be stated as follows:—The pipes and drains were at the present time and were previously to 1896 used de facto for the drainage of more than one building only; consequently they were "sewers" within the definition of section 4 and were vested in the defendants under section 13. To this the plaintiffs answered (1) that none of the owners of the houses in question had acquired against the plaintiffs any legal title to send sewage into these pipes and drains: that according to the doctrine of "Mulliner v. Midland Railway Company" (11 Ch.D., 611), approved by the House of Lords in "Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald" (8 App. Cas., 623), it was competent for the plaintiffs at any time to put an end to the user which had taken place, and that the vesting under section 13 did not put an end to this right—see "Reg. v. Godmanchester Board of Health" (5 B. and S., 886; L.R., 1 Q.B., 328), where a strong opinion was expressed that the Public Health Act, 1848, was not intended to interfere with rights of a private nature; (2) that the rights vested in the plaintiffs by the special Act for a specific purpose could not be held to be overridden by a subsequent statute conferring on a public body general powers for a different purpose; and (3) that the pipes and drains in question, if sewers within the Act, were "sewers made and used for the purpose of draining land under a local or private Act of Parliament," and consequently fell within the second exception in section 13. His Lordship came to a conclusion in favour of the plaintiffs on this third point, and it was consequently unnecessary for him to express a concluded opinion on either of the other two. With respect, however, to the first, his Lordship said that as at present advised he was not satisfied that the plaintiffs' argument was consistent with the general scheme of the Public Health Act, 1875. It was well established by cases decided subsequently to "Reg. v. Godmanchester Local Board" that the Public Health Act, 1875, did apply to sewers constructed by the owner of houses on his own land for the use of those houses; and consequently the Act did to some extent interfere with private rights. As regarded the second point, although the rule as to the construction of statutes which was relied on was well established, still it was one which yielded to indications of contrary intention. Section 13 of the Act of 1875 appeared to show that the Legislature contemplated that the provisions of that section might possibly affect sewers which had been brought into existence under prior legislation, for there were excepted from the operation of the very wide terms of the enacting part a class of sewers made under the authority of certain Acts of Parliament, and his Lordship was not at present satisfied that other sewers of a different statutory origin were meant to be exempted. With regard to the third point, it was said that the pipes and drains in question were not made under a local or private Act, but under a general statute—namely, the Railway Clauses Act, 1845. It was to be observed, however, that the special Act under which the railway was constructed did in terms incorporate the Act of 1845. The special Act must therefore be read as if the provisions in the Railway Clauses Act had been repeated verbatim therein. It seemed to his Lordship, therefore, that the pipes and drains were made under the special Act. How the matter would have stood if there had been no express incorporation of the public Act it was unnecessary to consider. In the result, therefore, his Lordship gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

EX PARTE DAVID HOPE KYD AND OTHERS.*

Election Law—School Board—Illegal hiring—
Application for relief—Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, secs.
16 and 20—Notice of application, sufficiency of.

An application for relief under the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, may be properly made before the election is held.

This was a motion on behalf of David Hope Kyd, David Laing, Charles Lancelot Andrews Skinner, and William Winnett, candidates for the election for the School Board for London (Westminster Division) for an order allowing the act of using on November 8, 1897, the premises known as St. George's Institute, Little Grosvenor-street, for holding a meeting for the purpose of promoting or procuring their election, being premises on part of which intoxicating liquors are supplied to members of a workmen's club, to be an exception from the provisions of the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, which would otherwise make the same an illegal hiring, on the ground that such act arose from inadvertence, and did not arise from any want of good faith. It appeared from the affidavits that there is an entrance to the hall of the institute in Little Grosvenor-street, and also one in Grosvenor-mews. At the entrance in Grosvenor-mews, by the side of the door, is a board, having painted on it "St. George's, Hanover-square, Men's Club." As one enters the door in Grosvenor-mews there is a small passage, after which a flight of winding stairs leads up to the gallery of the hall and to the said men's club. There is no means of reaching the gallery except by ascending the stairs. At the foot of the staircase is a door, which leads into a room or lobby, which leads into the hall. Refreshments and beer can be obtained in the workmen's club. Neither of the applicants nor their agent had any knowledge that refreshments of any description were supplied on any part of the premises which in any way communicated with the hall. It appeared that no bills or notices of the present application had been posted in any part of the electoral division.

Mr. S. H. DAY, in support of the motion, said that under section 16 of the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., cap. 70), what had been done was an illegal hiring, and the application for relief was made under section 20 of the Act. Notice of the application had been given to the other candidates and to the returning officer.

Mr. A. H. SPOKES said that he appeared for one of the other candidates—viz., Hubert Morgan-Browne. He did not oppose the application, but wished to place the facts before the Court, and applied for an adjournment. It was not the practice to apply for relief before the election. Other illegal acts might be committed which might influence the Court in exercising its discretion as to whether relief should be granted. No notice of the application had been posted. With the exception of that given to the candidate and returning officer, no notice of the application had been given to any one except by advertisements in The Times, Standard, and Pimlico News, and these were not papers which the supporters of his clients would be likely to see. All the rules as to what ought to be done were laid down in "Re Election of County Councillors" (5 The Times Law Reports, 173). Moreover, according to the practice, the affidavits ought to have been delivered four days before the application. Two were delivered on Saturday and one on Monday, and that was not within a reasonable time.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in giving judgment, said that it seemed to him that this was a case in which an admitted breach of the law arose from inadvertence and not from want of good faith. It was a matter in which the Court could and ought to give relief. An objection had been taken that the application was premature, but the Court had consulted a most experienced officer and had been informed by him that the application was properly made before the election was held. The affidavits were delivered within a sufficient time. It was also said that notices of the application ought to have been posted as well as advertisements being published in the district in which the election was held. It appeared, however, that the Courts had not insisted, for some time past, upon the posting of notices even in Parliamentary elections, and in the present case the notice given might be held to be sufficient. The relief asked for would, therefore, be granted.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred, and added that it appeared to him that, in the public interest, there was a great deal to be said in favour of these applications being made with as little delay as possible. The truth was more likely to be arrived at when the matter was fresh, and the result of the election unknown. If a candidate were not elected the matter might be allowed to drop.

Relief asked for granted. Costs reserved.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,) 1897.
Chitty and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Nov. 24.

EDWARDES' MENU COMPANY V. CHUDDEIGH.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Injunction.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 47), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant against the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, which is reported in The Times of the 18th inst. The plaintiff company moved before the learned Judge for an injunction, until the trial or further order, to restrain the defendant, Mr. Arthur Chudleigh, who was or is the lessee of the Court Theatre, from excluding the plaintiffs from the bars, refreshment room, cloak-room, and wine cellar of the theatre, in breach of an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant. By the agreement in question, which was dated February 6, 1896, it was provided that the defendant should, "so long as the Court Theatre should remain in his hands," let to the plaintiff company, at a weekly rent of £25, "the free and exclusive use" of the bars, &c., the agreement carrying with it the privilege of letting spaces for advertisements in the bars, &c., and selling programmes. The agreement was carried out until July 9, 1897, when the theatre was closed for the summer season. Upon its being reopened in October, the defendant, as the plaintiffs alleged, refused to allow them the use of the bars, &c., and the plaintiffs then brought this action, and served the defendant with a notice of motion for an injunction as above stated. The defendant's case was that the agreement in question had been entered into by him on behalf of the Court Syndicate (Limited), who were then the real tenants of the theatre, and that he was merely their manager; that his tenancy came to an end on July 31 last; and that negotiations were in progress between the owner of the theatre and himself, acting on behalf of another syndicate called the Buckingham Syndicate (Limited), for a new tenancy of the theatre, but no lease had yet been executed. He admitted, however, that he had not yet given up possession of the theatre, but he contended that the theatre was no longer "in his hands" within the meaning of the agreement. It appeared that he had made an offer to relet the bars, &c., to the plaintiffs, but at an increased rent of £30 a week, in consequence, as he said, of his having improved and enlarged the bars. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the theatre remained in the defendant's hands within the meaning of the agreement, it being under his control as manager, and his Lordship accordingly granted the injunction. The defendant appealed.

Mr. a'Beckett Terrell was for the defendant; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. G. Cave, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question turned entirely upon the construction of the agreement. In his Lordship's opinion, the construction which Mr. Justice Kekewich had put upon the agreement was perfectly right. So long as the defendant had control over the theatre as manager so long were the plaintiff company to be entitled to the benefit of the agreement. Upon the facts proved his Lordship had no doubt that Mr. Chudleigh had all along had the control of the theatre as the manager. The theatre had, to use the words of the agreement, "remained in his hands" from the date of the agreement till now, and it was still in his hands. Mr. Justice Kekewich was perfectly justified in granting the interlocutory injunction.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC V. LA COMPAGNIE
FRANCO-BELGE DU CHEMIN DE FER DU NORD DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE SUD-AFRICAINE.*

Jurisdiction—Foreign Government—Counter-claim against, when allowable.

In an action in this country by a foreign Government defendants cannot counter-claim on questions independent of the subject-matter of the action.

This action was commenced by the Transvaal Government against the defendant railway company, which is a Belgian company, Baron Robert Oppenheim, and Messrs. Barclay and Lloyds banks to restrain the dealing with large sums that had been deposited with the defendant banks in the joint names of Baron Oppenheim, as trustee for the railway company, and the late Beelaerts van Blokland, as trustee for the Transvaal Government, and for the appointment of a new trustee in the place of Beelaerts van Blokland. On notice for an interim injunction, it may be remembered, the money in the hands of the bankers was by arrangement paid into Court, and the bankers were dismissed the action. The money in England had been placed here in accordance with an agreement between the Transvaal Government and the railway company, concessionnaires for the construction of a branch line to the Selati mines. The railway company put in a defence and counter-claim, asking, by the latter, relief on three heads:—(1) Payment by the Transvaal Government of three sums of £60,000, £1,800, and £147,895 16s. 8d., alleged to be due in respect of the concession; (2) £100,000 damages for libel; (3) an injunction to restrain the plaintiff Republic from proceeding in their own Courts to avoid the concession and expropriate the property of the railway company in South Africa, or, in the alternative, £500,000 damages. The plaintiffs on summons in Chambers got an order (confirmed by the Court of Appeal) (13 The Times L.R., 567) striking out the counter-claim in respect of libel. The present application was a summons, brought on motion, to strike out the other two branches of the counter-claim.

Mr. SWINFEN RADY, Q.C., and Mr. WAGGETT, for the Republic, argued that it was well settled law that a foreign Government cannot be sued in this country, with the exception only that, when it has itself taken proceedings in this country against a British subject or in respect of funds in this country, it has so far submitted to the jurisdiction that cross-proceedings (since the Judicature Acts by counter-claim), for the purpose of discovery or in mitigation of the relief claimed, can be taken against such Government.

Mr. VERNON SMITH, Q.C., and Mr. WHINNEY, for the railway company, argued that the Republic had, by itself taking proceedings, submitted to the jurisdiction generally so far as related to any question in relation to the whole agreement relating to the railway concession.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH did not think it necessary to call for a reply. He said the exemption of a foreign Government from the jurisdiction of the Courts in this country, with very limited exceptions, was established by a number of cases, of which he would only refer to two. His Lordship read a passage from the judgment of Lord Langdale in "The Duke of Brunswick v. the King of Hanover" (6 Beav. 1, at p. 38). "The cases which we have upon this point go no further than this—that, where a foreign Sovereign files a bill or prosecutes an action in this country, he may be made a defendant to a cross-bill or bill of discovery in the nature of a defence to the proceeding which the foreign Sovereign has himself adopted. There is no case to show that, because he may be plaintiff in the Courts of this country for one matter, he may, therefore, be made a defendant in the Courts of this country for another and quite distinct matter." And the exposition of the law by Lord Justice James in "Strousberg v. Republic of Costa Rica" (20 Weekly Reporter, 125). "It appears to me that it is due from one nation to another that one Sovereign should not assume or usurp jurisdiction over another Sovereign. It is a violation of the respect due to every Sovereign, whether it be a monarchy or a Sovereign State, to issue the process of our Courts against such Sovereign or State. There is, in my opinion, but one exception, if it can be called an exception, to that rule—namely, that where a foreign Sovereign or State comes into the municipal Courts of this country for the purpose of obtaining a remedy, then by way of defence to that proceeding (by way of counter-claim if necessary), to the extent of defeating that claim, the person sued here may file a cross-claim, or take any other proceeding against that Sovereign State for the purpose of enabling complete justice to be done between them." Applying the principles laid down in the judgments he had read as to the third part of the counter-claim, he said it was conceded that no order could be made restraining proceedings in the foreign Court: it was hardly suggested that damages in respect of that could be given; the more serious part of the case was the claims for three sums in respect of alleged breach of contract; they were not sums in respect of which the defendant railway company had any claim against the funds, the subject-matter of this action; he did not see how, having regard to the passages he had read, the counter-claim on this head against the plaintiff Government could be sustained; it was entirely outside and independent of the subject-matter of the action. His Lordship struck out the counter-claim; but, as the whole of the counter-claim might have been disposed of by one application, he gave no costs.

CHANDLER V. BLOGG.*

Insurance—Marine—Collision, what constitutes —Striking sunken vessel.

Damage caused by striking a sunken vessel held covered by a policy against collision.

This was an action on a policy of reinsurance. The plaintiff and the defendant were both underwriters at Lloyd's. The plaintiff and others had underwritten policies of insurance on the steamship Newburn, by which she was insured to the total amount of £300 for 12 months, commencing February 12, 1894. The policies were in the usual Lloyd's form. By a policy of reinsurance the defendant underwrote one-third of the sum insured, the policy being declared to be a reinsurance, subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy, and to pay as might be paid thereon, but only to pay all claims for loss and (or) damage done and (or) received through collision. On December 2, 1894, during the continuance of the risk insured, the Newburn while swinging off the Regent's Canal in the River Thames struck, with her port side abreast the engine-room, the sailing barge Lizzie, which had just been sunk by collision with the steamship Lodore. The Newburn remained fast on the Lizzie for several hours. The Lizzie was raised on December 3, and having sustained comparatively small damage at once sailed to Faversham, her home port. The Newburn received considerable damage, and the plaintiff had paid a loss at the rate of £20 10s. 1d. per cent. The defendant contended that the contact between the Newburn and the sunken barge Lizzie was not a "collision" within the meaning of the policy.

Mr. ROBSON, Q.C. (with him Mr. Scrutton), for the plaintiff, submitted that the word "collision" was applied not only to the impact of a moving object with another moving object, but also with a stationary.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. JOSEPH HURST, for the defendant, contended that the word "collision" when used by itself in a policy only meant the coming into contact of two navigable things. The Lizzie when at the bottom of the river was not navigable. She was for the time being quite useless, a mere sunken wreck.

1893, P. 248); "The Zeta" (L.R., 1893, A.C., 468); "Reischer v. Borwick" (L.R., 1894, 2 Q.B., 548); "Hough v. Head" (54 L.J., Q.B., 294).

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he agreed with Mr. Walton's definition of "collision," as arising out of the circumstance of two things which could be navigated coming into contact. The Lizzie was a barge, which, for the moment, happened to be sunk. For a few hours, no doubt, she could not be navigated, any more than a ship on the mud awaiting the incoming tide, or a vessel at anchor with an unshipped rudder, could be navigated. But in these cases it could not be said that the vessels were not navigable vessels, and in the same way the Lizzie was, all the time, a navigable vessel. There had therefore been a collision within the meaning of the clause in the policy, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff with costs.

IN RE GLUBB (BARNFIELD V. ROGERS).*

Will—Bequest—Charitable legacies—Construction of will.

This action was brought for the administration of the estate of the late Rev. Peter Southmead Glubb, of Kevor, in the parish of Falmouth, who died on April 26, 1891, leaving property of considerable value. He made a holograph will, dated May 7, 1889, in which he mentioned that he was entitled to a vested reversion on the death of Mrs. Lyne Stephens (she died on September 2, 1894), out of the residue estate of his relation, her deceased husband, being a 93rd portion of the same. The testator bequeathed a number of legacies, some of which were charitable, and with regard to those legacies questions arose, the language of the will being peculiar. The testator directed that all his bequests made by his will, except those made to his wife, should be postponed and not paid until after one year from the death of Mrs. Lyne Stephens, unless his share of the reversionary Lyne Stephens residuary estate had been realized in possession of his trustees and executors, and not until the time had arrived when that estate had been so reduced into the possession and at the command of his representatives, but he trusted that all would be paid off without unnecessary delay, before or after the year had elapsed. The will also contained the following clauses:—"I give, conditionally as hereafter set forth, the following sums of money to benevolent and charitable institutions:—To the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, whose offices have been established in Jermyn-street, London, the sum of £1,000, provided the society can show how their benevolent operations can be by this sum extended and increased £2,000 or double the sum received by them under this will, and proved to be the result of this bequest to the satisfaction of the Bishop of London and the Deans of St. Paul's and Westminster. To the infirmary or hospital or dispensary established in Cornwall for the benefit and assistance of really poverty-stricken and sick people, the sum of £800; but, inasmuch as more than one such may be in existence in that county, I direct that inquiry shall be made as to the one most in need of assistance, and the question left to the decision of the Sheriff of Cornwall, who shall state his reasons and the circumstances influencing him publicly or by advertisement, but preference shall be given ceteris paribus to that institution which can prove itself least guilty of carelessly and indiscriminately affording assistance to persons able to pay for their cures or relief, or who have relations able to do so and should do so. I give unto the National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys, in Wright's-lane, Kensington, founded 1877, the sum of £800, provided the boys are educated to get their living. I give to the charity designated Dr. Barnardo's Home for Friendless and Destitute Children, the sum of £800, provided the Bishop of London and the Deans of St. Paul's and Westminster will testify after inquiry that this charity is fairly doing the work which Dr. Barnardo advertises himself as performing, and provided his accounts are audited and tested by some independent authority and made openly, I having no reason to distrust him or his work. I give unto the institutions for the care of idiots established near Powderham Castle in Devon, and the other or similar institution, an Asylum for Idiots, established some 41 years ago, and which in 1884 celebrated its anniversary in Aldersgate-street, London, the sum of £800, provided each institution for idiots can prove that they have been obliged for lack of funds not to take in patients, which, having the means, they would assuredly have done. Proof must be adduced by the institution claiming any bequest to the satisfaction of the aforesaid Bishop and Deans as regards the latter, and the Bishop of Exeter and the Dean as to the former. I give to the institution, whatever its correct title may be, which receives or assists 'incurables' and incurables only, the sum of £800, and, provided they can fulfil my conditions seven years after my decease, another sum of £800, provided the society can prove satisfactorily that they have been obliged to deny the benefit of their charity to candidates for want of funds, and legal proof may be required. The conditions to be strictly enforced and exacted on and from each and every benevolent or charitable institution to be benefited by and named in this my will before participating in its provisions are these, namely:—Each such society or institution shall not be entitled to receive all or any part of my respective benefactions hereinbefore mentioned in their favour until the would-be recipient shall produce indisputable proof, or such as would satisfy the County Court Judge, that my respective legacy has been the means of obtaining fresh donations respectively to meet my gift, either entirely or in part, that is to say, pound for pound, thus doubling the sum in each case taken or obtained from my estate under this will. A committee of not less than three persons connected with such institutions; and of whom no officers or managers shall form a part, or any one in his private capacity peculiarly interested, shall adduce proof and evidence that my bequest has attracted fresh donations or subscriptions which otherwise would not have been preferred or rendered, or, in other words, were given to meet my bequest, which such proofs and evidence shall be submitted not only to my trustee and executors, but on demand to the other societies benefited by my will who would have a residuary interest derived from a provision hereinafter mentioned, and finally to the persons interested finally in the residue not disposed of otherwise by my will a final appeal would be made to the County Court of the county wherein the institution was established, and it is my will that the whole or any part of these charitable bequests respectively not absorbed or taken up or not met with equivalent sums as aforesaid shall after four years be offered to the charitable institutions herein named, observing the order appointed by me as regards priority and reasonable time be allowed to each separatim to avail itself of my gift as before prescribed, provided that at the end of seven years have expired all such sums not taken up shall sink into my residuary estate hereinafter disposed of." The testator appointed three nephews and a niece his residuary legatees, and three of them are the plaintiffs. The trustees and executors are the defendants. The Master by his certificate found, with regard to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, "the conditions have been satisfied or fulfilled, but not within the four years prescribed by the will." With regard to the "infirmary or hospital or dispensary established in Cornwall, &c.," the Master found that the Cornwall Royal Infirmary, Truro, was meant, and that "a committee was appointed to satisfy or fulfil the conditions in the testator's will on January 28, 1897, and subscriptions have been received to meet the bequest of £800 to the amount of £887 12s. 2d., but none of such subscriptions were obtained within the four years prescribed by the will." With regard to the National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys the Master found "the conditions have been satisfied or fulfilled." With regard to Dr. Barnardo's Home the Master found "the conditions have been satisfied or fulfilled, but not within the four years prescribed by the will." With regard to the "institution for the care of idiots, established near Powderham Castle," the Master found that the Western Counties Idiot Asylum, Starcross, was meant, and that "the conditions as to proof to the satisfaction of the Bishop and Dean of Exeter have been satisfied or fulfilled, but the condition as to obtaining an equivalent amount of subscriptions within the four years prescribed by the will has not been and cannot be satisfied or fulfilled." By "Asylum for Idiots established some 41 years ago, &c.," the Master found that the Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood, was meant, and that "the conditions have been satisfied or fulfilled." With regard to the "institution, whatever its title may be, which receives or assists incurables, and incurables only," the Master found that the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, was meant, and that "the conditions have not been satisfied or fulfilled, nor are they capable of being satisfied or fulfilled." The action now came on for hearing upon further consideration, as well as upon some applications to vary the Master's finding. One question argued was whether the period of four years mentioned in the will was to run from the date of the testator's own death, or from that of the death of Mrs. Lyne-Stephens. If the latter date was the right starting point, the period of four years would not yet have expired.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C.; and Mr. Younger were for Dr. Barnardo's Home and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. J. G. Wood were for the British Home for Incurables; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the Cornwall Royal Infirmary; Mr. Rawlins, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker were for the residuary legatees; Mr. Waggett was for the Western Counties Idiot Asylum; Mr. Frederic Thompson was for the Earlswood Asylum; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Rowden were for the executors; Mr. Ingle Joyce was for the Attorney-General.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH held that the four years ran from the testator's death and so affirmed the finding of the Master. But his Lordship held that a charity which had in part complied with the condition, by raising funds to meet the bequest in part, would be entitled to the benefit of the bequest pro tanto. His Lordship held also that the two legacies of £800 to the British Home for Incurables were distinct, and that though the charity was not entitled to the first £800 it might become entitled to the second £800, if the conditions were fulfilled within the seven years from the death of the testator.

THE VESTRY OF ST. MATTHEW, BETHNAL-GREEN, V. THE SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON.*

Metropolis—Sewers—Liability to repair—Sewers made without approval of Metropolitan Board of Works or of vestry—Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

Decision of Court of Appeal ([1896] 2 Q.B., 319) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an order of the Queen's Bench Division directing a writ of mandamus to issue directed to the vestry of the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, commanding them to maintain and from time to time to repair a certain conduit for drainage which passes through land purchased by the School Board for London.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. Beavan appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. Cunningham Glen for the respondents.

The facts of the case were these. In July, 1894, the School Board for London acquired the freehold of certain lands situated in the appellants' parish, which included a street known as Tyrrell-street, in which were certain houses. Previously to 1866 these houses had no drains, but in that year a line of pipes was laid by the then owner of the houses to carry the sewage to the sewer belonging to the appellants. No evidence was forthcoming of any notice in writing having been given by the owner of the houses of his intention to lay the line of pipes or of any order of the vestry in relation thereto having been made. In the Queen's Bench Division and in the Court of Appeal it was found as facts that the vestry knew and did not disapprove of the connexion of the line of pipes with the sewer vested in the vestry. The question raised was whether in these circumstances the line of pipes constituted a drain which the respondents would have to repair, or whether it was a sewer which the appellants were bound to repair. The Queen's Bench Division held that the line of pipes constituted a sewer and issued a mandamus commanding the vestry to repair it, and their decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The vestry appealed.

At the conclusion of the arguments, Their LORDSHIPS dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment, said that the circumstances in which the case came before their Lordships were somewhat unsatisfactory. The parties did not seem to have recognized the importance of bringing the whole system of drainage before the House, and not merely a plan of the immediate neighbourhood. It was clear, apart from statutory definitions, that this was what everybody would understand to be a sewer. He had not the smallest doubt that the officers of the vestry perfectly well knew what was being done. It was not a small operation; the highway must have been taken up and the local authorities must have been fully aware of the purpose and effect of the work. If, then, this was a sewer, it was impossible to avoid the application of the language of the Act of Parliament or the conclusion that the sewer was vested in the vestry and must be repaired by them. There were circumstances in which a combined system of drains might be constructed, under an order of the vestry, by a private person, and in that case the burden of repair would rest with that private person. In such a case the combination would still be a drain, and not a sewer. But there was no evidence of any such state of things. It was clear that those who alleged that this was a drain and not a sewer must prove that such an order of the vestry was made. But no such order was produced, and he did not believe that any order of the kind was ever made. Then it was said that the vestry had no authority to make this drain or sewer without the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He was disposed to believe that the vestry did procure that sanction. But, if they did not, the construction of the system was not necessarily unlawful. There was a fatal objection to the contention that this was merely a drain, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed.

LORD HERSCHELL concurred, and said that this construction clearly came within the definition of "sewer" in the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, unless it was shown to be taken out of that definition and brought within the definition of "drain." This could only be done by showing that there was an order of the vestry under the provisions of section 74. There was no record of such an order and no reason to believe that any such order was made. As to the argument that the approval of the Board of Works was necessary before the vestry could construct a sewer, the only evidence was that of the gentleman who had been vestry clerk since 1884, who said that there was no record in the vestry books. But that was not evidence that the work was done without the sanction of the Board of Works. But, even if it were, it did not follow that this was not a sewer and repairable by the vestry. The Legislature had not said that, if the sanction of the board was not obtained, the structure was not a sewer, and an act was not necessarily void because the requisite consents to its performance were not obtained.

LORD MORRIS and LORD SHAND concurred.

The appeal was, therefore, dismissed with costs.

IN RE HUMPHREYS, EX PARTE ROBERTS.*

Solicitor—Costs—Power of Court to charge property recovered with payment of costs—Bankruptcy proceedings—Solicitors Act, 1860, sec. 28—Rule 125 of Bankruptcy Rules—Order of priority of payments.

This was an appeal from the decision of the County Court Judge at Portmadoc, in Wales, and raised a question of some importance to solicitors in the following circumstances. Early in February, 1895, W. Humphreys, a farmer in Carnarvonshire, having realized his assets, sailed for Australia with about £800. On March 6 a warrant for his arrest for the alleged forgery of a promissory note was issued in England at the instance of the Public Prosecutor, and on this warrant Humphreys was arrested on April 1, 1895, at Adelaide, Australia, by the Adelaide police, and £813, which was found upon him, was taken charge of by the Adelaide police. Meantime, on March 15, 1895, a receiving order was made against W. Humphreys on a creditor's petition presented in the Portmadoc County Court, and on March 23 following he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the appellant, Mr. Roberts, became the trustee in bankruptcy, with a committee of inspection. Messrs. Lloyd-George and Co., solicitors at Cricieth, were employed as solicitors for the petitioning creditor, and were appointed by the committee solicitors for the trustee in bankruptcy. On April 10, 1895, the trustee in bankruptcy signed the usual official report and request to the Judge of the County Court to order a prosecution of the bankrupt for offences alleged to have been committed by him under sections 11 and 12 of the Debtors Act, 1869, which prosecution was ordered on April 24, 1895, and a constable was sent out to Adelaide and returned with the bankrupt as his prisoner. The bankrupt was discharged by the justices on the alleged charge of forgery, and was subsequently tried at the assizes for the alleged offences under the Debtors Act, 1869, and was acquitted. No special resolution was passed by the committee of inspection authorizing Messrs. Lloyd-George and Co. to prosecute the bankrupt for the alleged bankruptcy offences under the Debtors Act, 1869, but they acted as solicitors for the prosecution. In the meantime a power of attorney was sent out to Adelaide by Messrs. Lloyd-George and Co., as solicitors for the trustee in bankruptcy, under which the £813 in the hands of the police was remitted home to the trustee, and it was the only asset in the bankruptcy. On November 10, 1896, the County Court Judge, on a petition presented by Messrs. Lloyd-George and Co. in the bankruptcy and under the Solicitors Act, 1860, held that the £813 had been recovered and preserved for the bankrupt's estate through the instrumentality of proceedings duly instituted by Messrs. Lloyd-George and Co. on behalf of the trustee, and granted them a charging order thereon for all their costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the recovery thereof, including their costs and expenses in procuring the arrest of the bankrupt upon the charges for the alleged offences under the Debtors Act, 1869, and of the proceedings taken before the justices preliminary to and consequent upon such arrest. The trustee appealed against this decision.

Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington appeared for the appellant; Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. Evans appeared for the solicitors.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the considered judgment of the Court as follows:—On the facts in evidence and the findings of the Judge we come to the conclusion that the solicitors were employed by the trustee, with the sanction of the committee of inspection, expressly or mainly for the purpose of the recovery of the money in question for the benefit of the creditors. Therefore three questions of law are raised, each of them of some importance and difficulty. The first is whether the money can be regarded as having been recovered or preserved by the solicitors in or by the bankruptcy proceedings. No jurisdiction was exercised by the Bankruptcy Court in or towards the recovery or preservation of it. So far as appears all that was done was this. The solicitors, in their capacity as solicitors employed by the trustee, made an application for the money to the police authorities in Adelaide, and obtained it from them. The mere fact that this was done by the solicitors as solicitors in the bankruptcy does not seem to us sufficient. Suppose that I instruct a solicitor to bring an action to recover my horse from a person who has wrongfully obtained possession of it, that the solicitor commences an action against that person, but, hearing that the horse is in the hands of a third party, applies to the third party for and receives from him the horse, could it be said that the horse was recovered or preserved by or in the action within the meaning of the statute? On the contrary, the action in such a case has been ineffectual, and may have been improvident. The second question is whether, if the money ought to be regarded as recovered or preserved in the bankruptcy proceedings, the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction to make a charging order under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860. Prima facie the proceedings in a bankruptcy appear to be, within the language of the section, a "suit or proceeding in a Court of justice;" nor does there seem to be any force in the objection that the money was already vested in the trustee by the bankruptcy. Property is often recovered in an action by a solicitor for the very reason that it was already vested in his client. Nor do we think the question decided by "In re Suffolk" (20 Q.B.D., 693) or by "In re Wood" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 314). Apart from these authorities the principal difficulty in the way of holding that there may be cases in which a Bankruptcy Court could make such an order is that Rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules prescribes a certain order of priority of payments, and the effect of a charging order would presumably be to vary this order of payment in favour of the solicitor, although he must be taken to have accepted his retainer with knowledge of the prescribed priority. Although in the view which we have taken of the first question it may not be necessary to express an opinion, on this second point we do not at present see how this difficulty could be got over. The third question, again, arises only if the views above expressed are wrong. If the Court is entitled to make an order to what costs will the order extend? On the one side it is said that the order will extend to all the solicitor's costs in the bankruptcy and in prosecutions directed by the Court. On the other side it is said that the order ought to be limited to the costs of the actual application for and obtaining the money. We do not think that the whole of the proceedings in a bankruptcy can for this purpose be regarded as necessarily one. There may be separate cases against each of ten or of a hundred debtors of the bankrupt. The claims of each of ten or of a hundred creditors may have to be disputed in several ways, and in such a case it could hardly be contended that money recovered from one debtor could be charged with the costs of all the cases. On the other hand, there may be instances in which all the proceedings in the Court really are directed to one matter, and in such a case the charge, if any, might properly extend to all the costs. In the present case we think that we have not sufficient information to enable us to decide on which side of the line the case falls, and that, if it were necessary to decide this question, the matter ought to go back for further inquiry. The appeal will be allowed with costs here and below.

Q.B. Div. (Wright and Kennedy, JJ.) } 1897.
Nov. 26.

BE AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND THE CITY OF LONDON BREWERY COMPANY.*

Metropolis—Street improvement—Valuation for "betterment"—Publichouse—Evidence as to takings—Licensed "tied" premises—Tied house covenant, whether to be considered in the "initial" valuation.

This was a special case stated by an arbitrator appointed by the Local Government Board on a betterment question arising under the London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act, 1895, in respect of "tied" licensed premises. Under that Act an "initial" valuation of property affected is to be made before the improvement takes effect, and then within three years after it has been completed an assessment is to be made on the improved value as a basis for a charge to be imposed on property the value of which is permanently increased by the improvement. The question raised was whether in respect of licensed "tied" premises the value of that covenant was to be taken into account. The lessors, the brewery company, desired that the initial valuation should be made as high as possible, so that the increase in value on which a charge might be made should be kept down. The house in question was a licensed house known as the Old Rose, 42 and 44, Tanner-street. The tenant had a lease of less than 21 years. A question arose as to the meaning of the words "excluding from each such valuation any trade interest" in section 36 of the said Act. By an order made by the Hon. Baron Pollock upon an originating summons of July 7, 1896, the arbitrator was ordered to make his valuation (in the said order called an award) in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. The Court having on the 1st day of November, 1897, considered the matter, it was ordered that the award be remitted for amendment. The questions for the consideration of the Court were then stated to be as follows:—(1) Whether, according to the true construction of the said Act, evidence of the takings and payments of the publichouses, 42 and 44, Tanner-street, was admissible. (2) Whether the Old Rose, being let on a lease whereof 19 years are unexpired at a rental of £100 per annum subject to the ordinary covenant tying the purchase of malt liquors, its value to the lessor's interest of such covenant is to be excluded. The arbitrator then stated alternative findings of the figures according to the result of the judgment of the Court. There was besides the case of the Old Rose that of another publichouse not a tied house. This was dealt with in the judgment in the Court.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. Cababé appeared for the brewery company; the Hon. A. Lyttelton for the London County Council.

Mr. BOSANQUET said this was the first time these betterment clauses had come before the Court. He contended that the value of the tied covenant should not be excluded. In one alternative the County Council might have to purchase the property. It was therefore to the interest of his clients that the initial valuation should be high.

Mr. LYTTELTON argued that the tied house covenant was no enhancement of the market value and should not therefore be considered. A tied house covenant in cases of compensation under the Lands Clauses Acts was always treated as a trade interest. The actual takings of the business also ought to be excluded. As regards traders, it was the purpose of the Act they were to receive something less than the true value of the property if they objected to pay the improvement charge. It should be remembered that the whole cost of the inquiry was to be paid by the London County Council. It was important therefore that each inquiry should not have to enter into the question of the profits of trade of each individual. It was not likely that Government should have intended to make this necessary. In rating cases it was the market value of the income that was the basis of assessment. He cited Dodd's case (1895) 2 Q.B., 133; "Alison v. Monkswearmouth" (23 L.J., M.C. 177; 4 G. and B., 413); "Sunderland Union v. Sunderland Overseers" (34 L.J., M.C. N.S., 121).

Mr. BOSANQUET said the Sunderland case was only an authority that a brewery was not for certain purposes to be deemed more valuable because it had tied houses attached.

The considered judgment of the Court was delivered by Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT, but before reading it he said,—Though the arbitrator has not expressly stated that he has left out the "trade interests," we assume that that is so. The counsel on each side having assented, the learned Judge continued,—By an Act passed in 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., ch. cxxx.) the London County Council were empowered to make certain street improvements. Section 36 of the Act recites that, "whereas the improvement will be effected out of public funds charged over the whole county, and will or may substantially and permanently increase in value lands in the neighbourhood of the improvement which will not be acquired for the purpose thereof, and it is reasonable that provision should be made under which, in respect or in consideration of such increased value, a charge should be placed on such lands"; and it proceeds to make provision for the ascertainment of the area which will receive permanent benefit from the improvement and for the estimation of the increased value which will accrue to each separate property in that area and for the assessment on the said properties of an annual charge respecting such increase of value. The provisions for these purposes comprise four distinct operations. The Council (subsection 3) are to make a specification of the properties which in their judgment will be so increased in value. Then (subsection 3) a valuer appointed by the Local Government Board is to make an initial valuation of each property after hearing interested parties. Then (subsection 4) the Council are to make an assessment showing in the case of each property the amount of enhancement of its market value which in the judgment of the Council will accrue from the improvement and the amount of redeemable annual charge which is to be imposed in respect thereof (being about 1½ per cent. on the estimated enhancement). Lastly, an arbitrator appointed by the Local Government Board is to determine any objections to any of the above-mentioned matters, and also the incidence of the charge as between the parties having various interests in any property. Among the provisions relating to the assessment of enhancement of value is one (subsection 9) providing that the owner of any property assessed may, alone or in concurrence with termors for 21 years unexpired, if dissatisfied with the assessment, require the Council to purchase his estate and interest in the property at the value specified in the "initial valuation," and thereupon the Council must either purchase as required or abandon the proposed charge on that property. The questions for decision in the present case arise in relation, not to the specification or the assessment by the Council or to the final arbitration, but solely to the "initial valuation" of the properties. In making that valuation the valuer is to distinguish and assess the value of the site apart from that of any existing building thereon. He is, secondly, to value the site and buildings as a whole without reference to the intended improvement. He is, thirdly, to "separately value" "the interest" of the owner of the site and buildings and "the interest" of any lessee thereof for 21 years unexpired (excluding from each such valuation any "trade interest," which expression we understand to refer to goodwill and expectation of profit, and any other similar matters and the estimated value of takings and payments), and in doing so he "shall only take into consideration the value of the said site and buildings without reference to the intended improvement." In the present case of the Old Rose there is not a lessee for 21 years, but there is a shorter lease with the common "tying" covenant. In valuing the site apart from the buildings on it the valuer has, with the assent of the County Council, taken into consideration the fact that the premises are licensed as a publichouse, and no question arises on that point, though it would seem that the fact, if admissible at all as an element of value in the first or second parts of the valuation, should be considered as an element of value of the site and buildings rather than of the site alone. On that basis he has made alternative valuations of the site, dependent on the two questions whether the takings and payments of the publichouse and the fact that it is tied are elements of the value of the site or of the site and buildings. It seems to us plain that neither of them can be considered in valuing the site apart from any existing buildings "thereon." In the next part of the valuation—namely, that of the site and buildings "as a whole"—the same two questions arise. As regards the takings and payments, we think that they cannot be treated as elements of value of the land and building—i.e., as in themselves evidence of value—and that evidence of them should not be admitted even for the purpose of testing the evidence of witnesses. In "Dodds v. Assessment Committee of South Shields" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 133) it was so held with reference to questions of rating, and we think that the principle of that decision, although partly based on practice, is applicable to the present case. The admission of such evidence must tend to induce a consideration of trade value instead of the market value of the land and buildings. As regards the "tying" covenant, we think that the valuation of the site and buildings must in effect be the same as if that covenant were considered. The real question is, as it seems to us, what is the market value of the premises fit for a publichouse, considered apart from any particular distribution of the interests in it—i.e., considered as an unqualified freehold? If indeed the owner held subject to a covenant not to use the premises as a publichouse, a different question would arise. But, as things are, the property must be valued as that of a person who is in all respects a beneficial owner. The fact that the house is tied has not increased its value, but only amounts to this—that the owner has not parted with that part of its value which consists of the power to tie. The value of the premises is practically the same either way. If the owner chooses to tie he may get less rent, but more benefit in other ways. If he does not tie he may get more rent, but less of the other benefits. The enhancement of the value of the premises which will result from the improvement will be the same, whether the premises are tied or not, though the benefit of it may be differently apportioned between lessor and lessee; and the charge is intended to be proportioned to the total enhancement of value. The third part of the valuation appears to be introduced for the purposes of subsection (9), and although it seems prima facie to be required only when there is a lessee for at least 21 years, yet in order to give full effect to subsection (9) it seems necessary to construe the provision for this third part of the valuation as requiring in every case a valuation of the owner's interest. The only alternative would be to treat the owner as interested to the extent of the whole valuation. This would not work any injustice apart from subsection (9), because the incidence of the charge will be apportioned by the arbitrator under subsection (17); but it would work grave injustice under subsection (9), because the Council would be compelled either to pay for much more than what the owner's real interest might be or to abandon the charge altogether. Then it only remains to determine whether in the present case the fact that the house is "tied" ought to be considered in this third part of the valuation. We think that it ought, in the same manner as in the valuation of the site and buildings, though not for the same reasons. This part of the valuation is a valuation not of the site and buildings, but of the owner's interest in them, and anything, not being a trade interest, ought to be considered which affects the question of that interest. It is not so much that the covenant is to be valued as that the owner's interest has not been diminished by alienation of the power to tie. If he had leased the house without tying it his interest would have been less, unless he got a compensating rent. The effect, as we understand the matter, will be that if the owner requires the Council under subsection (9) to take his interest, and they do not abandon the charge on his property, they will have to pay him the value of his actual interest in the premises, and the charge will continue to be apportioned between the Council and the lessees, just as if the Council had always been the owner and as if the existing leases had been held from them. We have so far dealt with the case of the premises described as the Old Rose. In the case of the Raven and Swan similar questions arise with this exception—that the premises are under lease for an unexpired term exceeding 21 years without any "tying" covenant. This circumstance will not, in our opinion, of itself affect the first or second part of the valuation, though it may or may not be material to be considered as tending to show that the rent is or is not a fair criterion of value. But it may be material in the third part of the valuation. If the owner gets a rent different from the rent which he could get if the house were tied, and if that difference fairly represents the value to the lessee of his freedom from such a covenant, then the existence or non-existence of such a covenant would seem to be immaterial, otherwise the value of the interest of one or other party would be increased or diminished as the case may be. The valuation will therefore stand as a valuation according to the last tables in each case.

IN RE ROLLASON'S DESIGN.*

Copyright—Design—Novelty—Pattern—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883, secs.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, dated July 14, directing the removal from the register of a design for coffin plates registered by Charles Rollason on May 28, 1894, under the number 232,908. This design was stated in Mr. Rollason's application to be applicable for the pattern. The design as used by Mr. Rollason consisted of an irregular hexagonal brass plate with leaf-shaped projections at the four outer corners, each of which contained a raised shell-pattern ornamentation, and it was a feature of the design that the centre of the plate was depressed below the level of the outer border. Mr. Rollason having sued Messrs. Heath and Co. in the County Court for infringing his design, they replied by a motion in the High Court to have the design removed from the register. The principal ground of their application was that the design was not new or original. In support of this contention they alleged that the design had been anticipated by a design registered by Messrs. Sanders, Son, and Payne in 1892, and by other designs which were common to the trade. They alleged, further, that even if any novelty could be claimed by Mr. Rollason for his design as used the drawing annexed to the certificate of registration did not show sufficiently the nature of the design, inasmuch as no section was given, and there was no indication that the centre of the plate was to be depressed below the level of the outer border beyond the fact that the boundary of the centre of the plate was defined by a double line, which was relied upon by Mr. Rollason as suggesting a difference of level. The result, it was said, was that the design as shown by the drawing might be infringed in various ways, as by making the centre plate flush with the outer border, or by raising or depressing it. Mr. Rollason, on the other hand, claimed that his design was a new and original combination of certain characteristics of three earlier designs—viz., the outline of one, the depressed centre and raised moulding of another, and the raised shell device of a third, with further additions and modifications. Another ground for the application for removal was that section 51 of the Patents Act, 1883, had not been complied with. That section provides that before delivery on sale of any articles to which a registered design has been applied the proprietor of the design shall cause each such article to be marked with the prescribed word or words or figures denoting that the design is registered; and if he fails to do so the copyright in the design shall cease, unless the proprietor shows that he took all proper steps to insure the marking of the article. It appeared that one type of plate used by Mr. Rollason was by the inadvertence of the die-sinker whom he employed marked 252,908, instead of 232,908, but that the mistake was rectified as soon as it was called to Mr. Rollason's attention. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the design was bad for want of novelty, and directed its removal on that ground, but he decided the point upon section 51 in favour of Mr. Rollason.

Mr. Rollason appealed.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. E. P. Hewitt appeared in support of the appeal; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. W. N. Lawson were for Messrs. Heath and Co.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the Act of Parliament had nothing to do with designs in the abstract, but had to do with designs intended to be applied to a particular article. It was therefore necessary to consider what this design was for. The design was registered for coffin plates, and it was registered in respect of pattern. It was no part of the Act of Parliament to say how the design was to be carried out, and in his Lordship's opinion it was immaterial to consider whether or not the design was capable of being copied in more ways than one. In considering the question whether this design was new and original a good deal turned upon whether the lines in the drawing did or did not show that the centre of the plate was to be lower than the edges, and it was said that that could not be inferred from the drawing. If the drawing were looked at apart from the thing to which it was to be applied that might be so, but looking at it in reference to coffin plates his Lordship thought that any ordinary person would infer that this was a design having a depressed centre. If that was the true view, in his Lordship's opinion this design had not been anticipated. But if not he thought that there was still sufficient difference in this design to make it new and original. According to the principles laid down in "Le May v. Welch" (28 Ch. D., 24) and "In re Clarke"

([1896] 2 Ch., 38) the test was whether this was a substantially new pattern. Treating the word "pattern" as including the ornamentation as well as the outline, his Lordship came to the conclusion that there was in this design sufficient originality to entitle Mr. Rollason to keep it on the register. With regard to the objection based upon section 51 the mistake was not one which would readily catch the eye of a casual observer, and it had been rectified as soon as it was discovered. In these circumstances in his Lordship's opinion Mr. Rollason had brought himself within the saving clause in the section. The appeal should therefore be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. Mr. Rollason's design was made up of several old designs which he had combined together. In his Lordship's opinion these old designs in combination presented to the eye a new design.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS was not sure that he agreed with the other members of the Court as to the principle upon which the question of novelty and originality ought to be determined. Having regard to sections 47 and 60 of the Patents Act, 1883, his Lordship thought it clear that the Legislature intended to draw a distinction between (1) pattern, (2) shape or configuration, (3) ornament, and intended, at all events in a case where the applicant himself limited his application to one of those three heads, that such applicant should pay attention to the question of what he claimed to have registered as new and original—whether the claim was for pattern, shape or configuration, or ornament. Moreover, the rules made in pursuance of the Act of Parliament prescribed that applications for registration should be in the forms set forth in the schedule to the Act, and the forms E and O, which were applicable to designs, drew a distinction between pattern and shape. Inasmuch as the Act of Parliament and the rules clearly enabled, if they did not compel, an applicant to draw that distinction, in his Lordship's opinion if the applicant chose to draw that distinction that ought to be borne in mind in considering the question of novelty and originality. In this case the application being limited to pattern he thought that the Court ought not to go outside anything which properly fell within the definition of pattern in this particular application; it was not enough to find novelty or originality in something which was clearly shape as distinguished from pattern. It was a condition precedent to claiming the benefit of this Act of Parliament that the applicant for registration should have complied with its provisions, and in any case where it was uncertain whether or not he had claimed a particular thing the decision ought to be given against him, because it was his duty to make it perfectly clear what he sought to appropriate to the exclusion of the general public. It was said that part of the design claimed in this case was the depressed centre. His Lordship doubted whether the applicant had any intention of claiming that as part of his design, but if he had, he had not made his intention sufficiently clear to entitle him to registration. Treating this, then, as the registration of a pattern and putting out of consideration the depressed centre, was there within the principles laid down in "Le May v. Welch" a clearly marked difference between this design and those which had gone before? Speaking for himself his Lordship came to the conclusion that there was a sufficiently marked difference to entitle the design to remain upon the register, though he felt some hesitation in differing from the learned Judge below on a question as to the quantum of difference.

HAWES V. HARDING AND CO.*

Patent—Validity—Specification held bad.

This was an appeal from a decision by Mr. Justice Kekewich, dated July 8. The action was brought to restrain the infringement of a patent for a watering-pot shaped like a canister—that is to say, having the neck of the vessel of a smaller circumference than the body, with a tipping handle joined on to the body and neck of the vessel and a carrying handle joined on to the neck and spout. After describing the vessel in the specification, the plaintiff claimed—" (1) the canister shape of the vessel ; (2) the make, shape, and position of the tipping handle, by which the vessel is so balanced as to allow of its being manipulated with one hand, leaving the other free ; (3) the introduction of a carrying handle, which strengthens the spout and allows of the can being carried by the hand in a natural position." And the specification concluded as follows :—" This new invention forms a watering-pot that is much easier to carry and tip, and at the same time being much cleaner and more adapted for use than any other put before the public." Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the patent was invalid, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Willis Bund appeared for the plaintiff. Mr. Walter and Mr. J. H. Gray, for the defendants, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that, with every desire to support meritorious inventions, care should be taken not to strain the language of the specification unduly. The plaintiff might be right in contending that this was a claim for a combination, but he claimed something else as well. He claimed—first, the shape of the can ; secondly, the make, shape, and position of the tipping handle ; and, thirdly, the introduction of the carrying handle as separate and distinct things. Construing the specification most favourably to the plaintiff, it was a claim for a combination plus the three things specified. The specification was clearly bad, and the appeal should be dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. BROWN.†

Revenue—Succession duty—Partnership deed between father and son—Death of father—16 and 17 Vict., c. 51, sec. 2.

Held, reversing the decision of the Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 364), that the arrangement under a partnership deed by which a son acquired the share of his father on his death was not in the nature of a sale by the father to the son, and so excluded from the operation of the Succession Duty Act.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams and Mr. Justice Kennedy), on the hearing of an information laid by the Attorney-General claiming succession duty, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 364. By an indenture, dated March 30, 1881, the father of the defendant, George Brown, and the defendant, George Thomas Brown, entered into a contract of partnership for carrying on the business of cotton spinners and manufacturers for a term of five years. The assets of the business were valued at £62,445. The defendant brought no capital into the business, but he was to be considered as having brought one-third of the capital, and the father two-thirds. The father was to take two-thirds of the profits, and the son one-third. Paragraph 29 of the indenture was as follows :—" If the said George Brown shall die during the partnership, the said George Thomas Brown shall be absolutely entitled for his own use and benefit to the whole or entirety of the capital of the partnership of and in the money, property, stock-in-trade, debts, effects, and assets of the partnership. And the said George Thomas Brown shall, within six calendar months next after such death, duly execute and deliver unto the executors or administrators of the said George Brown a bond in a penalty double the principal sum payable to them conditioned for the payment to them of the principal sum of £10,000. . . . But if the said George Thomas Brown shall die during the partnership, the said George Brown shall be absolutely entitled for his own use and benefit to the whole or entirety of the capital of the partnership ; and the said George Brown shall, within six calendar months next after such death, duly execute and deliver unto the executors or administrators of the said George Thomas Brown a bond in a penalty double the principal sum payable to them conditioned for the payment to them of the principal sum of £15,000." There was also another contract of even date drawn up in relation to the freehold property of the firm, in which it was provided that £139 per annum was to be paid to the father. The indenture took effect, and the defendant and his father carried on business in partnership until October 12, 1884, when the father died. The Crown claimed succession duty in respect of the capital of the partnership passing to the defendant, less his original share therein and the sum of £10,000 payable to the estate of the deceased. The Divisional Court gave judgment against the Crown. The Crown appealed.

The Solicitor-General and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts for the defendant.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment this morning, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read the judgment of the Court as follows :—" In this case the Crown claims as from the defendant, George Thomas Brown, succession duty in respect of any benefit derived by him from his acquisition, on the death of his father and partner, George Brown, of the share of the latter (being two-thirds of the whole) in a partnership business of George Brown and Co., carried on by the father and son down to the death of the father in 1884. The real question is whether the arrangement (to use a neutral phrase) under which the son acquired the share of his father was or was not in the nature of a sale by the father to the son within the meaning of "Fryer v. Morland" (3 Ch. D., 675), and so excluded from the operation of the Succession Duty Act. The facts of the case are not in dispute. George Brown, the father, to the end of the year 1880 carried on the business of cotton spinner and manufacturer, his son, George Thomas Brown, assisting him in the management of the business, but having no share therein. George Brown, the father, being minded to take his son into partnership with him, caused a valuation to be made of his assets employed in the business as on January 1, 1881, and a general statement of account showing his position in the business on the same day. In this statement of account the items on the credit side were the values of the assets at the prices put upon them, a large banker's balance of £10,000 (obviously, we think, made up to an even sum considered sufficient to start the new firm), and the accounts due to the business. The total of these assets on the credit side was £63,824 8s. 11d. On the debit side was placed the amount of the accounts owing in the business, being £1,378 16s. 1d., and there resulted a net balance to the credit of the business of £62,445 12s. 10d. This statement of account was taken as the starting point of the new firm, and the credit balance attributed as to £41,630 8s. 6d. (two-thirds of the whole) to the father as his capital, the remaining one-third, or £20,815 4s. 4d., being attributed to the son, though the whole amount was in truth brought in by the father. We have thought it desirable, with reference to the arguments pressed upon us, to state plainly the way in which the exact balance was arrived at, but for greater simplicity that balance will hereafter be dealt with as if it were a round sum of £60,000. The articles of partnership, which contained or evidenced the terms of the only contract between the father and the son, were dated March 31, 1881. They carried the partnership back to January 1, 1881, and made the term of the partnership five years, if both partners should so long live, subject to a clause enabling either partner to expel the other in case (among other events) of lunacy, bankruptcy, or breach of the articles. The benefits conferred upon the son by the articles included the following:—He got at once one-third of the capital, say £20,000, and one-third of the profits. If the partnership continued for the five years, or determined by any other reason then the death of a partner, his share of capital was to be one-half, say £30,000. If his father died during the term, he was to have the whole capital, say £60,000, subject to his giving his father's executors, within six months after his death, a bond conditional for payment of £10,000 and 4 per cent. interest thereon from the father's death by ten instalments of £1,000 a year, the first payable, with interest as provided, at the end of 12 calendar months from the date of the bond, thus giving 18 months for the first payment at the son's election. In the event of the son's death during the term, his father was to have back the business (formerly his own), but was to pay the son's executors £15,000, secured by his bond in a similar manner. The consideration given by the son (and it cannot be suggested that it is not in law a good consideration) was his agreeing to be a partner and thereby taking upon himself liability for the debts of the firm, and his rendering services as a partner, with the addition in the sole case of his succeeding to the whole business of the money consideration involved in his giving the bond for £10,000. The money payment and the obligation to indemnify the father's estate against the debts of the firm constituted the only additional consideration for the acquisition of the father's two-thirds. Can the arrangement above summarized, looking at the case in its substance apart from form, be fairly described as a case of sale and purchase within the meaning of the exception established by "Fryer v. Morland"? The contract between father and son is one and indivisible, and it is not permissible to isolate one of its terms from the other. The event which has actually happened does involve a money payment by the son, but for the purpose of arriving at the true meaning of the arrangement it is necessary to consider also what did and what might have happened independently of that event. Now, the son actually got one-third of his father's capital without having to make any money payment to the father at all. If the partnership had lasted throughout the five years or been determined by the father expelling the son or the son the father, the son would have got half the capital without having to pay anything. If it had been determined by the death of the son, his estate would have had £15,000, but would not have had to pay anything. It would hardly have been possible to say that in any of these cases the contract was one of sale and purchase in the sense in which that phrase is to be used for present purposes or in any ordinary sense. If the true nature of the arrangement was not in the important cases referred to a contract for sale and purchase, the argument for its being so construed in the particular case which happened is greatly weakened, if not altogether destroyed. Looking at the contract broadly we do not think that it is one which ever would have been entered into with a stranger (unless the father chose to treat him as a son), but that it was to a great extent at any rate an arrangement for the benefit of the son, and that it is not converted into a contract for sale and purchase simply because the father stipulated for a money payment in a certain event to his estate. The distinction between the present case and that of "Fryer v. Morland" seems plain. Sir George Jessel in that case gives two reasons why ordinary contracts for sale and purchase should not be within the Act. The first and the main reason is the absurdity which would be involved if sales and purchases were to be included. In effect he says:—If sales and purchases are to be included, then sales by auction must be. But it is altogether absurd to suppose that a stranger purchasing at an auction should pay 10 per cent. duty when a son purchasing in the same manner would pay 1 per cent. only. The same observation would apply to sales by private treaty. To an arrangement like that in the present case the argument would have no application. The other reason founded on the language of section 2 seems to be equally inapplicable. The Master of the Rolls remarks upon the difficulty of holding that a purchaser in an ordinary case of sale and purchase derives title from his vendor. He derives it from his own money paid out of his own pocket. Is that the case here? It would seem that the provision as to giving the bond for £10,000 involves no such conclusion. Immediately on the father's death his two-thirds share (amounting, say, to £40,000) is to pass to his son with, of course, the subsequent produce whether the son carries on the business or not. He has it either to sell or keep, and it is at least as easy to infer that he is to have this property to enable him to pay conveniently the instalments, as that £10,000 is to be fixed as a contractual value for property taken on the face of the contract as worth £40,000. The true conclusion seems to be that the father was actuated by mixed motives of business and bounty, and that in the case of the son becoming entitled to the whole business £10,000 was fixed as a reasonable sum which could be paid without inconvenience out of the business for the benefit of the father's general estate, and not at all as a measure of the value of the property taken. This conclusion would be in accordance with the usual or, at any rate, a very general practice in the case of a successful trader carrying on an important business and taking into partnership one of several sons. It is highly improbable that in such a case the whole arrangement should be based upon the ordinary pecuniary basis which would exist between vendor and purchaser. The partnership agreement is founded on mutual confidence between the parties, and it seldom, if ever, happens that the son gives full pecuniary value for the share secured to him, whilst some provisions for the other members of the family are very generally imported so as to make the arrangement analogous to, if it cannot properly be called, a family arrangement. Hitherto no reference has been made to the point, very strongly relied upon by the Solicitor-General, that, quite apart from the inadequacy of the sum to be paid on the son taking over the father's two-thirds share, the contrast between that sum and the £15,000 to be paid by the father on taking the son's one-third shows that the sums were fixed, not on the basis of sale, but rather with reference to the presumed and reasonable claims of the son in the particular events. This contrast, if not explained, is a strong ground for supposing that the whole arrangement was in the main an arrangement for the son's benefit. The judgment then proceeded to deal at some length with the reasons of the learned Judges in the Divisional Court, and continued as follows:—Having stated these reasons for differing in matters of comparative detail with the learned Judges in the Court below, we conclude by pointing out what, in our judgment, and with all deference to them, seems to be the main defect in their reasoning. They do not treat the contract as a whole, but, picking out and dealing separately with one clause of it, they seem to add together all the considerations given by the son for any part of the advantage secured to him and concentrate them on the single case of the taking over by the son of the father's two-thirds, not allowing for the circumstance that, with the exception of the £10,000 and the indemnity to be given for the debts due at the father's death, for the whole of which the son was liable to the creditors, the whole considerations moving from the son would have equally moved from him had he never become the taker of his father's share at all. The result is that the judgment of the Court below is to be reversed, and the Crown held to be entitled to succession duty, of course giving credit in the usual way to the son for the sum of £10,000 in estimating the value of the succession. Costs will follow the event.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

†Reported by F. G. RUCKEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LABOUCHERE V. HESS AND MRS. SALA.*

Letters—Property in—Publication—Injunction to restrain.

The Court has jurisdiction to restrain the publication of a letter against the will of the sender.

Mr. Justice North this morning gave judgment in this action heard yesterday, of the arguments in which we have given a summary. Mr. Labouchere sought to restrain the publication of private letters from himself to the late Mr. George Augustus Sala. His action was commenced on account of a paragraph in the African Critic, the journal of Mr. Hess, which threatened publication of letters he believed to Mr. Sala. Mr. Hess admitted his having such letters in his possession and his intention to publish one, and claimed the right to publish all. Mrs. Sala denied any collusion with Mr. Hess or illwill to Mr. Labouchere. She said she had parted with, among other things, letters to her husband from Mr. Labouchere, which had been given to her as a wedding present during the time her husband was ill and incapacitated from work. The action was brought on on motion for an interlocutory injunction, therefore on affidavit evidence only; but the application was treated as the trial, thus disposing of it entirely.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Mr. Rowden were for the plaintiff; Mr. Carson, Q.C., Mr. C. F. Gill, and Mr. J. W. Leonard for the defendant Hess; and Mr. F. Cooper Willis and Mr. Abinger for Mrs. Sala.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH said:—Mr. Hess, the defendant, was the proprietor and publisher of the African Critic.

In the issue of October 2 there was a supplement of some 55 pages in length. On the title-page was printed, "The stock-jobbing of Henry Labouchere, M.P. for Northampton, proprietor of Truth, and late member of the British South Africa Committee, with five facsimile letters and four cartoons." His Lordship had looked very cursorily through the pages, and he thought he was justified in describing them as an attempt to make out that Mr. Labouchere was a consummate hypocrite, if not worse, and was wholly unworthy of association with men of common honesty and honour. At page 4 there occurred this passage:—"I have, however, in my possession complete proofs that Mr. Labouchere also carried on his stock-jobbing transactions in later years, and, if necessary, I shall be quite willing to publish them; but before doing so I desire to challenge Mr. Labouchere to refute, if he can, the charges already proved against him by me. This is the second day of October, 1897. I will give him until the last day of this year—i.e., three months—to have 'his innings,' as his friends call it, and take such steps to vindicate his character as the aspersions I have cast upon it call for. If by December 31, 1897, he shall not have taken any such measures, I intend, beginning with my issue of January 1, 1898, to commence a series of revelations about his latter-day conduct, which, I promise, will pale the exposures already made into utter insignificance." In the issue for October 7, 1897, of Truth, a journal of which Mr. Labouchere was the proprietor, in an article headed "An African Editor and Myself," running over several pages, was this passage:—"You have my leave to comment on my articles in the World as you please. You may publish and republish my letters to Mr. Beer as often as you please. I should not have to bring an action in order to hinder this. A letter belongs to the writer, and I might obtain an injunction to-morrow to prevent your publication of any of mine. I have, however, you will be glad to hear, not the remotest intention to take this course. You may continue to scatter broadcast gratis copies of your journal in which you prove that I was a quarter of a century ago worthy of penal servitude, or, if you prefer it, that I ought to have been hanged a quarter of a century before that. You will not draw me." The African Critic of November 6 contained this paragraph:—"Mr. Wm. Holloway, B.A., objected to any Jew or journalist sitting on the jury in the libel action which he brought this week against the Pall Mall Gazette. He got his non-journalist, non-Jewish jury, and also a verdict against himself. Next time, I take it, Mr. Holloway will afford Jews and journalists a trial. They could not do worse for him than his selected jury did. This is à propos of nothing South African, except that this paper is greatly interested in libel cases, having five in hand at present, with expectations of one more in the near future. Mr. Labouchere rather fancies Jews as jurors. . . . One of the first Labouchere letters which I shall publish in facsimile next year will show the reason why Mr. Labouchere considers Jews to make good jurymen." That threat of publication having been made, Mr. Labouchere brought this action for an injunction. He made an affidavit, in which he said:—"During the life of George Augustus Sala, deceased, who was a man of literary eminence, I was for many years on terms of intimate friendship with him, and in the course of our said friendship I wrote and sent to him a large number of letters, extending over a period of 20 years, such letters being of such a character as would usually pass between intimate friends, and wholly of a private nature. The said George Augustus Sala died in or about the year 1895. The defendant Elizabeth Sala is his widow, and on his death acquired possession of his papers and documents, including numerous letters written by me to him during his life. I have been informed and believe that the defendant Elizabeth Sala, at the instigation of and acting in collusion with the defendant Henry Hess, has recently made over to the defendant Henry Hess a considerable number of the said letters written by me to the said G. A. Sala, or has supplied him with copies of extracts from such letters for the purpose of publication, and I verily believe that, so far as any of my letters written to the said G. A. Sala remain in her custody or possession, she will be induced by the defendant Hess, and in fact threatens and intends to deliver the same or some of them or copies of or extracts from such letters or some of them to the defendant Hess for publication. I have been informed and believe that the defendant Henry Hess, under the circumstances aforesaid, has in his possession certain of my letters written to the said George Augustus Sala, or copies of or extracts from such letters, and that he threatens and intends to publish the same and in particular to set forth copies or facsimiles of such letters or of portions of the contents of such letters in the said newspaper known as the African Critic, or in a new journal or publication shortly to be issued by the defendant Henry Hess, and to be known as the Critic. Amongst other grounds I have for making this statement is the following. In a supplement to the African Critic for October 2, 1897, the defendant Hess has set forth both prints and facsimiles of certain correspondence of mine which is not the subject of the present action, and relating to certain alleged actions or conduct of mine 20 years ago." That Mr. Hess had letters from the plaintiff to Mr. Sala in his possession was admitted; but Mr. Hess and Mrs. Sala gave somewhat different statements as to the circumstances under which they came into his possession. Mrs. Sala said that on her marriage with her husband he made her a wedding present of, among other things, a number of letters to him from well-known persons, and that shortly before his death, when by his illness he was incapacitated from earning money, she disposed of a considerable number of these and applied the proceeds entirely for his benefit. Mr. Hess deposed:—"I have been informed and believe that the said Mrs. Sala was lawfully in possession, after the date of the said George Augustus Sala's death, of certain letters written to him by the plaintiff". . . "I have never undertaken to publish such letters, or any of them; and I have never stated to any one that I intended to publish letters written by the plaintiff to the said George Augustus Sala. I say, however, that on November 6, 1897, I published in the African Critic an extract of the current issue of the newspaper Truth, together with the following comment" (which his Lordship had referred to):—"I admit that the one letter here referred to was a letter purporting to have been written by the plaintiff to the said George Augustus Sala. This is the only one of such letters to which my comment refers; but I maintain, as I am advised and believe, that I have a right to publish any or all of the said letters, or the contents thereof, which the plaintiff may have written to the said George Augustus Sala." Though he said he was only intending to publish one letter, he there claimed a right to deal with all letters from Mr. Labouchere that he had acquired. The first point argued before his Lordship on behalf of the defendant Hess was that as a matter of law the Court would not, as a general rule, restrain the publication of letters. That was put on general grounds independently of particular reasons against the granting an injunction. He thought the authorities very clear and express against persons having any such right of publication. His Lordship dealt with the authorities, first referring to the case of "Pope v. Curl" (2 Atk., 342), relating to a case of publication of a collection of "Letters from Swift, Pope, and others." He read from Lord Hardwicke's judgment as follows:—"Another objection has been made that, where a man writes a letter, it is in the nature of a gift to the receiver; but I am of opinion that it is only a special property in the receiver; possibly the property of the paper may belong to him; but this does not give a licence to any person whatsoever to publish them to the world, for at most the receiver has only a joint property with the writer." His Lordship passed to the case of "Thompson v. Stanhope" (Amb., 737), a case relating to the publication of letters from Lord Chesterfield to his natural son, which the widow of the son was intending to publish. There his Lordship read:—"Lord Apsley was very clear that an injunction ought to be granted that the widow had no right to print the letters without the consent of Lord Chesterfield or his executors. That she had obtained neither the one nor the other." "He said it was within the reason of several cases where injunctions had been granted, and cited the cases of Mr. Forrester, of Mr. Webb, Mr. Pope's letters published by Curl, and Lord Clarendon's life, advertised to be published by Shebbear." The next case touched on by his Lordship was that of "Percival v. Phillips" (2 Ves. and Beames), where an injunction that had been obtained was discharged on the ground that publication was authorized; the case was an exception to the rule which was clearly recognized as established. But his Lordship did not think he should be doing justice to the arguments if he did not say that it seemed that the Vice-Chancellor would have doubted the jurisdiction if the matter had come before him as a new one. There was a case "Gee v. Pritchard" (2 Swan, 402) before Lord Eldon, the leading case on the subject. He thought, looking at the whole report, that if the matter had come before Lord Eldon for the first time he also would have doubted whether an injunction could be granted; but finding what the law was, as long established by a number of cases, he considered that an injunction could properly be granted. After referring to, among other cases, "Boosey v. Jeffery" (6 Ex., 580), his Lordship considered the case of "Hopkinson v. Lord Burghley" (L.R., 2 Ch. Ap., 447), where it was sought to excuse the production of letters for the purpose of justice on the ground that the sender objected. Lord Justice Turner said:—"I am of opinion that these letters must be produced; the writer of a letter trusts the receiver with the letter, and he must take the consequences of its being in his possession. The question which now arises is between a stranger and the receiver. If the sender of a letter wishes to restrain the receiver from showing it to any other person, he must file a bill for that purpose. Unless that is done, the property is in the receiver. There must, however, be an undertaking not to use the documents, or any copies of them, for a collateral object." Lord Cairns, one of the strongest lawyers and ablest judges who ever sat on the bench, said:—"The question in all these cases is what was the purpose or object in the mind of the person sending the letter. The writer is supposed to intend that the receiver may use it for any lawful purpose, and it has been held that publication is not such a lawful purpose. But, if there is a lawful purpose for which a letter can be used, it is the production of it in a Court of Justice for the furtherance of the ends of justice. In the present case the recipients were justified in declining to produce the letters without the direction of the Court; but they cannot now refuse to produce them. There must be an undertaking in the terms of the undertaking in 'Richardson v. Hastings' (7 Beav., 354)." "The Court, therefore, clearly had jurisdiction. Then what were the reasons why the defendant Hess should not be restrained in this case? First, counsel for Hess raised the defence of leave and licence. Hess did not himself set up that defence in his affidavit. Counsel relied on the passage from Truth his Lordship had read. When one looked at the passage it was an invitation to publish letters to Mr. Beer and to Mr. Sala, and if it were he did not see why it should not be revoked. In the next place it was said that Mr. Labouchere had adopted the same course towards Mr. Hess that he complained of towards himself. He had published in Truth a letter that was said to have been written by Mr. Hess. Mr. Hess denied that he had ever written the letter—a letter which Mr. Labouchere stated that he obtained from the records of a Transvaal Court of Justice. Mr. Hess's statement must be taken to be correct as against himself, and his Lordship did not see how the publication by Mr. Labouchere of a letter not written by Mr. Hess could justify the publication of a letter written by Mr. Labouchere. But putting aside the question of authenticity, supposing the letter to have been a genuine letter of Mr. Hess, his Lordship was not then in a position to judge, as he might have been had the case gone to trial with witnesses, to know whether the circumstances were such as to justify the publication, and on this ground he did not see any reason to refuse the injunction. Lastly, Mr. Carson relied on the exception given in "Thompson v. Stanhope," and other cases, that you may publish letters written by some one else for the purpose of clearing your character. The defendant did not say that he proposed to publish the letters for that purpose; his only purpose was not to whitewash himself, but to blacken the plaintiff; not to prove his own honesty, but to prove the dishonesty of the plaintiff. He must grant the injunction asked, except that the notice of motion went too far in asking to restrain the informing any one of the contents of the letters. It was true that in some of the forms given in "Seton on Decrees" such words were inserted, but his Lordship knew nothing of the circumstances in which those injunctions were granted; he had no doubt the words in those particular cases were proper to be inserted. His Lordship then referred to what he had understood to be a suggestion that the injunction, if granted, could be evaded by getting some one else to publish the letters, observing that Mr. Hess and his friends would in such case stand a good chance of finding themselves in Holloway Gaol if such course were adopted, and said he would add to the injunction words expressly prohibiting any improper use of the letters. As regards Mrs. Sala the case stood on a different footing. She had made an affidavit as to how she had parted with the letters she had parted with, denying all collusion with the defendant Hess, and saying she had no malicious motives or ill-feeling against Mr. Labouchere, and also saying that she had no intention of publishing any letters of Mr. Labouchere except that she had some intention of writing a memoir of her late husband to be called "The Life and Letters of George Augustus Sala," in which some letters of Mr. Labouchere and other well-known men might appear. His Lordship thought that she should be well advised before she published letters of Mr. Labouchere without his consent. He did not think that Mrs. Sala had acted prudently in parting with the letters in the way she had, but he did not see that what she did many years ago under the circumstances in which she acted could disentitle her to have the injunction refused, and costs must follow the event. Mr. Hess must pay costs.

*Reported by D. FITZGERALD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. CARSON, Q.C., said his Lordship had not apprehended the meaning he intended to convey. Mr. Hess certainly had no intention or desire to go outside or evade any order of the Court.

Mr. JUSTICE NORTH said he quite accepted this explanation, though he certainly did misapprehend some of the argument; however, he was not sorry that he had made the observations he did make.

IN RE SMYTH, DECEASED—LEACH V. LEACH.*

Revenue—Probate duty—Devise upon trusts—Asset, English or foreign—Local situation of asset.

This was a petition for the distribution of funds subject to the trusts of the will dated May, 1837, of Francis G. Smyth, who died in June, 1839. A question arose as to the payment of probate duty, and his Lordship delivered a considered judgment.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker appeared for the petitioners; and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.

HIS LORDSHIP said,—The question as to probate duty which arises in this case may be shortly stated as follows:—A testator, who at the dates of his will and death was living and domiciled in England, made an English will whereby, in effect, he devised and bequeathed a plantation in Jamaica to trustees upon trusts for the benefit of certain persons for life and their issue, and upon the deaths of those persons and failure of issue upon trust to sell the plantation and divide the proceeds amongst several persons therein named. The trustees were at the above dates domiciled in the United Kingdom and one of them after the testator's death proved the will in England and acted as trustee and as trustee in this country held the plantation upon the trusts of the will. The trust for sale ultimately took effect and the proceeds of sale of the plantation became devisable amongst the several persons named in that behalf in the will or their legal personal representatives. One of those persons (I will call him the legatee), who was at the time of his death living and domiciled in England, died while the persons entitled for life were in existence, and the question is whether probate duty is not payable here on his death in respect of his interest under the will. Now that interest was admittedly of the nature of personalty, and the question, therefore, narrows itself down to this—Is the interest to be considered an English asset or to be treated as foreign because the plantation was situate in Jamaica? In my opinion it is to be regarded as an English asset. The case is governed by the principles which led to the decision of the "Attorney-General v. Lord Sudeley" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 354), and the judgment of Lopes, L.J., as reported at p. 363, applies almost word for word to the case before me, and that judgment was approved of and adopted by the Lords in the House of Lords when it came for consideration before them on appeal (L.R. [1897], A.C., 11). At the time of his death the only right the legatee had in the case before me was to have the trusts of the will duly performed, and in particular to have the trust for sale carried into effect at the due time, and the net proceeds of the sale, after paying costs and the expenses of the trustee, divided between the legatees and the other persons entitled. As matters stood he was not entitled to the plantation itself or to any specific part or share of it. The trustee was not a trustee of the plantation or of any specific part or share of it for him; all he was entitled to was his proportion of the net proceeds of the plantation after realization. He had no claim against the plantation to recover it or any portion of it; that was a claim enforceable only by the trustee. The right of the legatee as against the trustee was only to have the trusts of the will administered. Administered where? The testator was domiciled in England, his will was proved in England, his trustee was in England, and the money recoverable would in the ordinary and proper course be brought to England. The trustee could be properly and in the ordinary course sued in the English Court by the legatee, who was in England. The asset was an English equitable chose in action, recoverable in England, and an English and not a foreign asset, and as such subject to probate duty here. It was suggested as against the Crown that possibly under some circumstances an action might have been brought by the legatee to enforce his rights in Jamaica. I am bound to say that at present I do not see what action could have been properly brought there. But even admitting that, under some conceivable circumstances or change of circumstances, some action might have been brought there, the question is not in what place under extraordinary circumstances an action might be brought, but what place under existing circumstances was the natural and proper place in which the legatee should enforce his rights? In other words, what was the proper forum for deciding upon the legatee's claim? and the answer to this clearly is that the forum was English. And in reference to this view I may refer to the case of "In re Cigala" (L.R., 7 Ch.D., 351) and the observations of Jessel, M.R., in that case. I therefore decide that the probate duty is payable.

REG. V. LYNCH AND ANOTHER.*

Criminal Law—Offences against the person—Conspiracy and Property Protection Act, 1875, sec. 7—Exception of "seamen" from Act—"Seaman," who is.

A seafaring man, when not actually engaged or employed as such, is not a seaman within the section which excludes "seamen" from the operation of the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act, 1875.

The Lord Chief Justice read the written judgment of the Court. The question raised in the case was whether a seafaring man who was not actually engaged or employed at the time was a "seaman" within the 16th section of the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act, 1875, that section being one which excluded "seamen" from the operation of the Act.

Mr. J. D. Crawford appeared for the prisoners; Mr. B. F. Williams and Mr. Arthur Lewis for the Crown.

The case was stated by Mr. Justice Ridley as a Judge of Assize. The prisoners were indicted at the Glamorgan July Assizes under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vic., c. 86), for having, with a view to compel one William Eten to abstain from doing that which he had a legal right to do—that is to say, from performing a contract which he had entered into with the owners of the steamship Lesraux to serve as a seaman on board the said ship—intimidated the said William Eten, and watched and beset the place where he then was, and followed him with others in a disorderly manner. The facts were as follows:—William Eten and two others signed articles on board the Lesraux, then lying under a coaling tip in Penarth Dock. The articles were signed on board the vessel instead of at the shipping office as usual because the owners of the Lesraux were paying a lower rate of wages than that allowed by the Seamen and Firemen's Union, and in consequence of apprehended violence from the members of the union. On coming ashore the prisoners, together with a number of persons, surrounded Eten and the others, intimidated and assaulted them, following them for about 300 yards. The prisoners followed the sea as a calling, each of them having been engaged as a fireman on board steamships, but on the day in question they were not engaged or employed as firemen or seamen on board ship. It was not shown where either of them had been last so employed, but they followed the sea as an occupation. It was contended for the prisoners that there was no evidence to go before the jury in support of the indictment, on the ground that by section 16 of the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act it was provided that "This Act shall not apply to seamen or apprentices to the sea service," and that therefore the prisoners could not be convicted. For the prosecution it was contended that the term "seamen" in the Act applied only to seamen actually engaged or employed on board ship within the definition in the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 and 1894—namely 17 and 18 Vic., c. 104, s. 2, and 57 and 58 Vic., c. 69, s. 742. The Judge directed the jury that the prisoners were not within the exception, and they were accordingly convicted and sentenced.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, after stating the facts, said the question for the Court was what was the proper construction to be put upon the word "seaman" in section 16 of the Act of 1875. If there were no reason to the contrary "seaman" might well be construed in its largest sense as meaning a seafaring man or person whose ordinary occupation was that of a seaman. In construing an Act of Parliament, however, it was necessary to inquire into the intention of the Legislature, giving due effect to the language employed, and take into account other legislation bearing on the question. The question then arose, Why should seamen be exempted from the provisions of the Act and not carpenters or other workmen? If "seamen" meant seafaring men it would be difficult to suggest any reason for so large an exception, whereas if it was taken in the limited sense of the definition in the Merchant Shipping Acts a reason might be found in the special legislation of those Acts applicable to "seamen" as therein defined. If, for instance, there were a series of clauses similar in principle to those in the Act of 1875 by their language specially adapted to the case of sailors in actual employment, the distinction would be obvious and the argument in favour of the prosecution would be irresistible. But although the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, as to sailors in actual employment were not similar to those in the Act of 1875, the Act of 1854 had provisions which had an important bearing on the present case. By the interpretation clause (section 2) it was enacted that "seaman shall include every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship." By section 243 it was provided that for wilful disobedience to lawful command a seaman should be liable to imprisonment. By section 257 every person who persuaded or attempted to persuade any seaman to refuse to join his ship, or to desert, or to absent himself from duty should in respect of each such seaman incur a penalty not exceeding £10. These provisions created a wide distinction between a seaman actually employed or engaged under the Merchant Shipping Act and a mere seafaring man not so actually employed or engaged. With reference to the offence dealt with by the Conspiracy Act, 1875, the captain of a vessel had ample power to deal with a seaman under his command. He might require him as a lawful command under section 243 (4) to abstain from intimidating, or if the seaman attempted to persuade another to refuse to join or to desert the captain might summon him for the penalty. Under these circumstances the Legislature may well have considered the mischief dealt with by the Conspiracy Act of 1875 already sufficiently provided against, and have declined to add a cumulative remedy. It was suggested in argument that a difficulty might arise as to whether a seaman was "employed or engaged"; and also whether, as the Act adds the words "on board any ship," a seaman would be liable if he committed the alleged illegal act ashore. These objections had no real foundation, as the employment or engagement must be decided as a fact in each case, and a seaman may well be held to be employed or engaged on board a ship, although at the particular point of time he may have been sent on shore on duties connected with the ship. The prisoners here followed the sea "as a calling"; it was not shown when they were last employed on board. It was consistent with this that they had been out of employment for months, and they appear to have had no immediate prospect of a future engagement. It would be strange if such persons were excluded from the legislation of 1875 as well as the Merchant Shipping Acts. On the whole, therefore, it appears that at the date of the passing of the Act of 1875 the Legislature had already in an earlier statute defined what it meant by seamen—that the explanation of their exclusion from the later Act must be sought in the fact that they were already the subject of special enactments giving another remedy for some of the matters included in the later statute; and that no ground of reason or common sense can be found for excluding from the operation of the Act in question the whole class of seafaring men not actually engaged in sea service. Under the circumstances, the Court was of opinion that the view taken by the learned Judge at the trial was correct, and the conviction must be affirmed.

REG. V. WILLIAM JONES.*

Criminal Law—False pretences—Obtaining credit by fraud.

A person went into a restaurant and, knowing he had no means to pay for it, ordered a meal, which he consumed.

Held, that he could not, on the facts, be convicted of false pretences, but that he might properly be convicted of obtaining credit by fraud.

This was a case argued before the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, on November 13. A report of the argument appeared in The Times of November 15. Mr. R. Harington represented the prisoner, and Mr. J. B. Matthews appeared for the Crown in support of the conviction of William Jones for obtaining a lunch by false pretences from a restaurant-keeper, Jones having eaten the lunch, but having no money to pay for it. The facts were these. The prisoner was tried before the Recorder of Worcester at the quarter sessions held on October 21, 1897. The indictment charged William Jones that he did falsely pretend to one Julia Crump that he was then able to pay her for a plate of cold meat and a pint of sherry, which he then ordered, and that he then had and possessed sufficient money to pay for them, by means of which false pretence he did then unlawfully obtain from Julia Crump 6oz. of mutton, 3oz. of bread, and one pint measure of wine, whereas in truth and in fact he did not then have or possess sufficient money to pay. There was also a count for obtaining credit by fraud. The evidence was that Julia Crump's husband kept a restaurant in Worcester, and that on June 30 prisoner came to the restaurant. He asked for some soup, and witness replied they had not got any ready. Prisoner then said, "What have you got?" and witness replied, "Some cold lamb." Prisoner said he would have the cold lamb and half a pint of sherry, and then went upstairs to the dining-room, where the lamb and sherry were supplied to him. There were some salad and bread on the table. Ten minutes later the bell rang, and the witness, going upstairs, found the lamb eaten and the sherry drunk. The prisoner then asked for and was supplied with another half-pint of sherry. A quarter of an hour later the bell rang again, and prisoner asked for his bill, which amounted to 4s., and which was handed to him. He said nothing. Presently the bell rang again, and witness went up, and prisoner then said he had not got any money except one halfpenny, and would like to see Mr. Crump, who was then sent up. Witness further stated that generally customers paid immediately after they had finished their meal, and that she would not have supplied the prisoner with the wine and food if she had known he was not able to pay for it, though customers who were known were sometimes allowed to pay afterwards. In cross-examination, Mrs. Crump stated that the prisoner was shabbily dressed and that she served him the same as any other customer, and made no inquiries about him, as she sometimes did. She also stated that if an intending customer looked as if he were unable to pay she would make some inquiries about him before supplying food. William Crump stated that when he was called upstairs by his wife the prisoner said he had no money beyond a halfpenny and could not pay, but was expecting goods soon. Jones was then arrested by a police-constable. When prisoner was asked to account for having the food and wine and no money to pay for it he replied, "It's all right." He was searched at the police-station, and one halfpenny was found on him. The Recorder directed the jury that before they could convict the prisoner they must be satisfied (1) that he intended to represent that he was of present ability to pay; (2) that he was aware of his want of ability to pay; (3) that the food was supplied in consequence of the false pretence; (4) and that there was an intention to defraud. The jury found the prisoner guilty, on both counts, and he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE orally delivered the decision of the Court. He said the question was whether the conviction could be supported in respect of one or both counts, the jury having convicted the prisoner on both, and a concurrent sentence having been inflicted. The question, in other words, amounted to this—Was there any evidence on which the jury ought to have been asked to convict? His Lordship referred to the facts, and said it would be observed that all that the prisoner did was to go into the restaurant and order food, and eat it and not pay. No question was asked him as to his ability to pay. No statement was made by him as to whether he had means or not. Could that be regarded as justifying the jury in finding that he had obtained these goods by false pretences? The Court thought not. At the same time, they did not mean to cast the least doubt on the cases deciding that conduct without words could amount to a false pretence, as in the case when a man at Oxford put on a cap and gown in order to make a pretence that he was a member of the University. In this case, however, the prisoner had only ordered and consumed this lunch, and had done nothing else. It was not proper to leave such a case as that to the jury, a charge of false pretences, as there was no evidence on which they could convict the prisoner in such circumstances of false pretences. By section 88 of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 96, it was provided that on a charge of obtaining goods by false pretences, if it were proved that the goods were obtained in such a manner as to amount at law to larceny, the person charged could still be found guilty of the misdemeanour. In this case, however, the prisoner could not be convicted under that section, as he had not committed larceny. For it was perfectly clear that the prosecutor had voluntarily parted with the property in and possession of the food, a fact which prevented the offence from being larceny, as larceny consisted in the taking away goods against the will of the owner. The Court were, therefore, of opinion that the verdict of the jury on the first count could not be supported. The second count was framed under a different statute—namely, section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vic., c. 62), which provided that a person was guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to imprisonment for one year “if in incurring any debt or liability he has obtained credit under false pretences, or by means of any other fraud.” There were, therefore, three elements in this offence—first, the incurring a debt or liability; second, obtaining credit; and, third, fraud. The conjunction of these three was essential to the offence. The prisoner in this case had obviously incurred a debt or liability. Had he obtained credit? In the opinion of the Court he had. The prosecutor might have said that he would not furnish the goods unless the money was first paid over, but he did not say so. He relied on the ability of the prisoner to pay, and gave credit. In the opinion of the Court it did not matter the length of the period of credit; at any rate, the prosecutor parted absolutely with the goods without prepayment. Was there, then, fraud? The jury had found that there was, and there was ample evidence to justify them in so finding. The man went into the eating-house, in which the ordinary custom was that people should pay immediately on the consumption of the food. He must be taken to have known this custom, and that it would be observed with regard to him. The jury found that he had no intention of paying. Their verdict, therefore, on the second count and the sentence following thereon must be affirmed.

WEIR AND CO. V. E. AND R. ROBINSON.*

Ship—Charterparty—Demurrage—Delay in Discharging.

At Sunderland, where the discharge is carried out on behalf of both shipowner and consignee by the River Wear Commissioners, semble, the consignee would not be liable to the shipowner for delay and negligence on the part of the Commissioners.

This action was brought to recover demurrage of the plaintiffs' sailing ship Falklandbank. The defendants were the endorsees of the bills of lading, and the receivers of a cargo of wheat shipped on board the Falklandbank, which was to be delivered at Sunderland. By a clause in the charterparty for the voyage in question, which was incorporated in the bills of lading, the vessel was “to discharge afloat with despatch according to the customs at the port of discharge.” The plaintiffs claimed five days' demurrage. They alleged (1) that the defendants failed to take delivery in accordance with the facilities at the port; (2) that they failed to supply bags for removing the cargo. The Falklandbank arrived at Sunderland on February 1, 1897, and finished her discharge on February 24. She was discharged partly in the Hudson and partly in the Hendon Dock. The whole work of discharge was, in accordance with the custom of the port, placed in the hands of the River Wear Commissioners, who were paid a certain rate by the shipowners for discharging the cargo and putting it on to quay, and a further rate by the receivers for taking it across the quay to warehouse or rail. The work of discharge was done by stevedores employed and paid by the commissioners. The plaintiffs alleged that, after making due allowance for accidental interference with the work of discharge by bad weather, short days, and such matters, the cargo could have been discharged at the rate of 180 tons per day. If the cargo had been discharged at that rate five days would have been saved.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. H. F. Boyd, Q.C., Mr. T. G. Carver, and Mr. R. I. Simey for the defendants. Evidence having been called on both sides,

Mr. BOYD, Q.C., argued that the plaintiffs must fail in this action unless they could establish (1) that the defendants were responsible for delay, if any, on the part of the commissioners; and (2) that, under the circumstances actually existing, there was a failure to give despatch. He contended that under neither head had the plaintiffs made out any case. It was the duty of the shipowner to deliver at the rail, and of the defendants to receive and put the goods on quay. The commissioners were employed to do the work of both parties. If there was delay on the part of the commissioners the plaintiffs were no more ready and willing to deliver than the defendants were to receive the cargo. He cited the following cases:—“The Jaederen” ([1892] P. 351), “Castlegate S. S. Co. v. Dempsey” ([1892] 1 Q.B., 854).

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., contended for the plaintiffs that, under the contract, it was the duty of the defendants to receive the cargo with reasonable despatch; they must first come to the ship to receive the cargo before they could ask the shipowner to be ready with men to deliver it. The case of “Castlegate S. S. Co. v. Dempsey” was not in point and “The Jaederen” was distinguishable. In the latter case the ship could not have discharged faster than she did, having regard to the state of things existing at the time.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the action was brought by the owners of a steamer called the Falklandbank against the charterers to receive five days' demurrage of the ship. The action was based upon an alleged breach of a term in the charterparty, which provided that the vessel should discharge afloat with despatch according to the custom at the port of discharge. The plaintiff alleged that the vessel was not discharged with despatch. No difficulty arose as to the construction of the words of the charterparty. They did not fix any particular time within which the cargo was to be taken away by the consignees; they simply meant that there must be despatch, having regard to the facilities and circumstances existing at the time. An important question of law had been raised in the course of the case, and although, in the view which his Lordship took of the facts, it was not necessary to decide the question, he thought it better to say a word or two upon it. It was the practice at the port of Sunderland for the work of discharging vessels to be done by the River Wear Commissioners, and when a cargo arrived at the port it was the practice for the shipowner to sign a request to the commissioners requiring them to find the necessary cranes and labour with which to land the cargo; and it was the practice for the consignee to lodge a similar request requiring the commissioners to receive the cargo on the consignee's behalf, and to dispose of it either by depositing it in a warehouse, or by placing it upon the rail. That ordinary course of practice had been followed in the present case. On January 4, a month before the ship arrived, the defendants made their arrangements with the commissioners, and his Lordship was satisfied that the defendants had not in any way interfered with the work of the commissioners. The ship arrived on February 1, and the master then signed a request to the commissioners to provide the labour necessary to take the cargo out of the ship and to put it over the side. The commissioners having had the two requests, one from each party, practically made one operation of the two matters. The important question of law which had arisen in the case was this—supposing that the commissioners were negligent in carrying out the discharge of the cargo, would the shipowner have any right of action against the consignees on a charter-party worded as this one was? His Lordship said, although it was merely an obiter dictum, that he did not think the shipowner in such a case would have a right of action against the consignees. As soon as the consignees had, with ordinary diligence, employed the only means at their service—viz., the commissioners, they had done all that they were bound to do under the charterparty. They had used the means of discharge customary at the port, and if they did that, with ordinary diligence, they had fulfilled their obligations. But his Lordship would not have it supposed that the shipowner would have no remedy if the commissioners were negligent and caused delay. In such a case the shipowner would have a remedy against the commissioners. Although his Lordship was, he said, going to decide the facts against the plaintiffs in this case, he did not think any blame attached to them for bringing this action, for they honestly thought that there had been unreasonable delay. Moreover, it behoved the River Wear Commissioners to remember that not only were the interests of the port confided to them, but also the interests of the numerous shipowners who intrusted their valuable property to the commissioners. His Lordship then proceeded to make a detailed examination of the evidence in the case. In the result he came to the conclusion, and found as a fact, that the complaints of delay were ill-founded. He therefore gave judgment for the defendants with costs.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1897.
Chitty and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } Nov. 29.

LADY BATEMAN V. FAHER AND OTHERS.*

Married Woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Mistake.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (13 The Times L.R., 470), affirmed.

The fact that a married woman, restrained from anticipating her income, has made an untruthful admission on which another person has acted, does not get rid of the restraint.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's, reported in The Times of June 25 last and in The Times Law Reports, vol. 13, p. 470. By an indenture dated June 26, 1867, Lord Bateman—who was married in 1854, the late Lord Beaconsfield, then Mr. Benjamin Disraeli, being one of the trustees of his settlement—mortgaged his life interest in the Kelmars and Shobdon Court estates to the executors of the will of the late Lady Kerrison to secure a sum of £11,430, representing trust funds under the will advanced to Lord Bateman; and, subject to trusts for repaying the loan, the executors were to pay the surplus rents and profits of the estates to Lady Bateman (the wife of Lord Bateman) during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, "Provided, nevertheless, that if at any time the said Lady Bateman shall succeed to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use, then and in such case the trusts in and by this indenture lastly hereinbefore declared shall absolutely cease and determine, and after the determination of the trust lastly hereinbefore declared (but subject and without prejudice to the trusts hereinbefore declared) upon trust for the said Lord Bateman." In July, 1886, upon the death of her brother, Sir Edward Clarence Kerrison, Lady Bateman became entitled to a life interest in the Kerrison estates in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Middlesex, and a question was soon afterwards raised by Mr. Andrew Montagu (to whom Lord Bateman had subsequently to the above indenture mortgaged such interest as then remained to him as a collateral security for £110,000) whether or not the plaintiff had "succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use," so as to bring into operation the above-mentioned proviso; and Lady Bateman was ultimately advised by her then solicitor (who had since died) that now she was tenant for life of the Kerrison estates she must be considered as having succeeded to an income of £8,000 within the meaning of the proviso. Thereupon, on March 4, 1890, she executed a deed poll by which she expressly admitted that her life interest in the Kelmars and Shobdon Court estates had determined under the proviso, and released that life interest in favour of Lord Bateman. Subsequently, however, Lady Bateman discovered, as she alleged, that her income from the Kerrison estates did not amount to £8,000 a year, inasmuch as she took subject to numerous prior encumbrances, so that the deed of 1890 was executed under a wrong state of facts, and was therefore inoperative to affect the interest secured to her by the deed of 1867. Accordingly she brought this action against the executor of the mortgagee, Mr. Montagu, who had died, the persons to whom Lord Bateman had conveyed his life estate in the Kelmars and Shobdon estates subject to the mortgage, and Lord Bateman himself, claiming a declaration that she, the plaintiff, had not at any time since the execution of the deed of 1867 succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use within the meaning of the proviso; and also a declaration that the admission by the plaintiff in the deed poll of 1890 was not binding upon her in respect of the income to which, under the deed of 1867, she became entitled for her separate use without power of anticipation, and that, notwithstanding the deed poll, she had always been and still was entitled to that income. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that, by reason of the restraint on anticipation, Lady Bateman could not bind her interest by the admission, and that her right to receive the income continued notwithstanding the deed poll. The defendant Faber appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Brabant were for the appellant; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Beaumont, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case was somewhat new. It was of great importance to lawyers, as well as socially. But it was impossible to reverse the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, unless the Court were to lay down as a proposition of law that which his Lordship did not believe to be law. The Court would have to lay down that it was possible for a married woman, who was restrained from anticipating her income, to get rid of the restraint by telling an untruth, upon which another person had acted. His Lordship agreed that the question was one of fact. The evidence before the Court was a deed executed by the plaintiff, in which she said that she had succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 a year for her separate use. That deed was, no doubt, evidence against her, and it was an admission that she had so succeeded. She said that the admission was a mistake. The answer was, "You are not entitled to say that, because Mr. Montagu has acted on your admission, and you are estopped from denying the truth of your statement." No doubt this would be an answer to any one but a married woman restrained from anticipation. But, if it were held to be a good answer to her, the Court would be enabling her, by telling an untruth, to get rid of the restraint. In his Lordship's opinion that could not be done. The authorities showed that a married woman could not by hook or by crook—even by her own fraud—deprive herself of this protection. His Lordship would say nothing as to the policy of the law, but it had been affirmed by the Married Women's Property Act. The result was that a married woman could play fast and loose to an extent to which no other person could.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS gave judgment to the same effect.

BADISCHE ANILIN UND SODA FABRIK V. BASLE

Patent—Infringement—Posting from abroad.

The respondents abroad posted to a trader in London an article patented in this country by the appellants; held, that the respondents had done nothing which gave the English Courts jurisdiction over them.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 344) affirmed.

This was an appeal against a judgment of the Court of Appeal (13 The Times L.R., 344) in an action which the appellants brought to restrain the respondents from importing or bringing into England and from manufacturing or selling in England certain dyes or colouring matters made according to an invention which had been patented by the appellants in this country. The appellants also sought the usual ancillary relief of damages and an account of profits. The appellants are large manufacturers of dyes and colouring matters, and are the owners of various patents, among them one for an invention of "Improvements in the manufacture of yellow and orange colouring matters suitable for dyeing and printing from dioxy tartaric (carboxy tatrionic) acid." The dye is sold in the market under the name of "Tartrazine." The respondents are chemical manufacturers in Basle, and they sent goods which infringed the appellants' patent to Messrs. Henry Johnson and Co., drysalers in London, through a firm of forwarding agents at Basle, who posted the goods to Messrs. Johnson. The appellants claimed an injunction against both the respondents and Messrs. Johnson, having obtained leave of the Court to issue a concurrent writ in the action, and to serve notice of it on the respondents. The latter appeared, and defended the action, Messrs. Johnson having given an undertaking not to sell the dye in future, or to infringe the appellants' patent, and having submitted to an order for an account of profits or damages and to pay costs. Mr. Justice North, in January last, granted the injunction prayed for, but his decision was reversed last April by a majority of the Court of Appeal, consisting of the present Master of the Rolls, then Lord Justice Lindley, and Lord Justice A. L. Smith; Lord Justice Rigby dissented.

Mr. MOULTON, Q.C., and Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C., with whom was Mr. W. N. Lawson, argued the case for the appellants; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill for the respondents were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that it had been ingeniously argued for the appellants that part of what had been done by the appellants had been done in this country so that our Courts acquired jurisdiction over the foreigner who had sent these goods to England. The goods were actually forwarded from Basle, but it was said that the delivery of them for posting at Basle and the handing of them over to the recipient in England was one continuous act part of which was consummated within the jurisdiction. But it was well settled law that when goods were consigned to a named agent for delivery to a purchaser, the agent became the agent of the purchaser and not of the vendor. The fact that the agent in this case was the Post Office made no difference in the principle. The English Courts had no jurisdiction over the respondents, and he agreed with Lord Justice Lindley that if, instead of appearing to the writ, the respondents had applied to the Court to discharge the order which gave leave to serve out of the jurisdiction, the Court would have been bound to discharge such orders. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The other noble and learned LORDS concurred.

FOURNET V. PEARSON (LIMITED).*

Defamation—Libel—Innuendo—Proof.

This was an application for a new trial of an action tried before Mr. Justice Hawkins and a special jury. The plaintiff was an optician, and the defendants were the proprietors and publishers of Pearson's Magazine. The statement of claim alleged that on September 16, 1892, the plaintiff wrote and published for scientific purposes a lithographed facsimile holograph

* Reported by J. ERNE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

and transcript thereto, entitled "Un Cliché Ivrogne, by not Æsop," and shortly after entered the same as copyright at Stationers'-hall. The plaintiff had been well-known as the author of the said publication, which had been advertised in medical journals, and had been circulated among professional persons and others likely to come into contact with the plaintiff professionally. The defendants had infringed the plaintiff's said copyright by publishing in the September issue of the year 1896 of Pearson's Magazine, a reduced copy of the said facsimile holograph, and had entitled the same "No. 3—An extraordinary specimen produced in a condition of alcoholic insanity (reduced size)." The statement of claim further alleged that with the said reproduction of plaintiff's copyright the defendants falsely and maliciously libelled the plaintiff by printing and publishing on or about September 1, 1896, in their said magazine an article entitled "The Hand-writing of Mad People," in which the following sentence appeared in reference to the plaintiff and his said publication:—"I added this No. 3 to my collection some few years ago, and when lately I went to ask some questions about the writer, I found that he and his were all dead. 'Tis a grim specimen, this No. 3, but not without a wholesome meaning, left behind him by the victim of alcohol who wrote it" (meaning thereby that the plaintiff was a drunkard, and had died as a drunkard and that his business was broken up). The plaintiff claimed £50 for infringement of copyright and £500 for libel. The jury at the trial, in answer to questions put to them by the learned Judge, found that the plaintiff's document was not a literary composition, and that the article complained of was not a libel. Mr. Justice Hawkins entered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff now applied for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Mr. SCHULTESS YOUNG, in support of the application, said that the plaintiff, finding himself one evening under the influence of alcohol, took a piece of paper and wrote down the ideas which occurred to him while in that state, and finding next morning that his handwriting and his character, when drunk, appeared to be similar to his ordinary handwriting and his general character, he determined to publish for scientific purposes a facsimile of what he had so written, and he did publish it under the title of "Un Cliché Ivrogne (a drunken negative)." This publication was the subject matter of copyright within the meaning of the Copyright Act, 1842, which granted protection in respect of literary compositions. The learned Judge had misdirected the jury by telling them that a document was not a literary composition within the meaning of the Act unless it was something of enduring benefit to mankind. The true test was whether the publication was original, and the cases "Maple and Co. v. Junior Army and Navy Stores" (21 Ch. D., 369); "Leslie v. Young" ([1894], A.C., 385) showed that very little originality was sufficient. With regard to the libel, the defendants had paid £5 into Court. They had thereby, under the rules, admitted liability, and the only question on that part of the case was whether the innuendo went beyond the natural defamatory meaning of the words.

Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. Temple Franks for the defendants were not called upon to argue.

The Court dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this was a remarkable case. The plaintiff, while he was in a state of intoxication, wrote down a drunken scrawl, which was absolutely unintelligible. This drunken scrawl, together with some other printed matter, he afterwards registered for copyright. He did not propose to investigate the direction of Mr. Justice Hawkins on the question of copyright; neither would he consider whether this publication could properly be called a book or could be the subject-matter of copyright. He was satisfied that if the case on the question of copyright had been left to the jury, with a direction that the publication was the subject-matter of copyright, they would not have given the plaintiff more than a farthing damages. In those circumstances he thought it would be shameful for the Court of Appeal to send the case down to be tried again. With regard to the question of libel, it was clear that the learned Judge had not misdirected the jury, and had not summed up in a way hostile to the plaintiff. In his opinion, the learned Judge would have been acting well within his province if he had nonsuited the plaintiff. The libel, on the face of it, did not expressly refer to the plaintiff. It referred to a dead man, whereas the plaintiff was alive. It therefore required some outside evidence in order to connect it with the plaintiff. No such evidence was given, and it followed that the plaintiff had failed to prove the innuendo. The application for a new trial therefore failed with regard to both parts of the case.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS concurred.

THE MANCHESTER BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
THE NORTH CHESHIRE AND MANCHESTER BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Trade Name—Imitation—Name of company—
Action for an injunction dismissed.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant company, its agents, and servants, from using or carrying on business under its present name, style, or title, or any other style or name which included the plaintiff company's name, or so nearly resembled the same as to be calculated to deceive the public, or induce the belief that the business carried on by the defendant company was the same as the business carried on by the plaintiff company, or in any way connected therewith.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh-Clare were for the plaintiff company; and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith for the defendant company.

Mr. JUSTICE BYRNE, in delivering judgment, said the plaintiff company was incorporated early in 1888, and had a large business, principally in and about Manchester, its brewery being in that city. There was in existence in 1888 a company called the North Cheshire Brewery Company (Limited), which carried on business in and about the town of Macclesfield, where its brewery was. It had also some business in Manchester, at one time a good one, but this subsequently declined. This North Cheshire Company sold its business to one, Mr. Rhodes, who got up a new company (the defendant company) to carry on the old business and add to it, and this company was registered in October, 1897. Mr. Rhodes suggested the name complained of, but, in doing so, he had no intention to interfere with the plaintiff company—in fact, he was not aware of that company's existence. Amongst his motives for suggesting it were the belief that there could not be on the register two companies bearing the same name, the intention to purchase houses in Manchester, and the fact that he and another person connected with the new company had already some houses there. He had no intention to deceive the public, but the plaintiff company said that the inclusion of the words "Manchester Brewery" was intended to induce the public to believe that the defendant company had some connexion with the Manchester district, and possessed a brewery there. It was also said that the assumption of the defendant company's title was calculated to induce the public to believe that the plaintiff company had been amalgamated with the old North Cheshire Company. But his Lordship did not think the name was used with any such intention. It was adopted to show that there was a connexion with Manchester, but if it was legitimately intended to commence business operations in a particular place, it was not unreasonable to use the name of that place, so long as nothing was done to deceive people by inducing them to think the new business was connected with some other establishment. After referring to the case of "Hendricks v. Montagu" (Law Rep., 17 Ch. D., 638), and stating the effect of that decision, his Lordship said the Judge in these cases was not to be guided only by a comparison of the two names, although similarity in the two was a strong ingredient. In the absence of other evidence, he did not think the introduction of the word "Manchester" was at all likely to deceive or to make people think there had been an amalgamation. The catch-word was generally the first word, and if the title had been "Manchester and North Cheshire Brewery Company" different considerations would apply. His Lordship then referred to the other evidence in the case, and concluded by dismissing the action, with costs.

GORMULLY AND JEFFERY MANUFACTURING COMPANY
V. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railways—Goods—Charges—Commercial travellers' luggage—Bicycles.

A commercial traveller in bicycles who travels with the component parts and with incomplete machines is entitled to the special terms given by railway companies in respect of commercial travellers' luggage, and should not be charged the higher rates for bicycles.

This action was brought to determine questions which had arisen between the parties as to the scale of charges applicable to certain cases belonging to the plaintiffs and containing portions of bicycles which a commercial traveller in the employment of the plaintiffs was taking with him, or intended to take with him, on the defendants' line. The charges of the defendants which were called in question were (a) cloak-room charge (b) charge for conveyance. The facts were shortly as follows:—The plaintiffs were manufacturers of bicycles; Mr. Darke was a commercial traveller in their employment. Mr. Darke was in the habit of taking about with him on his journeys one or more large cases containing portions of bicycles. Each case was large enough to contain two complete bicycles with the seats, pedals, and handle-bars taken off the bicycle and stowed separately. The cases were completely closed, but their shape would indicate that they were meant to contain bicycles. Mr. Darke never took with him in these cases bicycles intended for sale, but only samples to show to customers. He did not take seats or handle-bars, or more than one pedal. By the regulations of the defendant company, which are to be found on pages 192 and 193 of the company's time-table, bicycles (except bicycles with two large wheels abreast), when conveyed as passenger's luggage at owner's risk, are charged at the rate of 1s. for a distance above 25 miles and not exceeding 50 miles. Ordinary bicycles when left in the care of the company are charged at the rate of 4d. for two days. Commercial travellers when travelling third class are allowed to take with them free of charge 1½wt. of luggage. The cloak-room charge for luggage deposited by commercial travellers is one-half the ordinary charge. During last year a question arose between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to whether the cases taken about by their travellers, and containing samples, should be charged for conveyance and cloak-room accommodation as bicycles or as commercial travellers' luggage. The defendants, having put the matter before the representatives of other railway companies in the usual way, informed the plaintiffs that charges must be paid as for bicycles. On February 27, 1897, Mr. Darke tendered a case such as has been described at the cloak-room at St. Pancras. The defendants demanded the payment of 4d., the proper charge for a bicycle. Mr. Darke refused to pay more than 1d., the proper charge for a commercial traveller's luggage. The stationmaster was sent for, and at his request the case was found to contain a bicycle without a seat, handle-bars, or pedals. The stationmaster insisted on a charge of 4d., whereupon Mr. Darke took the case away. On March 2 Mr. Darke was starting from St. Pancras for Scotland. He brought back the same case, which he intended to take as far as Bedford. If the case was a commercial traveller's luggage he was entitled to have it carried free of charge. The company demanded 1s., the proper charge for a bicycle, which he paid under protest. On the same day he brought a second case, similar in shape to the first, and tendered it at the cloak-room. This case, in fact, contained only tires and rims. A similar discussion arose. Mr. Darke stated that it only contained portions of bicycles. The defendants' servants alleged that Mr. Darke refused to open the case. This he denied. The case was ultimately put in the cloak-room and remained there up to the trial of the action, the defendants refusing to give it up unless the proper charge for a bicycle were paid.

Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C. (Mr. F. Stroud with him), for the plaintiffs, contended—(1) that even if the cases had contained complete bicycles they were not subject to the rates for bicycles. It was the package, not the contents, that was of importance to the carriers. The regulations above referred to bore out this contention, bicycles of shapes occupying more room being charged at higher rates. The regulations were framed with regard to unpacked bicycles. (2) Even if that were not so, these cases did not, in fact, contain bicycles, but only portions of bicycles.

Mr. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C., and Mr. LOEHNIS, for the defendants, contended, as to the first case, that it contained a bicycle; a bicycle did not cease to be a bicycle because the pedals and handle-bars had been removed and it had no seat. As to the case containing tires and rims, where a carrier had reasonable grounds for supposing that a package contained goods of a description which would subject it to a higher rate or other special provisions he was entitled to ask that it should be opened. The shape of the case and the circumstances of February 27 gave the defendants such reasonable grounds.

The learned JUDGE, in giving judgment, said that he must give judgment against the defendants. He had no doubt that when a railway company gave to commercial travellers described by that name the right to carry more than the ordinary amount of luggage they did so in order that they might take their samples with them. In this case he found as a fact that Mr. Darke was known to the defendants as a commercial traveller for the plaintiffs. They knew that the plaintiffs were engaged in selling portions of bicycles, or possibly whole bicycles. They also well knew that when Mr. Darke tendered each of the cases they were cases which he was taking with him not as merchandise or ordinary passenger's luggage, but as a commercial traveller's samples. He did not think that in the circumstances the defendants should have refused to take Mr. Darke's word that the case did not contain bicycles or were justified in asking to have the case opened. There might, however, be circumstances which would justify a railway company in asking to have a package opened. Mr. Darke's description of the contents of the case were, in fact, true. The defendants were not entitled to the extra cloak-room fee or the charge for conveyance. As there was no question of damages raised, judgment would be for the plaintiffs for 40s., with costs on the High Court scale.

The learned Judge did not express an opinion as to what his judgment would have been if either of the cases had contained a complete bicycle.

ST. PAUL, CAMDEN-SQUARE.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Ritual—Lighted candles on the re-table—Faculty granted.

Judgment was delivered by the Chancellor on an application for a faculty to authorize the placing of two lights on the re-table in the church of St. Paul, Camden-square, at early celebrations in order to meet the wishes of those attending the early celebrations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF LONDON, in delivering judgment, said:—In this case the Rev. George Tiley, vicar of St. Paul's, Camden-square, and the churchwardens of the parish on June 10 last applied to the Court for a faculty authorizing their making certain alterations and extensive decorations in the parish church, including the placing of two lights on the re-table in the church. Mr. Frederick Makin, an architect and surveyor resident in the parish, in person opposed the granting of the faculty in certain particulars, and more especially its sanctioning the placing of the lights on the re-table, on the ground that they were intended to be lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion when not required to give light, in contravention of the ruling of the Judicial Committee in the case of "Martin v. Mackonochie." The vicar in his evidence stated that it was his intention to have them lighted at the early celebrations when they were not required to give light, if it was legal to do so, but not at the midday celebrations. As the details of the application to the Court had not been submitted to a vestry duly summoned, I adjourned the further hearing of the case until this should have been done. On June 17 resolutions in favour of the proposed alterations were submitted to a duly-summoned vestry, at which an amendment was proposed by Mr. Makin and seconded, disapproving of the two lights being placed on the re-table on the ground previously mentioned. The amendment was lost, 40 voting against it and 16 for it.

On July 3 last the case again came before the Court, when the vicar deposed that he only proposed to have the candles lighted at the early celebrations in order to meet the wishes of those who attended these celebrations, and who liked to see them lighted there as symbolical that Christ was the true light of the world. He added that the members of his congregation with old-fashioned notions who would object to their being lighted when not required to give light only attended the midday celebrations, when they would not be lighted. I thereupon granted a faculty to enable the general alterations and decorations proposed to be made, but reserved my judgment on the question of the two lights proposed to be placed on the re-table. On this question the decisions are somewhat conflicting. In the case of "Martin v. Mackonochie" (L.R., 2 P.C., 365) the Judicial Committee laid it down in general terms that by law lights on a Holy Table or on a re-table ought not to be lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion unless required to give light. In "Read v. The Bishop of Lincoln" the late Archbishop of Canterbury arrived at the conclusion, upon the consideration of new materials brought to light since the decision in "Martin v. Mackonochie," "that there was not sufficient warrant for declaring that the law is broken by the mere fact of two lighted candles, when not wanted for the purpose of giving light, standing continuously on the Holy Table through the service, nothing having been performed or done which comes under the definition of ceremony by the presence of two still lights before it begins and after it ends" ([1891] P., at p. 88). The Judicial Committee, in dealing with this question on appeal, held that, it being admitted that two candles, not required for the purpose of giving light, were alight throughout the celebration on the Holy Table without objection on the part of the Bishop, who was officiating as Bishop, but there being no evidence either of a ceremonial use of the lights or that the Bishop had introduced them as unlawful ornaments, he was not responsible for them, and that his making no objection to them did not constitute an ecclesiastical offence. The Board observed:—"If the proof corresponded with the allegation in all respects, it would be matter for grave consideration how far the Archbishop's elaborate exposition of the history of the question and in particular the decision of two learned Judges in 1628 and 1629 have afforded new materials for consideration since the decision of this Board in 'Martin v. Mackonochie' on the same subject; but their Lordships are unable to see that the charge against the Bishop raises the same question. The charge against Mr. Mackonochie, who was himself responsible for the arrangement of the service and for the ornaments in his church, was presented under two aspects, and this Board dealt with both—the ceremonial lighting and burning of the candles when light was not required, and the placing and keeping the candles as unlawful ornaments on the Lord's Table. The act of lighting candles or keeping them alight, the placing or maintaining ornaments, are all things for which the incumbent of the church is himself responsible, and their Lordships in the case of 'Martin v. Mackonochie' felt themselves compelled to deal with the questions whether there had been a ceremonial use of the lights and whether unlawful ornaments had been in use. It was on the latter ground that the judgment against the respondent was rested. No such question arises here. If the Bishop had disapproved of the lights he would have had no power to remove them" ("Read v. Bishop of Lincoln" [1892], P., at p. 662). This the Bishop could only do through the process of his Consistorial Court. Having regard to the above decisions and to the facts of the present case, the Court, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it in relation to allowing or disallowing ornaments in a church, will sanction by faculty the placing of the two lights on the re-table or on the Holy Table, subject to a proviso that they shall not be lighted during the ordinary morning or midday or afternoon or evening services in the church, except when required for the purpose of giving light.

IN RE THE FEVERIL GOLD MINES (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Petition—Who may present—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 82.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 25), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne's (reported in The Times of November 9 and ante, p. 25). The case involved an important and somewhat novel point of company law. A petition had been presented by a shareholder, holding 5,000 fully-paid shares, to wind up the company, and a motion was made on behalf of the company and two shareholders, one holding 20 shares on which 16s. 6d. per share had been paid, and the other holding 13,600 fully-paid shares, to stay proceedings upon the petition. All the shares were of the nominal value of £1 each. It was conceded for the purposes of the motion that the petitioner was a contributory who would be entitled to petition but for clause 164 of the articles of association, which was as follows:—“(a) No petition shall be presented or proceeded with by a member to wind up the company except and unless (a) by consent in writing of not less than two of the then board, or (b) in pursuance or by permission of a resolution passed by a majority at a general meeting of the company, or (c) the petitioner or petitioners shall hold or together hold not less than one-fifth of the then issued capital of the company, upon which all calls shall have been paid.” It was admitted that the petitioner had not complied with any one of the conditions mentioned in this clause of the articles. The Companies Act, 1862, provides by section 79:—“(1) A company under this Act may be wound up by the Court, as hereinafter defined, under the following circumstances (that is to say):—(1) Whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up by the Court; (2) whenever the company does not commence its business within a year from its incorporation, or suspends its business for the space of a whole year; (3) whenever the members are reduced in number to less than seven; (4) whenever the Court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up”; and by section 82:—“(1) Any application to the Court for the winding up of a company under this Act shall be by petition; it may be presented by the company, or by any one or more creditor or creditors, contributory or contributories of the company, or by all or any of the above parties, together or separately.” Mr. Justice Byrne held that such a provision or contract as was contained in clause 164 could not, consistently with the Companies Act, be made by the articles of association, and that the clause was therefore invalid. His Lordship accordingly refused the motion to stay proceedings on the petition. The company and the two shareholders appealed.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy were heard for the appellants; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and

Mr. Eustace Smith, for the petitioner, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that a very ingenious argument had been addressed to the Court by Mr. Jenkins, and Mr. Cozens-Hardy had elaborated it, and made it (if possible) plainer than his leader had done. But a fallacy lay at the root of it. His Lordship would begin by reading the following passage from the speech of Lord Macnaghten in “Welton v. Saffery” ([1897] A.C., at p. 324):—“These companies are the creature of statute, and by the statute to which they owe their being they must be bound, in regard to shareholders as well as in regard to creditors, in all matters coming within the conditions of the memorandum of association. Shareholders in these companies require protection just as much as creditors—perhaps even more—shareholders are not partners for all purposes; they have not all the rights of partners; they have practically no voice in the management of the concern. Their security, in a great measure, depends on the directors adhering to the requirements of the Act.” Any one who was familiar with the Companies Acts must know perfectly well that these registered limited companies were incorporated on certain conditions; they continued to exist on certain conditions; and they were to be dissolved on certain conditions. The important sections of the Act of 1862, with regard to their dissolution, were sections 79 and 82. Section 79 stated the circumstances under which such a company might be dissolved by the Court, and section 82 stated the persons who might petition for a dissolution. Any article which said that the company was formed on the condition that its life should not be terminated when any of the circumstances mentioned in section 79 existed, or to limit the right of a contributory under section 82 to petition for a winding up, would be an attempt to enforce on all the shareholders that which would be at variance with the statutory conditions. It was no answer to say that the right might be waived by any contributory personally. His Lordship did not mean to say that a valid contract might not be made between the company and a shareholder that he should not petition for the winding up of the company. But to say that the company was formed on the condition that its existence should not be terminated under the circumstances or on the application of the persons mentioned in the Act was contrary to the provisions of the Act and was invalid. The view taken by Mr. Justice Byrne was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY was of the same opinion. The Court had not now to consider whether an individual shareholder could or could not bind himself not to petition for the winding up of the company, nor generally how far the provisions of the Act might be modified by the articles of association. In his Lordship's opinion this condition was annexed to the incorporation of a company with limited liability—that the company might be wound up under the circumstances and at the instance of the persons prescribed by the Act, and that the articles of association could not validly provide that the shareholders who were entitled under section 82 to petition for a winding up should not do so except on certain conditions. It was admitted in argument that a provision that no creditor or contributory should petition, or that the company itself should not petition, would be invalid. In his Lordship's opinion, section 82 laid down an essential condition, and the articles could not provide that it should not be fulfilled. In the present case the clause only imposed a limitation, but if the Court were to hold that this limitation was valid they could not stop short of saying that the condition might be dispensed with altogether.

PINET V. MAISON LOUIS PINET (LIMITED).*

Trade Name—Imitation—Assumed name—Transfer to a company—Injunction.

A decision of the Court of Appeal is reported ante, p. 2, in an action by the present plaintiffs, who carry on business in Paris as manufacturers of boots and shoes under the style of F. Pinet et Cie., against a person who had made boots and shoes under the name of Louis Pinet at 26, Berners-street, and a limited company called Maison Pinet (Limited), formed early this year to take over his business. The defendants said that their business was almost entirely limited to articles of special make, either for the purpose of persons with legs of unequal length, hiding the defect, or for the purpose of giving an appearance of height to the wearers by means of "elevators"—that is, a kind of wedge inside the heel of the boot or shoe. They asserted that their business could in no way compete with the large sale the plaintiffs have in London of their well-known boots and shoes. The Court of Appeal granted an injunction to restrain the defendants to that action from using the name of Pinet in connexion with the sale or manufacture of boots and shoes, without distinguishing these articles from those of the plaintiffs' manufacture. At the date of that injunction, it seemed, steps had been taken to form a new company with larger capital to take over the business. The new company has since been registered under the slightly altered name of Maison Louis Pinet (Limited). Fresh proceedings were taken in two actions (the one supplementing the other as to parties and otherwise) by the same plaintiffs against the new company, its directors (of whom Louis Pinet was one), and the old company, to restrain the companies from using the name of Pinet in connexion with the sale and manufacture of boots and shoes, and also to restrain the sale of the business by the old company to the new company or by either company to any one else. Since the hearing of the motion in the old action, it has been discovered on police evidence that the person who had taken the name of Louis Pinet had at one time been an Irish solicitor under the name of Dunch, and that he had many times changed his name for various supposed purposes, one of the names adopted being Ransome, in some connexion with a money-lending business carried on in the neighbourhood of the business of Messrs. Ransome the bankers. The actions were now brought on on motions for interlocutory injunctions till trial.

Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. B. B. Cooper for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH said,—I think the case is a very clear one. As regards this man who began life as an Irish solicitor under the name of Dunch, and has since changed successively to the trade of money-lender and manufacturer of boots and shoes under various names, then when he wanted to deal in money in Pall-mall takes the name of Ransome, and then changes subsequently to Gower, then again to Forbes Gower, then when he goes into boots he takes the name of Pinet for reasons which every one knows—as far as he is concerned I think he is utterly wrong. I think that he has been guilty from first till last of a commonplace, clumsy fraud, and I think I should be wasting public time if I were to give any more words to the position he has in the matter. As regards the other defendants there is a little more to be said. In the company which has been called the old company, formed in the beginning of the year 1897, Mr. Eastmead and Mr. Dunch, or Pinet, were directors. In the company which has been formed in 1897 there are four directors, Mr. Potter, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Eastmead, and Mr. Pinet. Mr. Pinet I put aside altogether. [His Lordship, after referring to the affidavit made by Mr. Phillips, proceeded] I see that as to that deponent and as to Mr. Potter they were not, as I said, directors of the old company. Mr. Eastmead was. He has not made any affidavit, but I should be quite willing to accept on behalf of these three the disclaimer of any fraud on their part contained in the paragraphs of the affidavit that I have read if they had given evidence of their bona fides in such disclaimer by saying they did not resist for a moment the application made on behalf of the plaintiffs. They have not taken that course, and I am sorry for it. I hope that their justification which they put forward is well founded; but, in my opinion, it is not nearly enough for their purpose in regard to what is proved in this case when the matter was before the Court of Appeal not very long since, which was in what has been called the old action, an action commenced last spring. At that time it was asserted on behalf of Mr. Pinet, and the contrary was apparently not known to or suspected by anybody else—it was believed on the part of all persons and by the Court itself, as appears from the judgment—that Pinet was the real name of the defendant, and the case was dealt with on that footing, a case in which he had a name of his own which he could not be restrained from using. The facts now proved show that it is nothing of the sort, and that basis was entirely wrong. No doubt a man may by law change his surname if he likes. He cannot be prevented from doing it. An Act of Parliament is not necessary for the purpose, but if he wants to have the benefit arising from any such change it must be an honest change, it must not be changed, that is, for the purpose of putting on the semblance of somebody else and passing off his goods as the goods of that other person. It is quite clear to me in this case that the parties cannot get any benefit from the fact that a short time since Mr. Pinet took that name when it was not his own, and they cannot have any advantage from that any more than they would have had if he had never taken that name at all and they were doing now all that has been done, his name of Dunch being retained and nothing else substituted for it. It seems to me quite clear it is a case in which the plaintiffs are entitled to have an order against the defendants to restrain them from interfering with the thoroughly well-known trade of the plaintiffs under the name of Pinet. In the last words that I read of Mr. Phillips's affidavit he referred to the reputation of the plaintiffs, which is thoroughly established as well as any trade reputation could be by an abundance of evidence, and it is quite clear why this name Pinet has been assumed by the defendants. The injunction was granted by the Court of Appeal to restrain the old company from using the name without distinguishing and pointing out that they were not the plaintiffs' company. The fact that such an order has been granted has not deterred the new company from attempting to do the very same thing. Under those circumstances, I think they must have an injunction granted against them to restrain them from using the name Pinet at all in connexion, of course, with the manufacture or selling of boots and shoes. Of course, I do not go beyond that or restrain them from using the name for any other purpose they think fit and which is within their memorandum of association. I must restrain them from using the name Pinet at all in the manufacture or sale of boots or shoes. Then, looking at the notice of motion for the purpose of seeing the exact form, I think the case is very like that of "Brinsmead and Sons" (13 The Times L.R., 3), with this element, which makes it worse. In that case of Brinsmead there were two or three (I forget which) persons concerned in the matter who really were Brinsmeads, father and son. In the present case there is nobody who is really Pinet at all, although the defendant has assumed that name and has adopted it recently for a fraudulent purpose. In the result, his Lordship granted an injunction restraining the use of the word Pinet in connexion with the sale or manufacture of boots or shoes and the dealing with the defendants' business.

KLAMBOROWSKI V. COOKE.*

Practice—O. 22, r. 22—Payment into Court—
Communication to jury.

In this action the plaintiff, the Rev. Leonard Klamborowski, rector of Chedburgh, Suffolk, claimed damages for libel from Mr. William Ambrose Cooke, a retired publican, residing at Chedburgh. The defendant admitted that he published the words complained of, but said he did not intend them to bear the construction put upon them by the plaintiff.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. A. H. Poyser were counsel for the plaintiff; and Mr. Boydell Houghton appeared for the defendant.

In opening the pleadings the learned counsel stated to the jury that the defendant had paid money into Court.

Mr. HOUGHTON.—I object to my friend's making that statement to the jury. It is contrary to the O. 22, r. 22.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—That is so, but in my opinion the rule is a very foolish one and works very inconveniently. I think it would be much better that the jury should know when money is paid into Court. As, however, the learned counsel has now informed the jury, we may as well "go the whole hog" and tell them the amount. (To the jury.)—Gentlemen, the defendant has paid £5 into Court, and he says that is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

Mr. POYSER, in opening the plaintiff's case, said that Mr. Klamborowski had been rector of Chedburgh for the past seven years, and during that time there had been an uncomfortable state of things in the parish, and a good deal of hostility had been shown to the rector, especially by the defendant, who took a considerable interest in parish matters. It appeared that amongst the Chedburgh charities was one called the Stansfield Mill Charity, the funds of which were administered by three trustees, the rector, ex officio, and a Mr. Chapman and a Mr. Ransom, for the relief of the poor. In November, 1896, the rector met the miller, who had to pay a sum of ten shillings for the relief of the poor, and received that sum direct from him. Instead of paying the money on behalf of the trustees into the bank at Bury St. Edmunds he took upon himself, rightly or wrongly, the distribution of the 10s. amongst those who needed it. Afterwards he sent a list of the persons to whom the money was given and the amounts to his co-trustee Mr. Chapman. Then Mr. Cooke, the defendant, who had shown considerable hostility to the rector before February, 1897, went to Mr. Chapman and obtained a list of these distributions. He then caused a parish meeting to be called and on the 8th of February wrote to Mr. Klamborowski giving him notice that he was to pay a sum of 10s., which was due to the Chedburgh Charity, and if it was not paid by a certain time other proceedings would be taken. Neither the parish council nor the defendant Mr. Cooke had anything whatever to do with the Chedburgh charities. Mr. Klamborowski replied that he had paid over the amount to the poor, but he was ready to give an additional 10s. to the fund if Mr. Cooke would do the same. On the 24th of February Mr. Cooke went to the County Court office and issued process against the rector for the recovery of 10s. on behalf of the trustees. It was the statement contained in the particulars of this claim which constituted the libel complained of. The particulars were signed by Mr. Cooke, chairman of the parish council, and set forth "that he (the rector) received ten shillings from Stansfield Mill, money belonging to the Chedburgh trustees, and had misappropriated the same." There had not been the slightest impropriety or dishonesty on the part of Mr. Klamborowski, and his statement of the accounts showing how the sum in question was expended was adopted by the trustees and the parish council. The action in the County Court was withdrawn on account of the death of one of the trustees, Mr. Chapman. On March 23 a parish meeting was held and the accounts were accepted and posted up in the room. That was the first occasion on which the parish council had any right, counsel contended, to interfere in the matter.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—I am not at all sure of that. If any of the parishioners have reason to believe that charitable funds are being improperly dealt with surely they have a right to call a parish meeting.

Mr. POYSER (continuing).—Mr. Klamborowski endeavoured to obtain a withdrawal of the charge made by Mr. Cooke publicly at the parish meeting, but instead of that he received nothing but abuse. After the commencement of the action, Mr. Cooke wrote to the plaintiff regretting that the word "misappropriate" was used, and saying that he was willing to pay the costs of the action if it was not proceeded with. Mr. Klamborowski was not satisfied with this and so the action proceeded.

Mr. Klamborowski, the plaintiff, was called and gave evidence in support of his case.

Cross-examined by Mr. HOUGHTON. When he first came to the parish Mr. Cooke was people's churchwarden. A difference arose between them and he resigned. Mr. Cooke was a trustee of the charity as churchwarden, and there was a complaint on his part that witness had distributed the funds without consulting him. There was a grave in the churchyard where a friend of Mr. Cooke's was buried, and Mr. Cooke used to keep flowering plants on it. After he ceased to be churchwarden, witness declined to allow him to renew the plants. He objected to the defendant's gardening in the churchyard. A wire fence was put up around this particular grave but he did not know that it was for the purpose of preventing his own fowls from scratching the grave. A letter appeared in the East Anglian Times written by witness on "Churchyard Rights and Wrongs" referring to this incident. In his letter he said that the freehold of the churchyard belonged to the rector and no one had a right of access except for service. He referred to the defendant as swearing and brawling in the churchyard. Witness summoned Mr. Cooke before the magistrates, but the summons was dismissed. He denied that the flowering plants had been torn up and thrown away. They had been put away with the dead flowers from the church. He wrote a letter in 1896 about the Chedburgh charities to a local paper, and referred to his dispute with the defendant as a "little foam in a quart pot." (Laughter.) He denied that he had intended to hold up the defendant to ridicule for dropping his h's, but he did intend to infer that he was not a fit person to be chairman of the parish council. With regard to the 10s., the Charity Commissioners wrote to him on January 16, 1897, conveying in effect Mr. Cooke's complaint about that matter. He did not admit that he had done wrong in distributing the money without consulting his co-trustees. He remembered the parish meeting being convened on February 22 to deal with the question of the distribution by him of the 10s. without the concurrence of the trustees.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—You were constituting yourself a judge of who was to receive the money and in what proportion. That was quite wrong, for your co-trustees were equally responsible with yourself. His Lordship inquired whether there was not an assize town near Chedburgh and why this case had not been tried at the Assizes.

MR. HOUGHTON.—We desired to have it tried at the Assizes, but it was resisted.

Cross-examination continued.—When the officer served the County Court summons he remarked to witness, on the word misappropriation, "A strong word to use, Sir, isn't it?" (Laughter.) On the 13th of March, 1897, witness wrote another humorous letter to the local paper giving a description of the "doles" meeting at which the defendant had attempted to be present. The defendant had no right to be present at that meeting and witness objected. At the parish meeting he did make a reference in connexion with Mr. Cooke to curs and kicking out. (Laughter.) Mr. Cooke did not say that all he had done was under the direction of the parish council. Witness suggested he should serve the writ in this action with his own hand. He did not know whether he had instructed his solicitors to write to the defendant and ask for an apology. The defendant did say he was willing to apologize, but his answer was that the matter had passed into legal hands and must go on. He was again approached, and asked to accept an apology to stop this action but he declined.

MR. BOYDELL HOUGHTON proceeded to address the jury on behalf of the defendant, and at the close of the learned counsel's address, the Foreman of the jury intimated to the learned Judge that they had all made up their minds as to the verdict.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—You are quite justified, gentlemen, in expressing your opinion now if you are all agreed. What is your verdict?

The Foreman of the Jury.—We find for the plaintiff, damages one farthing.

Judgment was given accordingly, his LORDSHIP directing that £4 19s. 11½d. of the £5 paid into Court should be repaid to the defendant.

REG. V. THE JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF THE COUNTY OF YORK—EX PARTE SHAW.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Refusal to transfer—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61), sec. 14.

This was a motion for a mandamus to the Quarter Sessions of the West Riding of York to hear the appeal of Joseph Howarth Shaw against the refusal of the justices of the county borough of Halifax, sitting at the special sessions for the transfer of licences, to grant him a transfer of his "on" licence in respect of the Peacock Inn, situate in Market-street, Halifax, the said inn having been pulled down for certain public improvements, to another fit and convenient house intended to be opened in Market-street. The case was argued on the 3rd and 5th of April before Mr. Justice Cave and Mr. Justice Lawrance, who disagreed. It was reargued on November 20 before Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Kennedy.

In support of the rule appeared Mr. Kershaw, Q.C., Mr. Montgomery, and Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C.; Mr. T. P. Perks appeared for the respondent, the objector; Mr. Roskill represented the justices.

Judgment was delivered this morning.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW said this was an application for a mandamus to compel the quarter sessions to hear the appeal of Mr. Shaw against the refusal of the justices below to transfer his licence under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61). The quarter sessions had held that the section did not apply, and accordingly refused to go into the case. The facts were shortly these:—Prior to November 30, 1894, a Mrs. Toole was the licensed proprietress of the Peacock Inn, Halifax. The Halifax Corporation took the site of that inn for the purpose of a public improvement, and gave notice to Mrs. Toole to terminate her tenancy. Shaw became tenant, and probably entered to a certain extent into formal occupation, because on November 30, 1894, he applied for authority to carry on the business of licensed victualler at the Peacock, and obtained it. This would remain in force till the following February. On December 7, 1894, he, on behalf of one Naylor, applied for a transfer of the licence to other premises at some distance from the Peacock Inn. This was refused. On December 21 a sale of the effects of the Peacock Inn took place, and in the last week of December the inn was pulled down for the improvement of Albion-street and Market-street. On February 1, 1895, the inn being then pulled down, Shaw applied to the justices for a transfer licence under section 4 of the Act of 1828, and, strange to say, had it granted to him. The licence was a nullity and a fiction, as the inn was then gone. On July 29, 1896, the present application on behalf of Shaw was made—i.e., for a grant of a licence under section 14 of the Act of 1828. That Act, by section 4, provided thus:—"It shall be lawful for the justices . . . to license such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns as they the said justices shall in the execution of the powers herein contained . . . deem fit and proper persons." That provision did not apply to Shaw under the circumstance, but it was said that he came within section 14. Now section 14 was an extension of section 4 and to be read with it. It provided, "If any house being kept as an inn by any person duly licensed as aforesaid"—that description did not apply to Shaw—"shall be or about to be pulled down or occupied under the provisions of an Act for the improvement of the highways or for any other public purpose." Shaw sought to bring himself within that section. He was, however, not within it. He never was a "person duly licensed" within the meaning of that section, and was not therefore entitled to the benefit of the section. The justices of quarter sessions were therefore right, and the rule must be discharged.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. The central point of the case was whether there was an application properly made under section 4. The learned Judge in the first place was not satisfied that Shaw ever did in fact occupy the inn, his affidavit only saying that he "became tenant," but even if he did he never occupied as a licensed person licensed under the Act of 1828. The house must be kept as an inn by the person duly licensed until it was pulled down—that was, a person licensed under the Act at the time when it was pulled down. That was the natural construction of the words apart from any question of convenience. Moreover, any other construction would give rise to the possibility of there being a number of conflicting applicants, as, for instance, the landlord, the occupier in whose name the licence did not stand, and the occupier in whose name it did. Shaw had not brought himself within the section.

MR. ROSKILL then asked, on behalf of the justices, that the rule might be discharged with costs.

MR. PERKS, on behalf of the respondent Fowler, also asked for costs. His client had been served with notice of the rule nisi.

MR. MONTGOMERY, however, on behalf of the applicant, contended the right of the respondent to costs. The recent case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" (13 The Times L.R., 538, and 66 L.J., Q.B., 787) in the House of Lords had decided that licensing justices were not a Court of summary jurisdiction. It was true that notice had been given to Fowler, but at that time the case "Reg. v. Glamorgan, Justices of" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 621; 61 L.J., M.C., 169), in the Court of Appeal, was good law. That case made it necessary to treat licensing justices as a Court within the Summary Jurisdiction Act, and therefore made it necessary to give notice to the "other party"; but as that case had now been overruled the Summary Jurisdiction Acts could not be said to apply, and there was no "other party" entitled to notice.

MR. PERKS, in reply, referred to Rule 61 of the Crown Office Rules, which provided as follows:—"Notice shall be given by the order nisi for a mandamus to every person who by the affidavits on which the order is moved shall appear to be interested in or likely to be affected by the proceedings." He said his client, the objector, was a person interested as shown by the affidavits.

The Court took time to consider the decision in respect of costs.

THE MERCANTILE AGENCY COMPANY LIMITED V. FLITWICK CHALYBEATE COMPANY.*

Contract—Agreement in writing—Wrongful admission of parol evidence.

This action was brought by the appellants, publishers of an advertising periodical called the Colonial Buyers' Guide, against the respondents, mineral water proprietors in the Borough, to recover damages for the non-delivery of goods pursuant to an agreement in writing. By the agreement the respondents agreed to pay the appellants for the reservation of an advertising space in the guide by the delivery of certain goods at the respondents' lowest prices and best discounts. The appellants inserted the advertisements and ordered 24 cases of Flitwick water of the respondents. The latter refused to deliver except on the terms that the appellants were not to sell the goods within the United Kingdom. The appellants then brought an action, claiming £200 as damages, or in the alternative £144, the agreed price of the advertisements. In effect, the defence was that the respondents entered into the agreement on the representation made verbally by the appellants' canvasser and representative that the Flitwick water was only required for shipment to the colonies or abroad. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Grantham and a common jury, when the latter returned a verdict in favour of the respondents, and judgment was entered for them. The appellants then moved the Court of Appeal to enter judgment for them, or in the alternative for a new trial on the ground that the learned Judge was wrong in admitting parol evidence to vary the written contract or to support a collateral agreement, but they refused the application. Hence the appeal to the House of Lords.

MR. ROBSON, Q.C., and Mr. Stephen Lynch were for the appellants; and Mr. Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. E. Morten for the respondents.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said that the respondents had failed to establish that there was any collateral contract or agreement that the goods supplied should be used exclusively for export. Whatever representations were made by the advertisement canvasser, he had no authority to bind the appellants, and it was not shown that any such representations ever reached the appellants' ears. Thus, in point of fact, there had been a failure to prove the allegations upon which the respondents relied. But if there really had been any such verbal stipulation as that put forward by the respondents, it would have been of no avail. It was a rule of law—and a salutary rule which prevented great inconvenience and troublesome litigation in many instances—that a written contract cannot be varied or modified by word of mouth. The cases cited on behalf of the respondents did not impair the stringency of that principle, as they were not really violations of the rule, but cases in which a perfectly independent parol contract had been made, not abrogating or in any way inconsistent with the original written contract. The decision of the Court of Appeal must be reversed, and judgment would be entered for the appellants for £144.

LORD WATSON concurred.

LORD HERSCHELL said that the present case was a good instance of the usefulness of the principle that no verbal alteration could be recognized or enforced of a written contract, and of the absolute necessity of adhering to that principle.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, LORD MORRIS, LORD SHAND, and LORD DAVEY concurred.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal was accordingly reversed and judgment given for the appellants.

mit within time limited—Action for penalties—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 33 (1), (5).

This was an action brought by Mr. Alexander Dugald MacKinnon, of Portree, Isle of Skye, against Dr. Gavin Brown Clark, M.P., of St. Ermin's-mansions, S.W., to recover penalties from him for having sat and voted in the House of Commons as member for Caithness without having duly transmitted a proper return and declaration respecting election expenses.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. H. Courthope Munroe appeared for the plaintiff; the Right Hon. H. H. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. Evans for the defendant.

The case was heard on November 15 last, when his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. LAWRENCE, Q.C., in his opening speech for the plaintiff, said that the action was brought under the Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vic., cap. 51). On July 22, 1895, a Parliamentary election was held for the county of Caithness at which the defendant was the successful candidate. The poll was declared on July 23, and it thereupon became the duty of the defendant to make a return to the returning officer on or before August 27, 1895. Dr. Clark was his own election agent and he did not make any return till August 27, when he put in the letter-box of the House of Commons what purported to be his return of his election expenses. It was too late for the post on August 27, and did not leave the House of Commons for Wick till August 28, where it arrived on August 29. That return was defective in a number of particulars. The defendant sat and voted on August 28 and other days, the number of occasions given in the particulars being 49. The present action was commenced on July 18, 1896. Thereupon, on September 24, he presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland and on January 14, 1897, an order was made finding that the following errors of omissions in the said return or declaration—viz. :—(a) Failure to enclose as part of the said return the receipt for £2 2s. paid by the defendant to Lybster Temperance-hall committee; (b) failure to enclose as part of the said return the receipt for £5 15s., paid by the defendant to James Nicol, Wick; (c) failure to insert the date of the election in the return which the defendant made; (d) failure to state accurately the Christian name of the said James Nicol, in the said return—arose by reason of inadvertence and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the defendant, and that he was entitled to an order for an authorized excuse in the terms of section 34 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, excusing all the said errors or omissions and also excusing the defendant's failure to transmit the return and declaration respecting his election expenses as required by the said Statute in so far as the above-mentioned errors or omissions imported or might be held to import such failure to transmit. A payment of £2 9s. to Henderson's Royal Hotel, Thurso, had, however, not been included in the return and no relief had been granted in respect thereof. By section 33, subsection (1), of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, it is provided that, "within 35 days after the day on which the candidates returned at an election are declared elected, the election agent of every candidate at that election shall transmit to the returning officer a true return (in this Act referred to as a return respecting election expenses) in the form set forth in the second schedule to this Act. . . ."

By section 33, subsection (5) :—"If, in the case of an election for any county or borough, the said return or declarations are not transmitted before the expiration of the time limited for the purpose, the candidate shall not, after the expiration of such time, sit or vote in the House of Commons as member for that county or borough until either such return and declarations have been transmitted or until the date of the allowance of such an authorized excuse for the failure to transmit the same, as in this Act mentioned, and if he sits or votes in contravention of this enactment he shall forfeit £100 for every day on which he so sits or votes to any person who sues for the same."

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY read a very elaborate written judgment. The claim of the plaintiff, said his Lordship, rested on two distinct grounds. The plaintiff first claimed in respect of the sitting and voting on August 28 and following 48 days on the ground that, the document sent being erroneous and therefore not a "true return" within section 33, subsection (1), there had been a total "failure to transmit" existing on August 28 and following days claimed for, and indeed up to the present time, because the "return" in the penal subsection (5) meant the "true return" prescribed by subsection (1). He was clearly of opinion that that contention of the plaintiff was unsound. He could not construe the transmission of an incorrect return as a failure to transmit. So to treat it would be to give an unnatural meaning to the words "failure to transmit" in section 33, subsection (5). And that view was confirmed by the language of section 34, by which a plain distinction was drawn between "not transmitting as required" (i.e., the failure to transmit as required) and transmitting some erroneous or false statement. So far as regarded the last 48 days, therefore, the defendant was entitled to succeed. As regarded the sitting and voting by the defendant on August 28, the plaintiff claimed a penalty for that day on the further ground that "transmission" in section 33 meant "completed transmission," and even if the document posted on the 27th could be treated as a "return" within section 33 the defendant incurred the penalty by sitting and voting on August 28, because the document had not then reached Wick and, therefore, had not then been transmitted to the returning officer, and the time limited for its "transmission"—viz., August 27—had expired. The defendant argued, on the other hand, that the statute only required the return to be put into course of transit within the 35 days. Upon the whole, he felt constrained to adopt the plaintiff's view of the interpretation of the expression. It appeared to him to be the prima facie natural meaning, and therefore, unless some reason against it was to be found, either in the nature of the subject-matter or in the context, the true meaning. He could find no such countervailing reason. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff for £100 out of the £4,900 which he had claimed in his action, without costs. There would be a stay of execution for ten days upon the usual terms. [Solicitors—Leggatt, Rubinstein, and Co., for the plaintiff; Lloyd-George, for the defendant.]

THE DARTFORD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL V. THE BEXLEY HEATH RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railways—Footpath—Bridge—Railways Clauses
Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 46.

Decision of Court of Appeal ([1896] 2 Q.B., 74) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, discharging an order of the Queen's Bench Division, directing that a writ of mandamus should issue commanding the respondents, the Boxley Heath Railway Company, to carry their railway over a certain public footpath or the footpath over the railway by means of a bridge. In 1883 the respondents obtained an Act of Parliament authorizing the construction of the railway, and its powers and provisions were amended and enlarged by subsequent Acts. These Acts incorporated the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and parts 1 and 3 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1863. In the construction of the railway the respondents carried the line on an embankment across a public footpath in the parish of Crayford. In February, 1895, the parish council of Crayford passed a resolution calling on the appellants, under the Local Government Act, 1894, to assert the right of the inhabitants in regard to the footpath so obstructed, and they took action accordingly. The Divisional Court directed the writ of mandamus in question to issue, but the Court of Appeal reversed their decision and discharged the rule for the writ with costs. The appellants now appealed to this House on the ground that the respondents had neither, under their Acts or the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, power or authority to obstruct the footpath.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Gerald Hohler appeared for the appellants; Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Boyle, for the respondents, were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the appeal be dismissed with costs. The Railway Clauses Act was by its form and structure not intended to be a final Act applicable to all cases. The Legislature contemplated that provision should be made by the special Act in each case.

LORD WATSON concurred. The Legislature intended that bridges of a certain height and width should, at a future time, be prescribed by the special Act of the company. In this instance the special Act made no such provision, and, therefore, the case of the appellants was necessarily based on the terms of section 46 in the Railway Clauses Act, 1845. But from beginning to end there were no words in that statute imposing on a railway company any obligation except to erect bridges of a height, width, and dimensions, thereafter, either in that Act or in the special Act prescribed. No such provision having been made either by general or special legislation, no such right was conferred as was claimed on behalf of the appellants.

LORD HERSCHELL said that the fallacy which ran through the argument of the appellants' counsel was that they overlooked the fact that the statute of 1845 had not of itself any operation in respect of any road whatever, whether carriage, footpath, or turnpike, until it was brought into operation by particular obligations created by the special Acts when provision was made by the special Act, then the 46th section of the Railway Clauses Act and the special Act together came into operation. That was the scheme of legislation, and the general statute did not profess to provide for every case, but recognized that there might be cases in which the matter would be better dealt with by special legislation. There was no oversight and no such clumsiness as the learned counsel had attributed to the legislation. The whole system was perfectly consistent and intelligible.

The other noble and learned LORDS having concurred, the appeal was dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J.) } 1897.
Dec. 3.

IN THE MATTER OF ESTATE DUTY PAYABLE ON THE DEATH OF THE SECOND EARL COWLEY.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Amount payable—Deductions—Mortgage of settled property—Value of property passing on death of tenant for life—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 30), sec. 2, subs. 1 (b), and sec. 7, subs. 1 (a), subs. 7 (b).

Decision of the Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 393, and [1897] 2 Q.B., 47) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Bruce) on a petition under section 10 of the Finance Act, 1894, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 393. The petitioner was the third Earl Cowley, and the question was with regard to the estate duty payable on the death of his father, the second Earl Cowley. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith, and it is only necessary to state here that the second Earl Cowley on July 15, 1884, succeeded to certain estates as tenant for life, and that he and his eldest son, then Viscount Dangan, the present petitioner, as the heir-in-tail, barred the entail and resettled the property to such uses as they should jointly appoint and until such appointment to the use of the second Earl for life, with remainder to the petitioner in tail. The second Earl and the petitioner subsequently mortgaged the life estate of the former and the reversionary interest of the latter to the Prudential Assurance Company to secure the repayment of £230,000. By another deed the second Earl covenanted to pay to the petitioner an annuity of £3,000 during the former's life. The second Earl died on February 28, 1895, and thereupon the petitioner, who became entitled to an estate in possession, delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an affidavit which showed the aggregate value of the property to be £538,426 11s. 1d. After allowing for certain deductions on annuities valued at £9,140 17s. the Crown claimed estate duty on the whole principal value. The petitioner contended—first, that he was entitled to a deduction from estate duty in respect of the mortgage of £230,000 in so far as the money raised had gone to his father; and, secondly, in the alternative, a deduction in respect of the whole amount of the mortgage of £230,000. He also claimed a deduction of £65,200 as being the capitalized value of the annuity of £3,000 which had been charged on the estate during his father's life. The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the petitioner in respect of the whole sum of £230,000 and against him in respect of the sum of £65,200. The Crown appealed, and there was a cross-appeal of the petitioner.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.), and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. H. Fellows for the petitioner.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day, allowing the appeal of the Crown and dismissing the cross-appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment, in which he said that the question raised upon the appeal was upon what amount was estate duty, under the Finance Act, 1894, to be assessed upon the estate of the second Earl Cowley, who died upon February 28, 1895—was it to be upon the sum of £538,426 11s. 1d., the then net principal value of what he (the Lord Justice) would call the settled estates, less only the sum of £9,140 17s., or less also the sum of £230,000, the amount of a mortgage debt, and less also the sum of £65,200, the capitalized value of an annuity of £3,000 a year payable to the third Earl, then Viscount Dangan, by his father, the second Earl, during his lifetime? It appeared that on June 27, 1863, the Earl of Mornington by will devised the settled estates to trustees upon trust for the first Earl Cowley for life, then to the second Earl Cowley for life, and then upon trust for the first and every other son of the second Earl Cowley in tail male. The testator died on July 25, 1863. The first Earl Cowley thereupon entered into possession of the estates, and whilst in possession died on July 15, 1884, and the second Earl Cowley then entered into possession thereof. The second Earl had previously—viz., on April 1, 1865—exercised a power of jointuring granted to him by the will of the Earl of Mornington and appointed a rent-charge of £500 a year in favour of his wife charged upon the settled estates. The second Earl, after he had entered into possession of the settled estates, mortgaged his life interest therein to the London Assurance Corporation to secure the repayment to them of large sums of money then borrowed by him of them, and he further secured the repayment thereof by policies of insurance upon his life. In these circumstances the second Earl Cowley and his eldest son (then Viscount Dangan), who was then of age, being each in need of money, agreed to disentail the settled estates, and for that purpose, upon January 14, 1887, executed a disentailing deed, which was duly enrolled, whereby the father and the son conveyed the settled estates subject to the above-mentioned mortgages and charges to a trustee upon such trusts as the second Earl and his son might thereafter jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of the second Earl for life and then to the use of Viscount Dangan in tail. The second Earl and his son proceeded to raise money from the Prudential Assurance Company, and, to summarize the figures, they obtained from that company a loan of £210,000, afterwards increased by further advances to the sum of £230,000, of which the father, the second Earl, took £199,987 11s. 8d. and the son, Viscount Dangan, took £30,012 8s. 4d. To secure the repayment of the £210,000 to the Prudential Company, a mortgage, dated June 8, 1888, was executed by the second Earl and his son, with the concurrence of the Countess Cowley, in favour of the Prudential Company, whereby they transferred to that company the mortgages which the second Earl had given to the London Assurance Corporation and which were then existing upon his life estate in the settled estates, which mortgages the London Assurance Corporation by deed of the same date conveyed and assigned to the Prudential Assurance Company. The policies upon the second Earl's life were also assigned to the Prudential Company. This mortgage deed recited that it was part of the arrangement for the loan that the mortgage debts to the London Assurance Corporation should be paid off and that they should be transferred to the Prudential Assurance Company as a further protection and security for their loan; and by this deed the second Earl and his son, as beneficial owners, in the exercise of the power of appointment vested in them by the disentailing deed and in the exercise of any other power in that behalf, with the consent of the Countess, conveyed to the Prudential Company the settled estates in fee subject to an equity of redemption reserved to the second Earl and Viscount Dangan or either of them. In this mortgage deed was contained the express proviso that the mortgage debts transferred to the Prudential Company should continue on foot as subsisting charges on the life estate of the second Earl for the benefit of the Prudential Company by way of an additional security for the principal sum then borrowed of that company. Subsequent mortgages were executed to secure the further advances above-mentioned. That was the position of matters when the second Earl died upon February 28, 1895. His Lordship could not doubt that in these dealings with the settled estates the life estate of the second Earl therein was expressly kept on foot as security for the moneys borrowed thereon, and that it was not extinguished or merged in an equitable estate in fee in the Prudential Company. The real substance of what was done—and this was what must be looked at apart from the form of the conveyancing—was that the second Earl mortgaged his life estate to the Prudential Company and that his son mortgaged his reversion to that company to secure the repayment of the £230,000. He could not agree with the learned Judges in the Court below that it was one charge on the fee simple of the settled estates—in other words, an overriding charge thereon. It was true that by the conjoint operation of the father and son the Prudential Company obtained an equitable estate in fee, but the charge remained a charge upon the life estate of the second Earl and upon the reversion of Viscount Dangan. The life estate of the second Earl remained extant until his death on February 28, 1895, charged with the mortgage of £230,000, when the life estate and the mortgage thereon each ceased. Coming to the Finance Act, 1894, section 1 would not cover the present case, for the life estate of the second Earl ceased at his death and did not pass to any one. By section 2, subsection 1, however, it was enacted that property passing on the death of the deceased should be deemed to include the following property:—“(a) Property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose.” That did not embrace the present case. “(b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest.” This subsection, in his judgment, covered the case of the life estate of the second Earl, which ceased upon his death, mortgaged as it was to the Prudential Company, and was intended to embrace such a case; and the extent to which a benefit accrued by the cesser of such interest was the extent of the interest which then ceased. That in the life estate of the second Earl, and consequently his life estate, when he died, became property which by the Act was to be deemed to have passed on his death, and came within section 2, subsection 1 (b). The next consideration was how by the Act property which was to be deemed to pass upon a death was to be valued for estate duty. By section 7, subsection 1, in valuing an estate allowance was to be made for reasonable funeral expenses and for debts or encumbrances, if such debts or encumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit and took effect out of his interest. That, in his opinion, meant debts or encumbrances to take effect out of the estate which passed. This mortgage debt of the second Earl was not a debt or encumbrance upon the estate which passed or was deemed to pass pursuant to the Act, for the mortgage upon the estate of the second Earl came to an end when that estate also came to an end, and was no longer a charge upon the life estate which was deemed to pass, and was not a debt upon the estate which passed, but only upon the reversion. Then by section 7, subsection 7, “the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased shall (b), if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property, be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended." It was under this subsection that the value of the benefit accruing was to be ascertained, because the interest which ceased at the death of the second Earl did not extend to the whole income, but only to the income less the charges represented by the beforementioned sum of £9,140 17s. Whatever might be the true interpretation of the words "of an addition to the property," they did not mean that the value was to be arrived at by making an allowance for a mortgage debt like the mortgage debt of £730,000 in this case. It was the value of the interest which passed or was deemed to pass which was to bear the estate duty, and when this interest passed it was no longer, except by the son's own act, clogged with this mortgage, for when the life estate ceased so did the mortgage thereon. It was not upon the value of what a man succeeded to that estate duty was payable, and how could the act of a reversioner in diminishing the value of his reversion when he got it affect the value of the property which passed upon a death? In his opinion, the value of the benefit accruing upon the death of the second Earl must be ascertained under section 7, subsection 7 (b), without making any allowance for the £230,000 mortgage. As regards the annuity of £3,000 charged upon the life estate of the second Earl and payable thereout during his life to his son, in his opinion the same reasoning applied, and no deduction could be made for that. As before stated, the Finance Act made liable to estate duty the value of the estate which passed, and not the value it might be to any individual successor, and this was the key to the construction of the Act: and consequently the point taken by Mr. Haldane, that the third Earl, when he succeeded to the settled estates, was no better off by the ceasing of this annuity than he was before, was in reality not in point. The appeal of the Crown as to the £230,000 mortgage succeeded, and the cross-appeal of the third Earl failed. Judgment must be entered for the Crown with costs.

IN RE RIPLEY AND SON'S TRADE MARK.*

Trade Mark—Registration—Capacity for—Invented word—"Pearl" and "Pirle"—Application for registration refused.

This was an application by Messrs. Ripley and Son, of Bradford, dyers and cloth finishers, by way of appeal from the refusal of the Comptroller-General of Patents to register the word "Pirle" as a trade mark for woollen fabrics in Class 34 under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Acts. The ground of the Comptroller's refusal was that "Pirle" was merely a mis-spelling of the word "Pearl," which he held was not registrable. The applicants stated that the word "Pirle" was formed by a transposition of the letters in the name "Ripley," omitting the final "y," and they contended that it was registrable as an "invented word," and was not open to objection as being a "geographical" word, or as a word "descriptive of the character or quality of the goods."

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter appeared for the applicants; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. Ingle Joyce, for the Comptroller-General, were not called upon.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, in giving judgment, said he thought the present application might be disposed of on extremely short grounds. He was not called upon to consider whether the word "Pearl" was capable of registration or not. He wished to say nothing on that point, because it might be competent for the applicants to bring forward that word again, possibly basing their application upon different evidence from that in the present case, and it was only right that such an application, if made, should be made without its being prejudiced by anything that might be said now. But the word "Pearl" had been brought before the Comptroller, and had been rejected. Therefore his Lordship must hold, for present purposes, that that word could not be registered. To decide whether the word "Pirle" was capable of registration it was not the eye only, but the ear also, that must be consulted; and to an ordinary person the difference in sound between "Pearl" and "Pirle" was not to be perceived. If "Pearl" was wrong, his Lordship thought that "Pirle" was equally wrong; and he agreed with the Comptroller in saying that this was a mere mis-spelling of the word "Pearl," and that if the applicants failed as regarded the one they must fail as regarded the other. It was said that "Pirle" was an invented word, but this transposition of the letters in the word "Ripley" with the final letter left out seemed to his Lordship a poor attempt at humour. He did not, however, decide the case on that ground, but simply on the ground that, "Pearl" not being capable of registration, "Pirle," being the same in tone, was also not capable of registration. On that ground he refused the application, with costs.

SCHENKER, WALFORD, AND CO. V. THE NEDERLANDSCHE BANK EN CREDIT VEREENIGING VOOR ZUID AFRIKA.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Advances by bank—Security for advances—Deposit of insurance policies—Moneys becoming payable under policies.

In this case the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were entitled as against the defendant bank to £3 2s. 6d. of each £10 payable by the underwriters in respect of each donkey lost under policies of insurance on donkeys shipped by the steamships Maori and Mount Sirion.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Leck appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir E. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. R. M. Bray, Q.C., for the defendant bank.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., in opening the case for the plaintiffs, said that the questions in the case arose out of the insurance of a large number of donkeys. Two gentlemen, named Vorster and Maltzam, had entered into a contract with the Government of the Transvaal to supply 4,000 Irish donkeys at a price of £12 per head, delivered at Pretoria. In order to obtain the donkeys Vorster and Maltzam entered into negotiations with the plaintiffs, who carried on business in London and Antwerp, and the plaintiffs agreed to supply the donkeys, part at £10 and part at £10 10s., delivered at Durban. This arrangement was only made by the plaintiffs on condition that Vorster and Maltzam obtained an advance from the defendant bank. Accordingly, on May 29, 1897, an agreement was entered into by Koehorst, the representative of Vorster and Maltzam, and the bank, by which the bank agreed to make an advance of £6 5s. per donkey shipped, with 10 per cent. commission to the bank, making together £6 17s. 6d. per donkey, or £27,500 in all. As a security for this advance the shipping documents, including the policies of insurance on the donkeys, were to be deposited with the bank. These policies had been effected by the plaintiffs on the 4,000 donkeys, valued at £10 each. By reason of the bank's advance, the interest of the plaintiffs under the policies was £3 2s. 6d. per donkey, and that of the bank £6 17s. 6d. per donkey. On the voyage from Ireland to the Cape 1,208 out of the 4,000 donkeys were lost within the terms of the policies, and the plaintiffs claimed that, of the £12,080 payable under the policies in respect of the loss, they were entitled to receive £3 2s. 6d. per donkey, amounting to £3,795. The bank, however, insisted that they were entitled to retain the £3,795, in order to secure the total advance which they had made. This contention was put forward by the bank, because it appeared that a large number of the donkeys, about 75 per cent., had been rejected by the Transvaal Government. The result of that contention would be to leave the plaintiffs entirely uncovered by the insurance. The question was, On what terms had the policies been delivered by the plaintiffs to, and been received by, the defendant bank? Counsel was proceeding to refer to the correspondence between the parties, which was extremely voluminous, when,

Mr. BRAY, Q.C., for the defendant bank, said that it might be convenient to state shortly the way in which they would put the defendants' case. They contended that the application for the advance was, in the first instance, made by the plaintiffs. The application was for a lump sum of £25,000, and the negotiations were carried on between the plaintiffs and the defendant bank. It was not until the contract had been drawn up that Koehorst was, at the request of the plaintiffs, substituted for them as principal. Under the contract an advance of £25,000 was made by the bank to Koehorst (as agent for Vorster and Maltzam), and the contract with the Transvaal Government was assigned to the bank, and the bills of lading and the policies of insurance were deposited with the bank as security for the £25,000. That sum had not been repaid, and therefore the bank claimed to be entitled to retain their securities.

The reading of the correspondence was then proceeded with. The addresses of counsel occupied the greater part of December 1 and 2.

At the close of the arguments the learned Judge reserved judgment.

Yesterday the learned JUDGE gave judgment. Having stated the nature of the action, the arrangements which had been made for the shipment of the 4,000 donkeys, and the relations of the various parties concerned in the transaction, he explained the steps by which the plaintiffs and the defendants had been brought together, and arrangements made for the advance of money by the bank upon the donkeys. In the course of the negotiations great stress was laid by the defendants on the policy of insurance to be taken out for the donkeys, and a policy in the form actually used was submitted to and approved of by them. The policy contained the marginal and other clauses usual in the case of an insurance of live stock. Each animal was valued at £10, and was deemed to be a separate subject-matter of insurance, so that for every animal lost the underwriter was to pay £10. Those negotiations resulted in a written agreement of May 29 between Mr. Koehorst, representing Messrs. Vorster and Maltzam, and the bank, which recited the arrangements which had been made by Vorster with the Transvaal Government and with the plaintiffs, including the arrangements for an advance of £25,000 by the bank and the assignment to the bank by way of security of the contract with the Transvaal Government. The operative part of the agreement provided that the bank should lend to Vorster and Maltzam the sum of £25,000 on certain conditions—namely, that after the donkeys had been shipped the bills of lading were to be handed over to the bank, also the policies of insurance and the contract with the Transvaal Government; that against delivery of these documents the bank should lend the sum of £6 5s. per animal shipped. £6 5s. represented the rate at which, if the whole 4,000 animals were shipped, the total amount of £25,000 would be arrived at. In the view of the learned Judge the stipulation as to £6 5s. being lent on each animal was introduced into the contract, not for the purpose or with the intention or effect of altering the character of the advance, but merely for the purpose of enabling the parties easily and quickly to ascertain the amount that should be advanced as and when the shipment of each lot of donkeys was made, for it was not anticipated that the whole 4,000 would be shipped in one lot. The contract then went on to provide for the loan of £25,000 or such less sum as might be measured by a smaller number of animals shipped. The plaintiffs urged that the animals were insured at £10 a head in order to cover the amount of their interest, and that the interest of the defendants in the policies only extended to the amount of their advance—namely, £6 5s. per head. The defendants contended that they held all the documents, including the policies, as a security for the repayment of their loan of £25,000. The learned Judge then commented on the correspondence in detail, from which, he said, it was clear that before the second shipment was made the defendants had given notice to the plaintiffs that they took up the position which they now maintained with regard to their rights under the policies, and the plaintiffs had accepted the advance on the second shipment without a word of protest or dissatisfaction. As a result of the action of the Transvaal Government the defendants were out of pocket to a large extent; they wanted to use the full proceeds of the policies to recoup themselves. The plaintiffs asked the Court to restrain them from making that use of those proceeds, although the result would be to leave the bank out of pocket. In the view of the learned Judge the meaning of the contract of May 29 was that the bank were to advance up to £25,000; if a less sum were lent it was by reason of a less number of animals being shipped, the actual amount of the loan being ascertained by deducting £6 5s. for each animal short shipped. The bank were to get the full benefit of the security of the bills of lading, why not of the policies also? The policies were put into the name of the bank so that the bank might collect the moneys under them, which moneys would then stand as security to the bank for the loan in place of the policies themselves, and in order that the bank might have recourse to those proceeds up to the amount they had advanced—namely, £25,000. That was not only his view but the view both parties appeared to have taken before any difficulty arose. The learned Judge gave judgment for the defendants.

Jeune) 1897.

Divorce—Alimony—Permanent maintenance—
Amount of allowance—Dum sola et casta clause.

This was an application on behalf of the petitioner, Mrs. Edith Kettlewell, to vary the report made by Mr. Registrar Pritchard upon her petition for maintenance.

Mr. Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Mr. Kisch were for the petitioner; Mr. Marshall Hall and Mr. R. E. Moore for the respondent, Charles Thomas Kettlewell.

Mr. BARGRAVE DEANE, Q.C., said the petitioner obtained a decree absolute for the dissolution of her marriage on May 24 last, and on November 17 the Registrar made his report upon the petition for maintenance. The husband's income had been agreed at £19,000 per annum, and the wife's at £1,400, the joint income being, therefore, £20,400. In the report (which was read) the Registrar concluded in the following words:—"It was contended on behalf of the respondent that whatever further maintenance be given to the wife should be limited dum sola et casta, which would seem to depend upon the conduct of the parties, as to which I have no information. It is submitted that a further sum of £1,600 a year be secured to the petitioner for her life and either dum casta et sola or otherwise as to the Court shall seem fit." He (the learned counsel) now submitted that the wife's total income should be made up to at least £5,000. At the time of the marriage £25,000 had been settled by the husband on his wife, and she had also received another sum of £25,000, but this had been expended on the joint expenses of the parties. She had no fortune at the time of her marriage, and, therefore, he did not ask for the third of her husband's large income, but he submitted that one-fourth would be reasonable, and not a paltry seventh as given by the Registrar.

The PRESIDENT.—Has not this question been recently discussed in the Court of Appeal in "Sykes v. Sykes" ? (13 The Times L.R., 579, and [1897], P. 306.) The Lords Justices there suggested that the test should be what would be considered a handsome jointure.

Mr. DEANE, Q.C.—The chief point of that case was as to the right to cross-examine the husband on his income. The Lords Justices' remarks as to fixing the amount of maintenance are mere obiter dicta. If a lady is the wife of a rich man, and is accustomed to enjoy yachting, shooting, &c., surely she is not to be placed in a worse position owing to the husband's cruelty and adultery. The practice of reducing the wife's income was first introduced in the case of "Cox v. Cox and Dyball," where the husband was a man who indulged in racing—a pursuit for which the wife did not care, and for that reason the "one-third" rule was not followed.

The PRESIDENT.—Surely, Mr. Deane, you do not suggest that a lady living alone in quasi widowhood can have need of a yacht, or a country house with shooting ?

Mr. DEANE, Q.C.—I do not agree as to the yacht—many well-known ladies are passionately fond of yachting. This is the case of an innocent wife deprived of her rights through the guilt of her husband.

The PRESIDENT.—I confess I can see no better test in these cases than that laid down by the Lords Justices Ludlow and Chitty in "Sykes v. Sykes." If you and I, Mr. Deane, were acting as convenancing counsel between the parties, would you not consider £3,000 a very handsome jointure ?

Mr. DEANE, Q.C.—That is treating the husband as if he were an innocent man. It is a slur upon a wife to be compelled to divorce her husband.

The PRESIDENT.—You forget that maintenance is not compensation but provision for the wife.

Mr. DEANE, Q.C., continuing, said that it would be a slur upon an innocent wife to insert a dum casta et sola clause.

Mr. KISCH, following, said that in "Sykes v. Sykes" the wife was allowed £3,000 pendente lite on an admitted income of £17,000. According to that method of calculation, therefore, in the present case the amount must be increased.

Mr. MARSHALL HALL, for the respondent, said that pendente lite the respondent had allowed his wife £2,000 without prejudice. He contended that the petitioner was one of those people who, while they could do without the necessities of life, could not do without its luxuries. Every farthing the petitioner now possessed had come from her husband's pocket. She was no doubt entitled to be kept in the position to which she was accustomed, but it was not immaterial to the case that she had been divorced by a Mr. Patterson before Mr. Kettlewell married her. The case was "Patterson v. Patterson and Grant."

Mr. DEANE, Q.C.—Mr. Kettlewell was then Mr. Grant !

The PRESIDENT.—On the dum sola et casta clause I think it is material.

Mr. HALL.—I submit that £3,000 a year should place this woman beyond the dreams of avarice. The learned counsel then cited "Wood v. Wood" ([1891], P., 272), and "Gladstone v. Gladstone" (1 P.D., 442). Under the circumstances of the petitioner's past, he submitted that the husband was entitled to a dum sola et casta clause being inserted in the deed.

Mr. DEANE, Q.C.—It is against public policy that restraint should be placed upon a woman remarrying.

Mr. HALL.—It might be a slur on a chaste woman to put in a dum casta clause, but not to put in a dum sola clause. In "Wood v. Wood" the Court of Appeal had held that when the amount of maintenance was small, and the wife had no means, a dum sola et casta clause should not be inserted in the deed. In that case the wife was also described as being a woman of spotless character.

Mr. BARGRAVE DEANE, Q.C., in reply, said that Mr. Kettlewell alone was to blame for the petitioner's past. He submitted that the sum of £1,600 should be increased to bring the wife's income up to, at least, £5,000, and that no dum sola et casta clause should be inserted in the deed.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that he had to determine, first, what amount should be secured by the respondent to the petitioner, and, secondly, whether the dum sola et casta clause should be inserted in the deed so securing that amount. After reviewing the facts of the case appearing on the report of the Registrar, the learned Judge said that it was incumbent upon him to remember that the £1,400 income belonging to the wife had come from her husband, and that on the marriage she had brought nothing into settlement. Although no doubt one-third of the joint income of husband and wife was usually the allowance made in permanent alimony, yet in the case of "Sykes v. Sykes" (he did not suggest that the facts in that case were similar to the one now before him), Lord Ludlow suggested that the way to look at the matter was to ask oneself the question what would be an adequate jointure to be allowed to the widow by her husband. He (the learned President) agreed that the allowance should be a liberal one.

*Reported by J. H. MURPHY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

and he gathered from what had been stated by counsel in Court that in this case the husband had lived in a luxurious way. The fact that he had done so was material in deciding what sum the wife ought to have to maintain the position of widow of her husband. In her early life, no doubt, she had not lived in any luxury, and, taking into consideration the fact that there were no children of the marriage, a fact which could be urged both for and against an increased allowance, he had in exercising his judgment come to the conclusion that £3,000 a year was enough for the petitioner, and that therefore the Registrar's report on that point should be confirmed. Turning to the question as to whether or not the clause dum sola et casta should be inserted in the deed, he desired to follow in the most ample way that he could the case of "Wood v. Wood" ([1891] P., 272). The circumstances which Lord Justice Lindley pointed out in that case as necessary to be taken into account were:—(1), the conduct of the parties; (2), their position in life, and their ages and respective means; (3), the amount of the provision actually made; (4), the existence or non-existence of children, and who was to have the care and custody of them; (5), any other circumstances which may be important in any particular case. In the present case the petitioner would have £1,400 in any event, and there were no children. He did not agree with Mr. Bargrave Deane's contention that the Court should close its eyes to the fact that the petitioner was a divorcée. He considered it material, as in the case of "Wood v. Wood" Lord Justice Lindley referred to the petitioner there as a woman of "spotless character," and said that it would be an insult to her to insert the dum sola et casta clause. The case of "Gladstone v. Gladstone" (1 P.D., 442) had been somewhat modified by "Wood v. Wood." On the whole, therefore, he considered that the dum sola should be inserted. When, however, it was once decided that dum sola should be inserted, a long step had been taken in determining whether the et casta should supplement it; for it would be most unjust to make the allowance cease on marriage, and not to cease if an illicit intercourse should commence. He, therefore, came to the conclusion that the dum sola et casta clause should be inserted in the deed.

THE GLENGYLE.*

Ship—Salvage—Award—Principles upon which the Court acts in determining amount.

This was a claim for salvage arising out of the collision between the steamships Coronet and Glengyle in the Straits of Gibraltar. The facts of the collision were reported in The Times of November 27. The facts of the salvage case sufficiently appear in the judgment delivered to-day.

Dr. Raikes and Mr. Dawson Miller appeared for the steamers Hermes and Newa; Mr. Dawson Miller also appeared for the tugs Hereules and Nellie; and Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES said,—This is a salvage case of unusual importance. On August 26 last the steamship Glengyle came into collision with the steamship Coronet in the Straits of Gibraltar, and sustained serious damage in the way of the engine-room and commenced to sink. Her passengers and crew got into boats or on board the Coronet, which was also seriously damaged. Fortunately for those interested in the Glengyle, her cargo, and freight, the Hermes and Newa were lying at Gibraltar with steam up, and these vessels at once proceeded to the Glengyle, and by their timely assistance she was ultimately salvaged. The Hermes is a screw steamer of 394 tons register, fitted with engines of 750-horse power indicated, with a pumping capacity of 2,750 tons per hour, and a crew of 23 hands. The Newa is a screw steamer of 459 tons register, fitted with engines working up to 750-horse power indicated, with a pumping capacity of 5,000 tons per hour, and a crew of 21 hands. Both these steamers are specially built for and solely employed in rendering salvage services, and are equipped with divers and diving apparatus, and powerful engines and pumps, and other salving appliances. The Hermes belongs to the Neptune Salvage Company (Limited), of Stockholm, and the Newa belongs to the Nordischer Bergungsverein of Hamburg. About 3 a.m. on the said August 26 in response to signals from the signal station at Gibraltar indicating that there was a vessel in distress to the westward, the Hermes and Newa at once proceeded to sea and found the Glengyle several miles away to the south-west with her engine-room full of water, her fires drowned out, large quantities of water in her holds, and no one on board of her. She was gradually settling down. The account of the manner in which she was safely brought into Gibraltar is fully set forth in the statement of claim, and, as the facts there alleged are admitted, with the exception of the suggestion that she had been abandoned, it is not necessary to refer to them in detail. It is sufficient to notice the following facts. The master of the Glengyle from a boat requested that his vessel should be towed to Gibraltar if she would keep afloat long enough. The Hermes and Newa made fast, the former ahead, and the latter lashed to the starboard side of the Glengyle. As it appeared improbable that the Glengyle could reach Gibraltar, it was arranged to steer for Getares Bay, the nearest shore with a sandy bottom where the Glengyle could be beached. The sheering of the Glengyle caused the Hermes to break adrift twice, and in order that no time should be lost and as one salving steamer could not save the Glengyle, the Hermes was made fast along the port side. The Glengyle was beached in Getares Bay at 6 a.m. on the 26th, her engine-room and stoke-hole being then full of water and Nos. 3 and 4 holds having 15ft. of water in them. After she was beached the holes in her side were patched by divers, and the pumping gear of the salving steamers was set to work, and at night the Glengyle was floated, and on the 27th was taken to Gibraltar Bay, where further work was done by the divers to the damaged places and the pumping was continued till the 28th, when the Glengyle was able to keep the water down with her donkey pump. All the allegations in the statement of claim are admitted except that alleging abandonment, and upon that point, from what took place before me at the hearing, I conclude that although the master, crew, and passengers were compelled to leave the ship for their safety, it was not intended to abandon her if assistance could be obtained. In salvage cases it is not uncommon for the defendants to admit the facts alleged by the plaintiffs but not the inferences sought to be drawn therefrom. In this case facts and inferences are both admitted, and it is not suggested that the plaintiffs' statements are exaggerated. The value of the Glengyle, her cargo, and freight, as salvaged, has been agreed at £76,596. The Court is now asked by the owners, masters, and crews of the Hermes and Newa to award to them salvage remuneration for the services they have rendered. It will be seen from the admissions made in this case that it presents to the admissions made most of the elements which affect the judgment of the Court in estimating the amount of a salvage award. The Glengyle, her cargo, and freight were rescued from certain total loss, and were of the very large value above stated. It was only owing to the prompt and skilful assistance of the Hermes and Newa that the Glengyle was or could have been saved. There were no other vessels which could have rendered this assistance, and I may add that if the Hermes and Newa had not had steam up and been thus enabled to proceed to the Glengyle at once, the Elder Brethren consider she would in all probability have sunk before they reached her. The values of the Hermes and Newa were large—viz., £22,000 and £20,000 respectively, and these vessels and the lives of those on board were exposed to grave danger. The salvors, therefore, might have sustained serious loss, and if they had not succeeded in saving the Glengyle they would have been without any right to compensation. The time occupied in rendering the services was only about three days, but the skill displayed by the salvors was high and the labour expended obviously severe. There is the further important element in this case—that the Hermes and the Newa have been built and are maintained solely for the purpose of rendering salvage services. The two foreign companies above mentioned have had the enterprise to establish these two steamers at Gibraltar and to keep them ready to render salvage services at a moment's notice. An immense traffic, principally British, I believe, passes through the Straits of Gibraltar, and the general interests of navigation and commerce are protected by provision being made for the rendering of prompt and efficient assistance to lives and property in danger in that locality and the adjoining seas. Lord Stowell said in the "William Bakford" (3 C. Rob., at p. 356):—"The principles upon which the Court of Admiralty proceeds lead to a liberal remuneration in salvage cases; for they look not merely to the exact quantum of service performed in the service itself but to the general interests of the navigation and commerce of the country which are greatly protected by exertions of this nature." These principles have been emphasized in many cases by different Judges of the Admiralty Court. The remarks of Sir Charles Butt in the "Envoy" (33 Shipping Gazette Weekly Summary, p. 134), in a case of salvage services rendered by steam tugs, are very appropriate to the present case. He said:—"To my mind one of the most important functions of this Court is to encourage the maintenance of powerful and efficient steam tugs around our coasts to be in constant readiness to assist vessels in distress. Not only in the course of the year is a large amount of property saved by these means, but a considerable sacrifice of life is prevented. Therefore, the principle we go upon is not that of a quantum meruit but of giving such an award as will encourage people to keep vessels of adequate size and dimensions ready to go out." The maintenance and establishment of salvage steamers such as the Hermes and the Newa is for the general benefit of owners and underwriters and others interested in sea-going vessels and their cargoes and the crews and passengers of such vessels, and, guided by the principles above stated, the Admiralty Court will be liberal in its awards in respect of services rendered by salvage steamers, even though the awards may fall somewhat heavily on individual owners. The owners of salvage steamers invest a large amount of capital in them, and maintain them and their crews, divers, and appliances at great expense, and they have no remuneration to look forward to except that which may be earned by occasional salvage services. It remains for me to notice the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel, that his case for a liberal award was better even than those of salvors of derelicts, who, although there is no rule as to the proportion to be awarded in such cases, have been awarded a moiety of the value of the salvaged property in some instances and frequently as much as one-third, because in the present case the loss of the Glengyle was certain, unless the plaintiffs had assisted her, whereas in most of the cases of derelicts the vessels, though abandoned, were still floating, and might continue to float, and the danger to them was only of probable loss, varying in degree of probability, but not of certain loss. Probable loss, no doubt, represents a degree of danger to property less than certain loss, but the aforesaid argument did not sufficiently take account of the fact that far less proportions than those above mentioned have been awarded in cases of derelict where the value of the property salvaged was large. An illustration of this is the case of the "Amerique" (L.R., 6 P.C., 463). The reason is that a small proportion of a large value may adequately remunerate salvors, whereas it may require a much larger proportion of a small value to do so. The value salvaged is an element—an important element—in considering the amount to be awarded, but the Court must not be induced by it to award a sum which is out of proportion to the services of the salvors. Having carefully considered the circumstances of this case and the elements found to exist in it, and especially that the owners or underwriters of this very valuable property have been protected against the certain loss of their interests by services rendered at the risk of the lives and property of salvors in the peculiar position of the plaintiffs, I have come to the conclusion, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House who have sat with me, that a proper remuneration to award to the plaintiffs, the owners, the masters, and crews of the Hermes and Newa is the sum of £19,000, and I pronounce accordingly. I was asked to apportion the sum which I should award to the Hermes and Newa. The Court sees no reason for preferring the one to the other, and therefore I apportion the said sum of £19,000 in equal moieties.

As to the claim of the tugs Hercules and Nellie his Lordship awarded a sum of £500.

KING'S NORTON METAL COMPANY (LIMITED) v. EDWARDS, MERRETT, AND COMPANY (LIMITED)—SAME v. ROBERTS AND ANOTHER.*

Sale of Goods—Contract—Fraud—Goods obtained by fraud—Vesting of property.

A person who obtains goods under a contract of sale by false pretences can, until the contract is disaffirmed, give a good title to the goods to a bona-fide purchaser for value.

This was an application by the plaintiffs in both these actions for a new trial. The actions were tried before Mr. Justice Cave and a special jury at Birmingham. The facts were similar in each action, and it is only necessary to state them in one. The question was, which of two innocent parties should suffer on account of the fraud of a third person. The action was brought to recover damages for the conversion of one ton of brass rivet wire. The plaintiffs were metal manufacturers at King's Norton, Worcestershire, and the defendants, in the first action, were metal merchants at Birmingham, and the defendants in the second action were pin manufacturers at Leeds. It appeared that in 1896 the plaintiffs received a letter purporting to come from Hallam and Co., Soho Hackle Pin and Wire Works, Sheffield, at the head of which was a representation of a large factory with a number of chimneys, and in one corner was a printed statement that Hallam and Co. had depôts and agencies at Belfast, Lille, and Ghent. The letter contained a request by Hallam and Co. for a quotation of prices for brass rivet wire. In reply, the plaintiffs quoted prices, and Hallam and Co. then by letter ordered some goods, which were sent off to them. These goods were never paid for. It turned out that a man named Wallis had adopted the name of Hallam and Co., and fraudulently obtained goods by the above means, and that Wallis sold the goods to the defendants, who bought them bona fide, and with no notice of any defect of title in Wallis. It appeared that the plaintiffs had been paid for some goods previously ordered by Hallam and Co., by a cheque drawn by "Hallam and Co." The plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages for the conversion of these goods. At the trial, the learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiffs upon the ground that the property in the goods had passed to Wallis, who sold them to the defendants before the plaintiffs had disaffirmed the contract.

Mr. JELF, Q.C., and Mr. H. STUBBINS (Mr. CRACROFT with them), for the plaintiffs, contended that the case ought to have been left to the jury, the question for them being whether the plaintiffs intended to make any contract with Wallis, and intended to pass the property in the goods to him. The jury ought to have been asked whether Wallis was Hallam and Co. The plaintiffs intended to contract with Hallam and Co., who were represented to be a firm with a world-wide trade, but who, in reality, were non-existent, and they never intended to deal with Wallis at all, of whom they had never heard, and never intended to pass the property to him. It was like the cases of "Cundy v. Lindsay" (3 App. Cas., 459), "Higgins v. Burton" (26 L.J.Ex., 342), "Hardman v. Booth" (1 H. and C., 803). It was not like the case of an individual carrying on business under a trade name, who intended to make a contract for the purchase of the goods, because here Wallis never had any intention of entering into contracts, but only wished to get hold of these goods by a trick. It was really larceny by a trick, part of the trick being that the first small parcel of goods should be paid for, and the property never passed. They also referred to "Rex v. Barnard" (7 C. and P., 784), "Reg. v. Middleton" (L.R., 2 C.C., 38), "Reg. v. Buckmaster" (20 Q.B.D., 182), "Reg. v. Russett" ([1892], 2 Q.B., 312), "Henderson v. Williams" ([1895], 1 Q.B., at p. 531).

Mr. HUGO YOUNG and Mr. M'CARDIE, for the defendants, contended that upon the evidence it was clear that Wallis was for some time carrying on business in Sheffield as Hallam and Co., and the goods in question were delivered to Wallis as Hallam and Co. In "Cundy v. Lindsay," where the House of Lords held that there was no contract, there were two persons besides the person defrauded, and the latter intended to sell his goods to one and not to the other. That case was followed in "Higgins v. Burton" and "Hardman v. Booth." In the present case there was only one person, and the contract was made and intended to be made with him, and the property passed to him. They also referred to "Clough v. London and North Western Railway Company" (7 Ex., 26)

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the case was a plain one. The question was whether the plaintiffs, who had been cheated out of their goods by a rogue called Wallis, or the defendants were to bear the loss. The law seemed to him to be well settled. If a person, induced by false pretences, contracted with a rogue to sell goods to him and the goods were delivered the rogue could until the contract was disaffirmed give a good title to the goods to a bona fide purchaser for value. The facts here were that Wallis, for the purpose of cheating, set up in business as Hallam and Co., and got note-paper prepared for the purpose, and wrote to the plaintiffs representing that he was carrying on business as Hallam and Co. He got the goods in question and sold them to the defendants, who bought them bona fide for value. The question was, With whom, upon this evidence, which was all one way, did the plaintiffs contract to sell the goods? Clearly with the writer of the letters. If it could have been shown that there was a separate entity called Hallam and Co. and another entity called Wallis then the case might have come within the decision in "Cundy v. Lindsay." In his opinion there was a contract by the plaintiffs with the person who wrote the letters, by which the property passed to him. There was only one entity, trading it might be under an alias, and there was a contract by which the property passed to him. Mr. Justice Cave said that this was nothing more than a long firm fraud. Did any one ever hear of an attempt being made by a person who had delivered his goods to a long firm to get his goods back on the ground that he had made no contract with the long firm? The indictment against a long firm was always for obtaining the goods by false pretences, which presupposed the passing of the property. For these reasons there was no question to go to the jury, and the non-suit was right.

DRISCOLL V. POPLAR BOARD OF WORKS.*

Negligence—Subsidence of road—Gas explosion—Heavy steam roller—Liability for state of road.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a County Court Judge in favour of the plaintiff who had been injured by an explosion of gas last year. The facts were these. A steam roller weighing from 13 to 15 tons belonging to the Poplar Board of Works, passing along Wade's-place, broke a gas main laid under the road. The gas escaped into the drains, and a sanitary inspector who was testing some drains in a house by means of a rocket fired the gas, which exploded and injured the female plaintiff, who was in the street. The husband and wife brought an action in the County Court, claiming alternatively against the gas company and the board of works. However, on a summons being taken out by both defendants, the plaintiffs had to elect which they would proceed against, and they elected to continue against the board of works. The result of the action was that the County Court Judge found for the plaintiffs. It was stated by one witness, though it did not appear in the Judge's notes, that in his opinion there must have been a subsidence of soil underneath the gas pipe, otherwise it could not have broken.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Abinger appeared for the appellants, the Poplar Board of Works; Mr. W. Thompson for the plaintiffs.

MR. LAWSON WALTON argued that the board of works were not liable. It was not their duty to know that a subsidence had taken place. They might assume that the gas company had taken all necessary precautions and made all necessary examinations. He cited "The Gas Light and Coke Company v. St. Mary Abbot's" (15 Q.B.D., 1). The roller used would not have been too heavy if the subsoil had not been moved. The gas company must lay their mains in such a way that they could stand ordinary steam rollers.

The COURT upheld the decision of the County Court Judge in favour of the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said the plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for a serious injury occasioned by reason of a gas explosion alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant board. The plaintiffs lived in Wade's-place, a road repaired as to the roadway itself by the defendants. It was said that in repairing the road they used a very heavy steam roller and caused one of the mains of gas to break, with the result that there was an escape of gas which ultimately culminated in the explosion which caused the injury. It was said that the defendants were not responsible even if the roller did break the pipe, on the ground that they could not be responsible unless some negligence was shown. The surveyor spoke as to the condition of the road, and suggested that there might have been a subsidence of the soil beneath the gas main. The counsel who was present at the trial had told this to the Court, and he had pressed the point before the County Court Judge. That made it clear that the attention of the County Court Judge had been directed towards that question. The facts were these:—The gas main had been properly laid, and had been in position 40 years without damage. The defendants repaired the road. They did not seem to have inquired as to the depth at which the gas pipes were laid or the condition of the road. The steam roller used by the defendants weighed from 13 to 15 tons, and it was at or very near the maximum statutory weight allowed to be used. The County Court Judge had found that the road was perfectly safe for ordinary traffic, and that a roller of less weight might have gone over the road and the gas main. He also found negligence on the part of the defendants, and that the fracture was caused by their steam roller. The County Court Judge had all the matters before him. The sole question for the Court was whether there was any evidence on which he could come to the conclusion he had arrived at. It could not be said there was no evidence. All the real elements of the case were before the County Court Judge, and his decision must be upheld.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. He thought there was ample evidence on which the County Court Judge might find as he had done. Even assuming for the purposes of this case that it was the duty of the gas company to ascertain and to replace any subsidence of soil under the mains—though as to that the learned Judge would express no opinion—the County Court Judge had evidence on which he could find that the use of a heavy roller on roads where there were gas mains which had not been touched for 40 years was negligence. The appeal must be dismissed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (The Right Hon. the President, Sir } 1897.
Francis Jeune.) Dec. 7.

CADELL AND ANOTHER V. WILCOCKS AND OTHERS.*

Probate—Revocation of will—Partial revocation—Exercise of limited power of appointment—Subsequent wills partially inconsistent—Execution of power not revoked.

This case was argued before the Court on December 1 and 2, and the President delivered judgment.

The plaintiffs, as executors of Mrs. Lucy Biddulph, of Tiverton, claimed probate of three testamentary documents, the first of which had been made by the deceased in exercise of certain powers of appointment contained in the will of her father, Mr. Robert Bickerstaffe, dated December 8, 1838. The three testamentary documents above referred to were dated April 26, 1890, July 5, 1894, and September 5, 1895. The deceased died on August 29, 1896. The defendant, Lucy Biddulph Colclough, the granddaughter of the deceased, set up in her defence through her guardian ad litem, she being a minor, that the true last will of the testatrix was the will of September 5, 1895, and alleged that the will of July 5, 1894, revoked the will of April 26, 1890, and was in turn itself revoked by the will of September 5, 1895. The defendants—Mrs. Anne Adela Waller Wilcocks, Mr. Middleton Biddulph, and Mr. Assheton Biddulph—alleged that these three testamentary documents were not properly executed in accordance with the provisions of 1 Vict., c. 26., and alternatively adopted the defence of the other defendant.

Mr. BARGRAVE DEANE, Q.C., and Mr. Barnard appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., and Mr. Priestley appeared for the defendant, Miss Lucy Biddulph Colclough; and Mr. Lambert Bond for Mrs. Anne Adela Waller Wilcocks, Mr. Middleton Biddulph, and Mr. Assheton Biddulph.

MR. BARGRAVE DEANE, Q.C., after opening these facts, said that by the will of April 26, 1890, the testatrix had bequeathed to her daughter Gertrude the sum of £4,000 absolutely for her sole use and benefit, being the sum left to her (the testatrix) by the will of her father, Robert Bickerstaffe. After leaving a legacy to her steward, she provided that the residue should be divided among her children, the defendants. In the will of July 5, 1894, the following words appeared:—"I give to my daughter Gertrude Louisa, now the wife of Nevill Pottow Cadell, the sum of £4,000." By the will of September 5, 1895, she disposed of all her real, freehold, and personal property to Gertrude Louisa Cadell, and, in the event of her predeceasing the testatrix, it was provided that the property should go to Mr. Nevill Cadell. In the first will, therefore, it was clear that a direct reference was made to the fund from which the £4,000 bequeathed should be derived. The testatrix was there obviously executing her power of appointment given her under the will of her father, but neither in the second will nor in the third will was there any reference to this power of appointment whatsoever. Again, the second will did not expressly revoke the first will, nor the third the second. His contention, therefore, was that these two latter wills were not valid exercises of the powers of appointment, and that the fact of executing two later wills did not amount to the revocation of the execution of the power which she had undoubtedly exercised in the first will. The question, therefore, that the Court was asked to determine was what in these circumstances amounted to a revocation of the execution of this power of appointment. It was necessary to have the question decided whether the last will revoked the earlier wills, as if the will of 1890 was revoked then the power of appointment under her father's will had not been exercised, and the £4,000 would go to the persons entitled under the father's will in default of appointment. The law required that, where a person had a power of appointment relating to a specific fund, a specific revocation of the execution of that power should be made. No general revocation was sufficient. Here there was no clause of revocation in either the second or the third will, and as the wills were not inconsistent in themselves it was submitted that all three should be admitted to probate. The learned counsel, in the course of an elaborate argument, said that the judgment of Sir James Wilde in the case of "Lemage v. Goodban and Others," reported in L.R., 1 P. and D., 57, expressed very plainly the argument he wished to address to the Court. It was there held that if a subsequent testamentary paper is only partly inconsistent with one of an earlier date, the latter instrument is only revoked as to those parts where it is inconsistent, and both of the papers are entitled to probate. Where there are two testamentary papers, each professing in form to be the last will of the deceased, the Court in determining whether one or both are entitled to probate must be guided by the consideration, not whether the testator intended them both together to form his will, but what disposition of his property he designed to revoke or retain. In deciding upon the effect of a subsequent will on a former disposition this Court has to exercise the functions of a Court of construction. The principle applicable is well expressed in Mr. Justice Williams's book on Executors. He says the mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper does not work a total revocation of a prior one, unless the latter expressly or in effect revoke the former, or the two be incapable of standing together; for though it be a maxim, as Swinburne says, that no man can die with two testaments, yet any number of instruments, whatever be their relative date, or in whatever form they may be (so as they be all clearly testamentary), may be admitted to probate, as together containing the last will of the deceased. And if a subsequent testamentary paper be partly inconsistent with one of an earlier date, then such latter instrument will revoke the former, as to those parts only, where they are inconsistent. The will of a man is the aggregate of his testamentary intentions so far as they are manifested in writing duly executed according to statute. And, as a will if contained in one document may be of several sheets, so it may consist of several independent papers each so executed. This Court has been in the habit of admitting to probate such and as many papers (all properly executed) as are necessary to effect the testator's full wishes and of solving the question of revocation by considering not what papers have been apparently superseded by the act of executing others, but what dispositions it can be collected from the language of all the papers that the testator designed to revoke or to retain. Again, in the eighth edition of Williams on Executors, at page 179, these words appear:—"In 'Richardson v. Barry,' 3 Hagg, 249 (a case before the new Statute of Wills), the deceased had power under a trust deed to dispose of certain effects by a will attested by two witnesses. And it was held that a will executed accordingly was revoked by a subsequent will directly referring to the trust deed and containing an express revocatory clause duly executed, but attested by one witness only." "In the goods of Merritt" (1 S. and T., 112), "E.H., a married woman, in 1846 duly made a will in execution of a general power of appointment, disposing of certain stock and appointing executors thereof. In 1855 she made another will without the consent of her husband, disposing of certain other property under her marriage settlement, and of other articles. It did not refer to the general power under which the will of 1846 was made, nor to the stock thereby appointed; but it contained a general revocatory clause and named a different executor. It was held that the 27th section of the Wills Act was intended to enlarge the dispositive power of testators, and has no bearing on questions of revocation, that the revocatory clause in the will of 1855 being in general terms and containing no reference to the general power in execution of which the will of 1846 was made, or to the property thereby appointed, did not operate to revoke that will."

Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., said that he appeared in the interest of the infant, Miss Lucy Biddulph Coldclough, the grand-daughter of the testatrix. The argument, which he hoped to be able to sustain by authorities, shortly came to this. If a woman has power to appoint with reference to a special fund that appointment must be a special appointment. Secondly, if a special appointment was made it was necessary that it should be revoked by special revocation. With regard to the cases cited by the other side, what he had to say about them was this, that they did not appear to coincide with the view that the Court of Appeal took upon the point. If the will of 1890 had simply left the sum of £4,000 to the daughter without reference to the power of appointment, then the will of 1894 which gave a legacy of £4,000 would have revoked the will of 1890, no matter whether the £4,000 was left as a legacy or under the power of appointment.

The PRESIDENT.—Do you say that the second will is an execution of the power?

Mr. Inderwick, Q.C.—No. In the case of "Jones v. Tucker" (2 Mer., 533), a case of Sir William Grant's, the words in the will there, "I will and bequeath the sum of £100, &c.," were held not to be an execution of the appointment. In the will of 1895 the residue was to go solely to the testatrix's child Gertrude, who was the mother of the infant defendant whom he (the learned counsel) was representing, but if the Court held that the execution of the power of appointment had been revoked and admitted the three documents to probate she would only take half the residue. There were several cases to show that a gift of the residue does not execute a power of appointment. This was fully borne out by Lord Thurlow's judgment in the case of "Andrews v. Emmot" (2 Brown, 297). Lord Eldon in 1802 approved of this in the case of "Narrock v. Horton" (7 Ves., 390). In the case of "Sotharan v. Dening" (L.R., 20 Ch. D., 99), which was taken up to the Court of Appeal, there was a general clause in the will revoking all former wills, and it was held to revoke a prior testamentary appointment. In that case also there were three wills as in the present case. In the case of "In re Kingdon, Wilkins v. Pryer" (L.R., 32 Ch. D., 604), a testamentary appointment was revoked by a clause of revocation and by the gift of the residue. And again in "Foulkes v. Williams" (L.R., 42 Ch. D., 98), where the will contained no reference to the special power, or to the property comprised therein, the Court of Appeal held that the general gift did not execute a special power of appointment. The fallacy of the argument urged by the other side lay in assuming that the power of appointment by deed was the same as a power of appointment by will. It was not the same thing, but a totally different thing altogether. If the appointment was by deed and was revocable it could be revoked by deed, but if the appointment was made by will the appointor could revoke it as often as he liked. The case of "In the goods of Merritt" showed clearly that even if a will is destroyed it does not thereby necessarily destroy the power of appointment. This view was also borne out by Sir Creswell Creswell in the case of "In the goods of Hannah Joys" (4 S. and T., 214).

Mr. BARGEAVE DEANE, Q.C., in reply, argued that in the case now before the consideration of the Court there was no revocatory clause in the wills, whereas in the cases cited by his friend Mr. Inderwick there were. Further, it was enacted by section 27 of the Wills Act (1 Vict., c. 26) that a general gift shall include estates over which the testator has a general power of appointment, and section 18 of the same Act expressly states that wills shall be revoked by marriage, except wills made in exercise of a power of appointment. In "Hughes v. Turner" (4 Hagg., Ecc., 52) the residuary clause in the latter will in that case, it would seem, was not a due execution of the power, and the revocatory clause there would not have revoked the prior will unless the intention had been clear.

The PRESIDENT, in delivering a considered judgment, said,—The question in this case is, Which of the three wills, made respectively on April 26, 1890, July 5, 1894, and September 5, 1895, by the testatrix, Mrs. Lucy Biddulph, should be admitted to probate? The father of the testatrix, Robert Bickerstaffe, left £16,000 among his four daughters in equal shares for life, with power of appointment to each of them by will amongst her children, and in default of appointment to her children equally. At the time of the will of 1890 the testatrix had two daughters, Anne, then married, and Gertrude, then single, and three sons, Middleton, Assheton, and Franc. By the will of 1890 the testatrix, after revoking all previous wills, gave her daughter Gertrude the sum of £4,000 absolutely for her sole use and benefit, describing it as "being the sum left to me by the will of my father the late Robert Bickerstaffe." She then bequeathed £50 to her steward Finton M'Donald and the residue of her property to her five children equally, and appointed her sons Middleton and Assheton executors. It was agreed in argument before me that this was a good execution by the testatrix of the limited power of appointment vested in her by the will of her father. Between the wills of 1890 and 1894 the daughter Gertrude married Mr. Nevill Cadell and I understand that the sons Middleton and Assheton received a benefit under the will of an uncle, the testatrix's brother. By her will of 1894 the testatrix bequeathed to her daughter Gertrude "the sum of £4,000 for her own absolute use and benefit and to dispose of as she may think fit." She then gave £50 to her steward Finton M'Donald and the residue of her property to her children Franc and Gertrude equally, and appointed Franc, Gertrude, and the said Nevill Cadell executors. Between the wills of 1894 and 1895 Franc, the son of the testatrix, and also the steward died. A letter of the testatrix containing her instructions for the will of 1895 was produced to me, but I do not think it material. By the will of 1895 the testatrix made a bequest to her daughter Gertrude in these terms—"All the property, real, freehold, or personal, wheresoever situate of which I may die seized or possessed for her own absolute use and benefit and to dispose of as she may think fit"; and gave the same in case of her daughter predeceasing her to her daughter's husband, Nevill Cadell, and appointed her daughter and Mr. Cadell executrix and executor. Neither the will of 1894 nor the will of 1895 contained any words of revocation; and it was admitted, for the purposes of the argument before me, that neither the terms of the will of 1894 nor those of the will of 1895 were sufficient to effect a valid execution of the limited power of appointment vested in the testatrix. I think that this case is governed by the familiar principle of law stated in "Williams on Executors" (9th ed., p. 138), and approved by Lord Penzance in "Lemage v. Goodban" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 87), that the mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper does not work a total revocation of the prior one unless the latter expressly or in effect revoked the former, or the two be incapable of standing together; and if a subsequent testamentary paper, whether will or codicil, be partially inconsistent with one of earlier date, then such latter instrument will revoke the former as to those parts only where they are inconsistent. In this case there was clearly no express revocation, in whole or in part, of the will of 1890 by either the will of 1894 or the will of 1895. I assent to Mr. Inderwick's contention that had there been a general clause of revocation in either the will of 1894 or that of 1895 it would have revoked the whole will of 1890, including the execution of the power contained in it. The opinion, indeed, of the delegates in the case of "Hughes v. Turner" (4 Hagg., Ecc., 50), if correctly reported, would appear to be to the effect that a clause of revocation per se does not revoke the portion of an earlier will which has executed a power; and "In the Goods of Elizabeth Merritt" (1 S. and T., 112) and "In the Goods of Hannah Joys" (4 S. and T., 214) Sir Creswell Creswell expressed a similar opinion. It might be considered doubtful whether the case of "Sotheran v. Denning" (L.R., 20 Ch.D., 99) in the Court of Appeal overruled those authorities because weight was given to the consideration which arose in that case that by virtue of the 27th section of the Wills Act a general bequest operated on the subject matter of the power of appointment, and so strengthened the evidence in favour of an intention to revoke its previous execution. But in "In re Kingston" (L.R., 32 Ch.D., 604) the question of revocation by a general revocatory clause arose simpliciter, there being no subsequent provision relating to the subject matter of the power in question, and Mr. Justice Kay, acting on the authority of "Sotheran v. Denning," held that a will executing a power was revoked in toto by general words of revocation in a subsequent will. The effect of Mr. Justice Kay's decision is, I venture to think, that, on this point of law, common sense at last prevailed. I cannot understand why express words revoking all previous wills should be supposed to spare an execution of a power contained in one or more of them from the fate inflicted on all the rest of their contents. But in the present instance there are no express words to revoke the will of 1890. Next, is there anything in the wills of 1894 or 1895 inconsistent with the execution of the power in the will of 1890, or, in other words, is there anything that by implication effects a revocation of that execution? It is not necessary to consider whether if the power of appointment in this case had been general, and not as it was, limited, the general bequest in the wills of 1894 and 1895 would have been not only by virtue of the 27th section of the Wills Act effectual to execute the power, but also sufficient to revoke a previous execution of it. It is, I think, clear that these general words of bequest, which do not execute the limited power, as the 27th section of the Wills Act has no application, cannot revoke or affect its previous execution. The wills of 1890 and 1895 can, therefore, stand together, and, subject to proof in common form, there should be probate of both of them. The will of 1894 I regard as revoked by that of 1895, as both wills profess to deal with the whole of the testatrix's own property.

On the application of Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., and Mr. Bond, the PRESIDENT directed that defendants' costs should come out of the appointed fund.

ST. MARK'S, MARYLEBONE—FULLER (CLERK) AND JOHNSTON V. BISHOP AND OTHERS.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Parish church—Removal ordered of ritualistic alterations erected without faculty—Confirmatory faculty of others—Platform of Holy Table.

In this suit the CHANCELLOR now gave judgment. He said on June 5 last Mr. Thomas Bishop, the people's churchwarden of St. Mark's, Marylebone, and other parishioners, filed a petition alleging that the Rev. Morris Fuller, B.D., the vicar, had made the following alterations in the church without a faculty—viz., the taking down and removal of the Communion rails from the chancel, the erection of a side chapel with a re-table (the same in defiance of a warning sent to him by the Archdeacon of Middlesex), the erection of "Stations of the Cross," and using the same, covering portions of the east chancel walls with curtains so as to hide the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, and the Lord's Prayer engraved thereon; the removal of two gas standards from the chancel; permanently covering the stained glass window at the east end of the chancel and a side window with outside blinds, thereby obstructing the lights in the church; placing a large crucifix over the pulpit and, in opposition to a resolution of the vestry, removing the Holy Table belonging to the church and erecting another in its place, with a reredos, in the centre of which, on a box, was placed a cold brass crucifix. They prayed the Court to decree a faculty requiring the vicar to restore the church to its former state, and to condemn him in the expenses and costs incidental to the faculty. Before a citation at the suit of the petitioners had issued the vicar and his churchwardens filed a counter-petition praying the Court to decree a faculty confirmatory of those alterations, and for convenience the suits were consolidated. The case was heard on August 20 and 23, when he (the Chancellor) reserved judgment until he should have had an opportunity of inspecting the church, which he had since had. At the hearing Mr. Shearman-Turner appeared as counsel for the vicar, and Mr. Bishop conducted the case of the parishioners in person. The district was formerly included in the parishes of St. Mary, Bryanston-square, and St. Luke's, Nutford-place. Twenty-seven years ago, at the instance of Dr. Fremantle, now Dean of Ripon, who was then rector of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, it was by an Order of Council separated from these parishes and constituted a separate parish for ecclesiastical purposes, having a new church and parsonage erected for the purpose, with an endowment of £200 a year assigned to the vicar by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The population of the parish, which consisted exclusively of small tradesmen, artisans and working men, and the inmates of a Church of England Servants' Home and of a Christian Union almshouse, amounted to 4,500, and the church had accommodation for between 500 and 600 persons. Mr. Bellewes was the first incumbent of the parish, and he remained so for 23 years. During his incumbency the services were non-ritualistic, and during the greater part of his time the attendance at the morning services averaged from 250 to 300, mostly parishioners, and the church at the Sunday evening services, when there was a curate who was popular as a preacher, was nearly full. In the summer of 1893 Mr. Bellewes effected an exchange of his living with Mr.

Fuller. During the first few months of his incumbency Mr. Fuller made no changes in the service and gave general satisfaction to the parishioners, and the congregation was increasing Sunday after Sunday up to Christmas, 1893, when he introduced a new ritual, and had a procession during which incense was burned and the Holy Table was censured. Many of the parishioners then left off attending the church, and the attendance of the parishioners gradually fell off until the congregation, which now averaged from 200 to 250, with four or five exceptions, was composed of non-parishioners. The reasons assigned to Mr. Bishop by the parishioners for having ceased to attend their parish church were the introduction of the new ritual and of the ornaments objected to in the present suit. The introduction of the Stations of the Cross and of five crucifixes into the church were the additions which had given the greatest offence to the parishioners. The question of the legality of introducing Stations of the Cross into an English church came under the consideration of Lord Penzance in the Court of Arches in "Clifton v. Ridsdale" (L.R., 1 Prob. Div., 359). In that case his Lordship made an order (from which there was no appeal) for their removal on two grounds—first, that they had been set up in St. Peter's Church, Folkestone, without a faculty; and, secondly, that it had been clearly established by two authoritative devotional books of the Roman Catholic Church that these representations were to the present day authorized objects of adoration in that Church, and yet Mr. Ridsdale had put them up in a church of the Church of England and asked the Court to say that they were architectural decorations only and of a lawful character. His Lordship added:—"I think they are neither. Some of them, if they stood alone, may be unobjectionable in themselves, but the entire set of 14, viewed as a whole and in relation to their well-known history, must be regarded, I think, as likely (if not intended) to be used for the purposes for which they always have been used, and not for the mere purpose of decorating the church." In the case before the Court it was suggested for the vicar that they were placed against the north and south walls of the church merely for decorative purposes. But it was established in evidence that they were used on special services on Wednesday evenings in Lent for superstitious purposes. Mr. Searfe, who had attended the church for 27 years, in his evidence said:—"I have witnessed the services at the Stations of the Cross. On last Ash Wednesday evening I was present at this service. On entering the church a book was handed to me and to the majority of the congregation containing the whole service of the Stations of the Cross, the same as the one put in evidence in Court. A procession was formed by an acolyte bearing the crucifix, and two acolytes with lighted candles, and eight of the choir-boys holding this book, and several little girls, and three grown-up persons. The two boys held, as they went round to the stations, the candles one on each side of each picture, all the rest kneeling down before it, and by their attitude they appeared to me to be in superstitious adoration of the picture. After saying a few prayers before each picture and singing a few lines they proceeded to another picture and did the same thing. The curate (Mr. H. Ley) led them. There were from 20 to 30 persons there, besides those who formed the procession. I heard the prayer to the Virgin Mary read by the curate before the station containing a representation of the Virgin Mary. It is as follows:—
'O Mary, Blessed Mother of my God, thou bearest in thine arms thine only Son now dead, who often rested His Head asleep on thy breast. Pray for us that as thou holdest Him lifeless in death He may bear us up in the hour of our death in His everlasting arms.' I also heard the boys give the response, 'Hail, Mary,' after the reading of the prayer from the book (third edition), which is entitled, 'Catholic Prayers for Church of England People,' and is bound up with the Prayer-book. In the preface to the second edition the compiler says:—'In this there are many additions most of which have been asked for or suggested to him. They are nearly all in the Catholic direction and from Catholic books. There is in our midst such a plethora of Protestant piety that we felt enlargement in this little book must be on these lines. It is not for a moment maintained that all the prayers are in accordance with the Book of Common Prayer; by the very terms of their issue they are an addition to it.' In his preface to the third edition he says:—'This edition has resulted in several little alterations, but the main matter is the same as before, the principal additions being the vespers for the dead and of our Blessed Lady and the Prayer of the Pope for the unity of Christendom.' " Mr. Scarfe's evidence of these Stations of the Cross having been used superstitiously was confirmed by that of Mr. Bishop. In the case of St. Peter's, Folkestone, there was no evidence of the Stations of the Cross placed in that church ever having been so used, but Lord Penzance nevertheless ordered their removal on the ground that if they were not intended they were likely to be so used. In the present case, as there was clear evidence of their having been so used, it was imperative on the Court to make an order for their removal. As to the crucifixes, on inspecting the church he observed that four had been placed there—one on a box on the centre of the chancel reredos, another on the wall above and immediately behind the pulpit, another on the north wall of the church, and a fourth on the reredos in the side chapel. There was no judicial decision binding on the Court to the effect that a crucifix might be set up or placed in a church as a lawful church ornament. The figure of Our Saviour on the Cross as forming the central figure of the historical representation of the momentous scene of the crucifixion of Our Lord was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Exeter reredos case to be lawful as a church decoration. The judgment in the case of "Westerton v. Liddell" stated:—"Upon the whole, their Lordships, after the most anxious consideration, have come to the conclusion that crosses as distinguished from crucifixes have been in use as ornaments of churches from the earliest periods of Christianity; that when used as mere emblems of the Christian faith, and not as objects of superstitious reverence, they may still lawfully be erected as architectural decorations of churches; that the wooden cross erected on the chancel screen of St. Barnabas is to be considered as a mere architectural ornament, and that, as to this article, they must advise her Majesty to reverse the judgment complained of. Their Lordships hope and believe that the laws in force respecting the consecration of any building for a church which also forbid any subsequent alteration without a faculty from the ordinary will be sufficient to prevent any abuse in this respect." But, for the purpose of the order which the Court was about to make in respect of the crucifixes placed by the vicar in the church, it was sufficient to observe that crucifixes at the time of the Reformation were enjoined to be removed from all churches as tending to superstition; that their introduction as ornaments into our churches had not the sanction of the Rubrics or the Canons; that their exclusion from our churches as ornaments had been ratified by the practice of nearly three centuries and a half; that the people's churchwardens and the parishioners of this parish who were members of the Church of England conscientiously objected to their being retained in their church, and assumed their introduction as a reason for their refusal to attend Divine service. He took it that an ecclesiastical Judge, in the exercise of the discretionary power intrusted to him in relation to allowing or disallowing unprescribed ornaments in a church, should have regard to the fact that in our national Church there always had been and always would be large numbers of its members whose views on ornaments as well as on questions of doctrine within certain limits were not in harmony, and that he should make such orders in reference to the introduction of unprescribed ornaments into a parish church as would not be likely to give fresh cause of offence to any of the parishioners, to whatever party in the Church they might belong. There were three minor alterations which had been made by the vicar to which the parishioners with reason objected.

(1) The covering with curtains of the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed, which were carved on the east wall of the chancel on either side of the Holy Table. These curtains should be removed. (2) The removal of two gas standards which had been fixed on the chancel floor for the purpose of assisting to lighten the body of the church. (3) The placing of permanently fixed blinds over the east window and over a side window in the chancel. Both these alterations obstructed the lighting up of the body of the church. The reason assigned for the removal of the two gas standards was that they overheated the chancel, and that they had been replaced by new or loftier gas lights. But black shades had been inserted at the back of these new lights, so that the whole of their light was reflected on to the Holy Table or reredos, but none into the body of the church. The reason assigned for placing external blinds over the stained glass chancel windows was that the rays of the sun sometimes penetrated into the chancel to the inconvenience of the clergy and choir. But any such inconvenience might be remedied by the substitution of inside blinds fitted up to be drawn down whenever there might be occasion for doing so. There would also be an order for the replacement of the two gas standards in their former or in some equally convenient site in the chancel, to be lighted when required for the better lighting of the body of the church, and for the removal of the outside blinds at present fixed over the chancel windows. There remained for consideration two other alterations made by the vicar without a faculty, the first of which was the removal of the Communion rails and the Holy Table into the vestry and the substitution of a new movable Holy Table made of wood with a handsome reredos above it. That last alteration was made by the vicar within a week of the vestry having passed a unanimous resolution in disapproval of the change. On inspecting the church Mr. Bishop directed his attention to a box in the centre of the reredos which he stated, when first erected, was constructed to open on hinges, and his impression was that it had been so constructed with a view to placing in it the Reserved Sacrament; but at that time the hinges had been removed, and it was closed. He also directed his attention to the platform on which the officiating minister stood when officiating at the Communion Service not having been extended round the north end of the Holy Table, so as to preclude a minister from officiating there. His attention had been previously directed by the Archbishop of Canterbury (when Bishop of London) to that omission in the restoration of some chancels in the diocese and to the importance of seeing that it was rectified, so as to give every minister the option of officiating at the north end. The removal of the Communion rails and the Holy Table and the substitution of a new one without a faculty was done in contravention of ecclesiastical law. But on inspecting the church he came to the conclusion that the new Holy Table and reredos were artistically an improvement to the chancel, and the old Communion rails were not in harmony with them, and that, subject to the box in the reredos remaining closed and the platform being extended round the north end of the Holy Table, there was no reasonable objection to their remaining. In 1866, in the case of "Sieveking and Evans v. Kingsford" (36 L.J., Eccl. Div., p. 1), which was very similar to the present, Dr. Lushington, in the Archdeacon Court, allowed by a confirmatory faculty a Holy Table which had been introduced by the clergyman of the parish into the chancel, in opposition to a vote of the vestry, to remain as an improvement to the church, which was a precedent for his doing so in the present case. The erection of a side chapel with a Holy Table in it in the north aisle of the church by the vicar without a faculty, notwithstanding his being warned by the Archdeacon of Middlesex that in so doing he was violating the law, was also objected to by Mr. Bishop. It had been the practice in the diocese for some time past for the Court to grant faculties for the erection of a side chapel in a church with a Holy Table in it, for the celebration of early Communion to small congregations, when the Court was satisfied on evidence that it would be a convenience to the congregation and minister, and a saving of expense, subject to the chapel being separated from the church by trellis work or otherwise, so that it should have the appearance of being a chapel and not a side altar, such as was usual in Roman Catholic churches. It appeared in evidence that the average attendance at early Communion was about 12, and that it was of convenience that there should be a side chapel for that purpose in the church. The Court would be prepared to grant a faculty confirmatory of retention of the present side chapel with the Holy Table in it subject to its being further separated from the church by trellis work on a plan to be approved of by the Court. There would be an order on the vicar to remove the "Stations of the Cross," the crucifixes, the outside blinds from the chancel windows, and the curtains covering the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed, and directing him to make a return to the Court of what he had done in the matter within six weeks from this date: and a confirmatory faculty would issue to him in respect of the new Holy Table, reredos, and side chapel, subject to his making the alterations in them already mentioned. The vicar would have to pay all the costs incidental to the above orders and the faculty hereby decreed.

Mr. SHEARMAN TURNER, who appeared for the vicar and the vicar's churchwarden, gave notice of appeal.

GALLAGHER V. RUDD AND OTHERS, STOCKTON-ON-TEES JJ.

Licensing Acts—Closing Hours—Theatres—
Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict., c. 94), s. 72 (4)—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict., c. 49), ss. 3, 9.

This was a case stated by the quarter sessions of the county of Durham. Upon the hearing of an appeal to quarter sessions by John Gallagher, the appellant, against a conviction made on the 28th day of January, 1897, by the respondents, Justices of the Peace for the borough of Stockton-on-Tees, for that the appellant on the 23rd day of January, 1897, at the borough of Stockton-on-Tees aforesaid, during a certain time, to wit, at 11 20 in the evening of the said day, at which time premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors elsewhere than in the metropolitan district, or a town as defined by the Licensing Act, 1874, are directed to be closed in pursuance of the said Act, unlawfully did open certain premises, called the Theatre Royal, licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail, for the sale of intoxicating liquors contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, by which conviction the appellant was fined, and which said appeal came on for hearing at the general quarter sessions of the peace held in and for the county of Durham on the 7th day of April, 1897. The Court dismissed the said appeal subject to a case. The appellant was the manager of the Theatre Royal, at Stockton-on-Tees. The respondents are Justices of the Peace of Stockton-on-Tees. On the 2nd of September, 1896, the appellant was granted a licence to keep open the theatre for the public performance of stage plays therein, pursuant to the Theatre Act, 1843 (6 and 7 Vict., c. 68). The licence allowed him to keep open a certain building called the Theatre Royal, situate at Stockton-on-Tees, as and for a house and place of public resort for the public performance of stage plays, under the provisions of the statute aforesaid, for the space of 12 calendar months from the date hereof; provided that the said John Gallagher do observe and keep the rules for insuring order and decency at and in the said theatre, so licensed by us, the justices; and for regulating the times during which the said theatre shall be open. The material rules were as follows:—1. The theatre shall be closed every Sunday (Christmas Day, Good Friday) and days appointed for a public fast and thanksgiving. 2. The theatre shall be closed every Saturday night at the hour of half-past 11. On 11th of October, 1896, the appellant was granted a theatre excise licence under 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 39, and 43 and 44 Vict., c. 20, to sell intoxicating liquors by retail in the said theatre. The licence was to sell by retail in the Theatre Royal spirits, wines, sweets, made wines, mead, metheglin, beer, cider, and perry, from the day of the date hereof until the 10th day of October next ensuing in accordance with the terms of the licence granted. . . . On the evening of Saturday, 23rd of January, 1897, the theatrical performance concluded at the said theatre at 10 55 p.m., but the appellant kept one of the said theatre bars open for the sale of intoxicating liquors until 11 20 p.m., at which time two police officers entered the theatre by a door at the back (the public entrance being closed) and found between 30 and 40 people at the bar behind the dress circle. All the persons present in the said bar were either persons who were employed in the performance or had been bona fide attending the performance as spectators at the said theatre that evening. The appellant was convicted as aforesaid by the respondent justices and fined in the nominal penalty of 3s. 6d. and costs. The borough of Stockton-on-Tees aforesaid is a town within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1874. The question for the opinion of the Court is whether, under the circumstances, the appellant was guilty of an offence against section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874.

Mr. R. Luck, for the appellant, said the Justices were wrong; the conviction was under the Licensing Act, 1874, ss. 3 and 9, but that Act had by section 1 to be read as one with the Licensing Act, 1872, and, therefore, the exemption given by section 72 of the Act of 1872 applied to the provisions of the Act of 1874. There was no implied repeal of that section. [He referred to Seward v. Vera Cruz, 10 App. Cas. 59; 49 J. P. 324.]

Mr. Simley appeared for the respondent.—The theatre licence granted to the appellant contained no restriction as to the closing of the theatre except on Sundays. If the contention of the appellant was correct, the theatre might be kept open for the sale of intoxicating liquors at times when the publichouses were shut. The exemption given by the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 72, only exempted the proprietor of a theatre from obtaining a licence from the justices, and it referred only to the sale of beer. If not, it exempted him from the necessity to sell by imperial measure or from the penalties for adulteration. [He referred to "Tassell v. Oven-den," 3 Q.B.D. 383; 41 J.P. 710.] Section 25 of the Licensing Act, 1872, did not come within the exemption.

[MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT suggested that the exemption was put in to save the power of the Lord Chamberlain.]

Mr. Luck replied and referred to "Reg. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 21 Q.B.D. 369; 52 J.P. 390.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY said, I have been asked by my brother Wright to state my views first upon the case. My opinion on the whole is that the conviction was right. We have to deal in this case with what construction ought to be put on section 72 (4) of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 94), which is an exemption clause. The clause itself is simple, "Nothing in this Act shall affect or apply to the sale of intoxicating liquors by the proprietors of theatres in pursuance of the Acts on that behalf." The question is, whether that ought to be construed in its widest sense—viz., that nothing in the Act is to affect the sale of intoxicating liquors by the proprietor of a theatre, or whether it should be limited to the special rights and privileges given to theatre proprietors by Act of Parliament in that behalf. There are a number of other exemptions given by this same section 72, with regard to the sale of beer and intoxicating liquors on packet boats and at canteens; but, without referring to any other exemptions, the correct view seems to me to be that theatre proprietors are affected by this exemption to this extent, that they are not bound to go to the justices for a licence. The question in this case arose as follows. The learned Judge stated the facts, and continued:—I think, on the whole, there is nothing to protect the proprietor under these circumstances. I see no balance of convenience on either side of the question, but I think that the construction I place on the section is wiser than leaving the sale of drink in theatres free from any restrictions whatever imposed by the Licensing Acts. I think, therefore, the first interpretation I mentioned of the section is the right one, and the conviction must be affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said, I think the whole question is surrounded with much difficulty, but on the whole I think my brother Kennedy's interpretation is the right one. By the Licensing Acts, 1872 and 1874, many restrictions are placed on the sale of intoxicating liquors. Those Acts are to be read together, and, therefore, any exemption given by one Act must apply equally to the provisions of the other. There are three possible meanings to the exemption clause—(1) that theatres are to be absolutely free from all restrictions; (2) that they are to be exempted from all restrictions concerned with the sale of intoxicating liquors; (3) the construction suggested by my brother which is an exemption from interference with the provisions of Acts regulating theatres, and the words might, therefore, have run—nothing in this Act shall affect or apply to Acts affecting or regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in theatres. Our decision only applies to this exemption, and not to the others given by the Act in the same section.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR THE DOMINION OF CANADA V. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR THE PROVINCE OF ONTARIO.*

Privy Council Appeals—Canada—Provincial bar of Ontario—Lieutenant-Governor—Right to appoint Queen's Counsel and grant patents of precedence.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario of November 10, 1896, which answered, adversely to the claim of the Dominion of Canada, certain questions referred to it by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario for hearing and consideration.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. M'Tavish, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and the Hon. Frank Russell were counsel for the appellant; Hon. Edward Blake, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. Irving, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the respondent.

The arguments were heard in July last before a Board consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris, Lord Davey, Sir Henry De Villiers, and Sir Henry Strong, when judgment was reserved.

LORD WATSON, in now delivering their Lordships' judgment, said on March 29, 1873, the Legislature of the Province of Ontario passed two Acts, entitled respectively, "An Act respecting the appointment of Queen's Counsel" and "An Act to regulate the precedence of the Bar of Ontario." Those statutes were consolidated and their provisions re-enacted by cap. 139 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario passed on December 31, 1877. The Act of 1877 made regulation for the qualification of barristers-at-law and their admission to practise at the Bar in her Majesty's Courts of law and equity in Ontario. It declares that it "was and is lawful for the Lieutenant-Governor, by letters patent under the Great Seal of the Province of Ontario, to appoint from among the members of the Bar of Ontario such persons as he may deem right to be, during pleasure, provincial officers under the names of her Majesty's Counsel learned in the law for the Province of Ontario." It also enacted that the Lieutenant-Governor, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Ontario, might grant to any member of the Bar a patent of precedence in the Courts of Ontario. In virtue of the authority thus conferred upon him, the Lieutenant-Governor had, from time to time, exercised the right of issuing letters patent, in her Majesty's name, to members of the provincial Bar. By the Canadian Act, 28 Vict., cap. 11, which established a Supreme Court, and a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion, all persons who were barristers or advocates in any of the provinces were permitted to practise as barristers, advocates, or counsel in the Supreme Court; and the same enactment had been repeated in section 16 of cap. 135 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. The Governor-General of Canada had, on various occasions between May, 1879, and January, 1890, issued letters patent, in her Majesty's name, under the Great Seal of Canada, by which he appointed certain members of the provincial Bar of Ontario to be Queen's Counsel; and, on those occasions, the letters patent did not specify any territory or Court for which the appointment was made, or in which it was to receive effect. The Government of Ontario did not appear to have at any time disputed that it was within the exclusive competency of the Governor-General of Canada to appoint members of the Bar to the rank of Queen's Counsel in the Courts of the Dominion; but it had carefully refrained from making the concession that the Governor-General had any right to appoint Queen's Counsel for the province from the provincial Bar. On the other hand, the Dominion Government had persistently maintained that the appointment of Queen's Counsel to represent her Majesty, whether in the Canadian or in the provincial Courts, involved an exercise of the Royal prerogative, which belonged to the Governor-General of the Dominion. The main reason put forward in the appeal by the Attorney-General of the Dominion was to the effect that "the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario does not entirely represent the Crown in respect of the prerogative rights of the Crown, and, in particular, does not represent the Crown in respect of the prerogative right or power of appointing Queen's Counsel for Ontario or granting patents of precedence in the Courts of Ontario." In order to ascertain whether he was legally justified in issuing those patents the Lieutenant-Governor, availing himself of the provision of the Provincial Act, 53 Vict., cap. 13, referred five separate questions to the Court of Appeal for Ontario for hearing and consideration. The Attorney-General for the Dominion appeared and took part in the discussion, and the Court, consisting of Chief Justice Hagarty, with Justices Burton, MacLennan, and Street, answered four of the queries in the affirmative, with the effect of sustaining the legality of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. No answer was made to the fifth query, which was framed upon the assumption of the other queries being answered in the negative. In order to explain the issue raised by the appeal it was sufficient to refer to the first query—viz., whether since March 29, 1873, it has been and is lawful for the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, by "Letters Patent under the Great Seal of Ontario, (a) to appoint from among the members of the Bar of Ontario such persons as he deems right to be during pleasure her Majesty's Counsel for Ontario; (b) to grant to any member or members of the Bar of Ontario a patent or patents of precedence in the Courts of Ontario." The second and third queries related to the validity of the rights conferred upon the patentees, and presented the same questions in a different aspect. The fourth query related to the question of precedence, in the Courts of Ontario, between those members of the Bar who were the holders of patents of precedence and those who were not. The points thus referred to the determination of the Court of Appeal did not directly raise any controversy in regard to the jurisdiction and power of the Governor-General of Canada; they were strictly limited to the rights of the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario to appoint Queen's Counsel from the provincial Bar, whose functions were limited to the province, and to grant patents entitling the holder to take precedence at the Bar of the provincial Courts. The appointment of Counsel for the Crown and the granting of precedence at the Bar to certain of its members were matters which did not appear to their Lordships to stand upon precisely the same footing. In England the first of those rights had always been matter of prerogative in this sense—that it had been personally exercised by the Sovereign, with the advice of the Lord Chancellor, the appointment being made by letters patent under the sign manual. In early times the appointment was accompanied with a fee or retainer of moderate amount, but that formality had long since fallen into abeyance. The terms of the patent had been limited to appointing the grantees to be of counsel for the Sovereign, subject to the condition that they were to take precedence inter se according to the priority of their appointment. Royal patents of precedence inter se were in use to be granted to serjeants-at-law who did not derive their position from the Crown (see Note 16, C.B., N.S., 1). Beyond those limits the Sovereign had never, in modern times, professed to confer upon Crown Counsel, or other members of the Bar, a right of precedence or pre-audience in the Courts of England. These were matters which were regulated by practice, either by the discretion of the Bench, or by the courtesy of the profession. The effect of an appointment as Queen's Counsel was that the holder could not appear in Court as counsel for any party litigating with the Crown, unless he had obtained a licence from her Majesty. The exact position occupied by a Queen's Counsel duly appointed was a subject which might admit of a good deal of discussion. It was in the nature of an office under the Crown, although any duties which it entailed were almost as unsubstantial as its emoluments, and it was also in the nature of an honour or dignity to this extent, that it was a mark and recognition by the Sovereign of the professional eminence of the counsel upon whom it was conferred. But it did not necessarily follow that, as in the case of a proper honour or dignity, the elevation of a member of the Bar to the rank of Queen's Counsel could not be delegated by the Crown, and could only be effected by the direct personal act of the Sovereign. Even in the case of titles of honour, it did not appear to be doubtful that the Sovereign might, with the assistance of an Act of the Legislature, exercise the prerogative in a manner which would, but for its provisions, be unconstitutional. It was adjudged by the House of Lords, in the case of the Wensleydale peerage, that it was beyond the constitutional right of the monarch to confer upon a life-peer of any rank whom her Majesty might chose to create the privilege of sitting and voting in Parliament. But life peerages carrying that privilege had since then been created by the Crown, under the authority of, and to the extent permitted by, the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876. In the Province of Ontario the right of appointing Queen's Counsel had been committed to the Lieutenant-Governor by an Act passed by the Provincial Parliament, with the sanction of the Crown. Assuming it to have been within the competency of the Provincial Legislature to vest that power in some authority other than the Sovereign, the Lieutenant-Governor appeared to have been very properly selected as its depositary; seeing that, by section 65 of the British North America Act, he was intrusted with the whole executive powers, authorities, and functions which before the Union had been vested in or were exercisable by the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Canada, in so far as those powers, authorities, and functions might be necessary for the government and administration of the new Province of Ontario. The next and only other point requiring to be considered was whether the Legislature of Ontario had jurisdiction to confer upon the Lieutenant-Governor those powers which were now embodied in the revised statute of December, 1877. That was a question which could only be solved by reference to the provisions of the Imperial Act of 1867; and there were three of the enactments of section 92 which appeared to their Lordships to have an immediate bearing upon it. The first head of that clause gave to the Legislature of each province exclusive authority to make laws from time to time for the amendment of the constitution of the province, "except as regards the office of Lieutenant-Governor," and by (4) of the same clause "the establishment and tenure of provincial offices and the payment of provincial offices." Again, by the 14th head, the Legislature was empowered to make laws in relation to the administration of justice in the province, "including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial Courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in these Courts." By the combined effect of those enactments it was entirely within the discretion of the provincial Legislature to determine by what officers the Crown, or, in other words, the executive Government of the province, should be represented in its Courts of law or elsewhere, and to define by Act of Parliament the duties, whether substantial or honorary, which were to be incumbent upon those officers, and the rights and privileges which they were to enjoy. The revised statute of 1877, in so far as it related to the appointment of Queen's Counsel, was, in the opinion of their Lordships, within the limits of that legislative authority; and, that being so, there appeared to them to be no ground for the suggestion that its provisions, when given effect to by the Lieutenant-Governor, would constitute an encroachment upon the prerogative of the Crown or upon the rights of any representative of the Crown to whom, by the terms of his commission, the right of appointing counsel to represent the Sovereign may have been delegated. On the other hand, the enactments of section 92 (14) conferred upon the provincial Legislature, in wide and general terms, power to regulate the constitution and organization of all Courts of law in the province, civil or criminal. It was no doubt true that with two exceptions—those being the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—the appointment of the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each province was committed to the Governor-General of Canada by section 96, subject to the condition that until the laws of the provinces were made uniform these Judges must be selected from the Bar of the province in which the appointment was made; and, by section 100, the right to fix the salaries, allowances, and pensions of those Judges, except in the case of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, was vested in the Parliament of Canada, upon which there was also imposed the duty of providing the salaries, allowances, and pensions so fixed. But in all other respects the Courts of each province, including the Judges and officials of the Court, together with those persons who practised before them, were subject to the jurisdiction and control of the provincial Legislature. That Legislature, and no other, had the right to prescribe rules for the qualifications and admission of practitioners, whether they be pleaders or solicitors. Their Lordships, in these circumstances, did not entertain any doubt that the Parliament of Ontario had ample authority to give the Lieutenant-Governor power to confer precedence by patent upon such members of the Bar of the province as he might think fit to select. For those reasons their Lordships would humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decision appealed from. Following the rule which had been hitherto adopted in similar cases, they would make no order as to costs.

IN RE THE MASKELYNE BRITISH TYPE WRITER (LIMITED)—STUART V. THE SAME COMPANY.*
Company—Debenture-holder's action—Receiver —Appointment of a receiver not in the interest of the debenture-holders—New appointment by the Court.

This was an appeal against an order made by Mr. Justice Ridley (as vacation Judge) on October 14 last, and a subsequent order made by Mr. Justice North on November 13 last, in Chambers, consequential on the first order. The action is brought by a holder of some of a series of debentures, to the amount in the whole of £8,578, issued by the above company, the plaintiff suing on behalf of himself and the other holders of those debentures (except the London and Northern Debenture Corporation) against the company, to enforce their security. The Maskelyne Company were incorporated in June, 1896. Mr. J. M. Maclean, M.P., was the chairman of the company, and also of the London and Northern Corporation. In July, 1897, the company were in want of money, and they applied to the corporation for an advance, which the corporation agreed to make on the terms of having debentures of the company issued to them for the amount of their advance, the bargain being that the debentures should contain certain special conditions, among which were the following:—(4) "The principal moneys hereby secured shall become payable immediately on the happening of any of the events hereinafter specified, and on demand of payment by the registered holder hereof—viz. (inter alia) (c) If a distress is levied upon any of the property of the company, and it is not satisfied or secured within two days, or if any of the property of the company is sold under any distress." (5) "At any time after the principal moneys hereby secured shall have become payable according to the tenure of this debenture or under these conditions, the London and Northern Debenture Corporation (Limited) or (if that corporation is not then a debenture-holder) the registered holder as within defined of this debenture may by writing appoint one or more persons to be a receiver or receivers of all or any part of the property hereby charged in like manner in every respect as if such corporation or registered holder were a mortgagee within the meaning of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and had become entitled under that Act to exercise the power of sale thereby conferred, and every receiver so appointed shall have and be entitled to exercise all powers conferred by the Act, as if such receiver had been duly appointed thereunder, and in particular, by way of addition to, but without hereby limiting, any general powers hereinafter referred to, every such receiver so appointed shall have power to do the following things—viz. (inter alia) (a) Take immediate possession of the property or any part thereof; (b) carry on any business or businesses of the company." These conditions were inserted in the debentures (for £1,174) issued to the corporation, as well as in all the other debentures issued by the company, of which debentures to the amount of £1,870 were issued to the plaintiff Stuart in respect of advances which he had made to the company. In this way all the debenture-holders had notice of the special condition as to the appointment of a receiver on which the corporation had insisted. On September 30 last a petition to wind up the company was presented by the corporation as shareholders in the company. This petition was afterwards withdrawn. In October a creditor recovered judgment against the company and levied a distress on the company's property. This distress was not satisfied or secured within two days. On October 4 the company passed a resolution to wind up voluntarily, and this resolution was afterwards confirmed on October 20, and Mr. Akers, the secretary of the company, was then appointed voluntary liquidator. On October 6 the plaintiff, Stuart, demanded payment by the company of his debentures, and payment not being made, on the same day he issued the writ in this action. On October 14 the corporation demanded payment of their debentures, and payment not being made they, on the same day, in exercise of the power conferred on them by the debentures, appointed Mr.

Akers receiver. He went into possession, and so remained until he was displaced by the order of Mr. Justice North, as will presently appear. At a later hour on October 14 a motion by the plaintiff, Stuart, for the appointment of a receiver was heard by Mr. Justice Ridley. The motion had been in the Court list for the previous day, but had not then been reached. The motion was opposed (though the corporation were not then parties to the action) on the ground that a receiver had been already appointed under the power. The learned Judge said that under these circumstances he could not appoint a receiver. It was then suggested that he should appoint Mr. Akers receiver, which he accordingly did, the order appointing him in the usual form on his giving security. Akers did not consent to this order, but insisted that he was receiver under the appointment made by the corporation. He did not give security as required by the order, but nevertheless he remained in possession. On October 16 Mr. Maclean wrote to the solicitor of the Maskelyne Company as follows:—"I am glad to find that you approved of the appointment of Mr. Akers as receiver. We were reluctant to use our authority as debenture-holders until we were forced to do so by Mr. Stuart, and have only intervened in order to protect our interests as the largest shareholders in the company. These interests are the same as those of the whole body of shareholders. I hope it may still be possible for us to save the concern." On November 1 an order was made by Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams to continue the winding up of the company under the supervision of the Court, and Mr. C. F. Kemp was appointed liquidator, Mr. Akers retiring in his favour. On November 15 Mr. Justice North, upon a summons issued by the plaintiff, Stuart, on the ground that Akers had not complied with the order of the Court that he should give security, made an order appointing Mr. Walter Freire Marreco receiver and manager upon his giving security. This having been done Mr. Akers went out of possession. The corporation appealed from both the orders of October 14 and November 15.

Mr. VERNON SMITH, Q.C., and Mr. W. F. HAMILTON, for the corporation, insisted on their right under the power to appoint a receiver.

Mr. SWINFEN EADY, Q.C., and Mr. F. WHINNEY, for the plaintiff, argued that, in appointing Mr. Akers, the corporation and Mr. Maclean, then chairman, had been really acting in the interest of the shareholders of the company and not in that of the debenture-holders, and that, under the circumstances, Mr. Akers was not a proper person to be appointed, and the Court was justified in making another appointment.

Mr. HAMILTON replied on behalf of the corporation.

The Court dismissed the appeals.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the whole case turned on the admissibility in evidence of Mr. Maclean's letter of October 16 and the inference to be drawn from that letter if it was admissible. The bargain between the company and the debenture-holders, and the bargain between the debenture-holders themselves, was that, if the money secured by the debentures became payable, the corporation should have power to appoint a receiver. As between the company and the corporation there was nothing to be said. But on whose behalf was this power conferred? All the debentures were to rank pari passu, and the power was one which, as between themselves and the other debenture-holders, the corporation were bound to exercise for the benefit of all the debenture-holders. They could not do as they liked with it. They were trustees of the power for the other debenture-holders. There was a quarrel between the debenture-holders. If it was true, as the plaintiff alleged, that the corporation were using the power not in the interest of the debenture-holders, but in that of the mortgagees and of themselves as shareholders, the case was unanswerable in law and in principle. The Court had jurisdiction to interfere, not adversely to the power of appointing a receiver, but in order to carry out the bargain with the debenture-holders. This was the case alleged on behalf of the plaintiff, and it was unanswerable if it was made out. It was alleged that Mr. Maclean was acting in the matter as the agent of the corporation, and his own affidavits showed that this was so. His letter was, therefore, admissible in evidence against the corporation. The meaning of that letter was, "We have appointed Mr. Akers receiver, not to protect the interests of our fellow debenture-holders, but to protect the interests of the shareholders in the company." The letter showed that the appointment was not made in the interest of the debenture-holders at all. His Lordship regretted that Mr. Maclean was now out of England, and could not, therefore, be heard to explain his letter. But the Court must act on the evidence as it stood. This being so, the case alleged by the plaintiff was made out, and it was not only within the jurisdiction of the Court, but it was fit and proper for the Court to exercise its jurisdiction, to protect the plaintiff from such an exercise of the power of appointing a receiver. The appeals must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY agreed. He thought that the jurisdiction of the Court to appoint its own officer to protect the assets was clear. It was said that if it exercised this power it would be setting aside the bargain between the parties. But the power was clearly not one which was to be exercised for the benefit of the donee. Generally, such a power as this was to be found in a trust deed of some kind. In the present case it was clear on the face of the debenture itself that the power was the subject of agreement not only with the mortgagees, but with all the mortgagees. It was a fiduciary power, and must be exercised bona fide for the benefit of all the debenture-holders and for their protection. His Lordship was of opinion that Mr. Maclean's letter was admissible in evidence against the corporation, and that it was found that the power had not been properly exercised. The power did not oust the jurisdiction of the Court, though the Court would pay great attention to it.

MOULT V. HALLIDAY.*

Master and Servant—Domestic servant—Termination of service at end of first month—Notice—Custom—Reasonableness—Return of written character.

This was an appeal from the Westminster County Court raising the question whether a servant is entitled to give notice at any time in the first fortnight of her service so as to enable her to leave at the end of the first month. The County Court Judge held that there was no such custom. He also held that it was unreasonable, and therefore gave judgment for the defendant.

Mr. Tyrrell Paine appeared for the servant, the appellant; Mr. Boydell Houghton for the defendant.

The facts were these. On March 12 the plaintiff,

* Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Julia Moulton, who had entered the service of Mrs. Halliday as upper housemaid on March 1, gave notice to leave on April 1. Mrs. Halliday claimed one month's notice and refused to pay the plaintiff's wages, though she offered her six weeks' wages if she would stay ten days later. The plaintiff then brought the action, claiming £2 6s. 8d. for her month's wages. The plaintiff at the trial said that she had been a servant for 14 years, and gave evidence of the custom set up. She called several people experienced in managing servants and in carrying on servants' registries to corroborate it. She was supported in the action by Hunt's Registry Office.

MR. TYRRELL PAINE, on behalf of the plaintiff, admitted that there was no such custom as he was trying to enforce laid down in the text books or authorities, but it was a long time before the Courts took cognizance even of the custom of giving the month's notice or a month's wages. The case of "Williams v. Byrne" (7 A. and E., 177) showed that it was not quite settled in 1837, but by 1845 it was established, as "Turner v. Mason" (14 M. and W., 112) proved. Such a custom, however, did not exclude the custom for which he contended. The matter had frequently come before County Court Judges and they had taken different views. County Court decisions, however, would not appear in the Law Reports. The custom for which he contended was this—A right either in the master or servant, in the absence of a special contract, to determine the service at the end of the first calendar month by notice given at or before the expiration of the first fortnight of service.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS asked whether, if the master, on the first day of the service, gave a fortnight's notice to go the servant would be entitled to stay to the end of the month?

MR. TYRRELL PAINE said his contention was that that would be so. He referred to "Wigglesworth v. Dallison" (9th ed. Smith's Leading Cases at p. 582). The custom was reasonable. Where a master and servant as soon as they began to know each other thought they were unsuitable to each other this custom enabled them to separate at an early date after finding it out.

MR. BOYDELL HOUGHTON contended that there was no such custom in existence. It probably came from the idea that the first month was always one of trial. The suggestion as to the fortnight's notice was put on in order to make it appear reasonable, probably by Hunt's Registry, which was really fighting this case. As early as 1800 the custom of one month's notice was established. He cited "Metzner v. Bolton" (9 Ex., 518). If the custom in question had existed as suggested there would have been some notice of it in the books. The ascertainment of what the contract was was a question of fact for the County Court Judge.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS asked whether it was not reasonable that in the first month a fortnight's notice should be given? On the arrival at a new place it might almost at once be found out whether the place was likely to suit the servant or the servant the master.

MR. BOYDELL HOUGHTON submitted that from the master's point of view a month was a more reasonable time for notice in any event. The demand for good servants exceeded the supply; a master might well require a month to fill up the place of the servant who had left, even though a fortnight might be enough to enable a servant to get a situation. The way out of the difficulty would be for the agency to put on a card the terms of this custom. The servant might show it to the master, and then both would know what they were agreeing to.

MR. TYRRELL PAINE, in reply, cited "Ex parte Powell—In re Matthews" (1 Ch. D., 501) and "Crawcour v. Salter" (18 Ch. D., 30, at p. 53).

The Court dismissed the appeal as being a decision on a question of fact.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said he regretted that the judgment of the Court on the case would not settle the law on the question which the parties desired to have settled. The question was one of fact, and they had no power to say that the custom set up by the plaintiff had been recognized enough to enable the Court to take notice of it. The learned Judge for himself did not say that it did not exist; he would have been glad to have heard the whole of the evidence, with additional evidence if necessary, on the matter, but the law had made the County Court Judge the sole judge of fact. If he found as a fact that there was no such custom this Court could not reverse his finding. On that ground, therefore, and on that alone the appeal must be dismissed. There was evidence before the County Court Judge which would have justified him in coming to the conclusion that the custom prevailed. But there was no obligation on him to come to that conclusion, and his decision could not be upset. Some mode might easily be devised whereby this little settled question might be settled between the actual parties in each case. As to the reasonableness of the question and with the view to dispose of one point, he had no hesitation in saying that the custom would not be unreasonable if it existed. He could see certain advantages in it. He would add one word as to the custom which had been suggested before the County Court by the servants' registry—namely, that if a servant left at the end of the first month she had a right to have the character with which she came handed over. That was not a reasonable custom. There was no legal obligation to hand over the character. But there was an obligation on a master who gave a servant's character that the character should be true. Supposing, then, that during the month for which the servant who had come with a good character stayed circumstances occurred which showed that the servant was not of good character, it would be deceitful and improper to hand over the old good character.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. He only added a judgment because the case raised points of considerable general interest. A custom was alleged. Now what was the nature of it. To be any good it must be a custom which was so notorious and so well understood that it was unnecessary for people doing business together to mention it, as it would be taken to be included in the contract unless expressly excluded. Thus in the engagement of a servant the well-known custom of a month's wages or a month's warning was an instance. It was always a question of fact, however, whether it was such a general custom that it must be taken to be incorporated in the particular contract. If it were sufficiently notorious the Judge would take judicial notice of it. The supposed custom set up in this case was thought to be inconsistent with the custom of terminating the service by a month's notice or a month's wages. But, even if that were the case, it would not matter, inasmuch as a custom grew up from an accumulation of instances, and a custom might therefore change in certain particulars from time to time. Then when the change became sufficiently notorious it would be taken as being included in contracts of service unless it was excluded. But still the custom would have to be proved in each case. Going a stage further the time would come when it would become so universal and so well known that it would not require proof. The custom set up by the plaintiff had gone some way towards being established, but it still remained a question of fact for the County Court Judge, and his finding on it would not be interfered with by the Court. The learned Judge agreed with Mr. Justice Hawkins that the custom set up on behalf of the plaintiff would not be unreasonable in itself, and also agreed with him in thinking that the fact of a servant leaving within the first month created no obligation on the master to hand over the character of the servant which she brought with her.

DOXFORD AND SONS (LIMITED) V. THE SEA SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Solicitor—Audience—High Court—Absence of counsel instructed—Audience of in High Court by leave of Judge.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge appeared for the plaintiffs in this case; Mr. Shee, Q.C., and Mr. J. Rutherford appeared for the defendants.

The case was commenced on Friday afternoon, the 3rd Dec., and on the Associate's mentioning the cases that were fixed for Saturday's list, Mr. Shee, Q.C., informed his Lordship that his learned junior was obliged to appear in London on that day, and that he himself would be obliged to leave the case for a case in the Crown Court, and asked that the adjourned hearing of the case might be postponed. His Lordship said the case must proceed in the morning, and that if there was any risk of Mr. Shee's having to leave the case another junior should be briefed. After the case had proceeded some short time on Saturday morning, Mr. Shee, who appeared alone without any junior, was obliged to leave. His Lordship, after commenting on the fact that no junior counsel had been briefed, and on being informed by the defendants' solicitor that he had been assured of Mr. Shee's presence, gave leave to the defendants' solicitor to appear for the defendants for the purpose of cross-examination. Mr. Miller, of Miller and Williamson, the defendants' solicitors, cross-examined accordingly. The action was brought for the rescission of an agreement, dated November 12, 1896, entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants whereby the plaintiffs undertook to build a turret deck steamer for the defendants for the sum of £36,500, to be launched and delivered complete by October 31, 1897, or, alternatively, for a declaration that the agreement had not been regularly or validly executed, and in either case for an order for delivery up thereof to be cancelled. The plaintiffs are the well-known firm of shipbuilders at Sunderland, and the defendant company was promoted by or in connexion with William Western Tapscott, trading as W. Tapscott and Co., the manager of numerous single-ship companies, who was recently adjudged bankrupt. The plaintiffs alleged that they were induced to enter into the contract by misrepresentation, or, alternatively, fraudulent misrepresentations, made by W. W. Tapscott, and by one F. J. Pilcher, both acting as agents for and on behalf of the defendant company, to the effect (1) that the defendant company was formed for the purpose of taking over the business of Tapscott and Co., whereas, in fact, at the time the representation was made it was not formed for such purpose, as the firm of Tapscott and Co. had ceased to exist, its business having passed under a deed of assignment for benefit of creditors; (2) that the defendant company, or, alternatively, Tapscott and Co., had had contracts for half a million, which they had never failed to carry out, and that they were fully justified in contracting for the steamer, and were equal to the undertaking of doing so, whereas, in fact, Tapscott and Co. had at that date failed to carry out contracts with Palmers' Shipbuilding Company and with Sir William Gray and Co., and by executing the deed of assignment had made default with their creditors generally. The defendants denied the representations, but did not deny the facts, which were alleged by the plaintiffs as the true facts, and his Lordship refused to admit evidence to prove that the facts were other than those alleged by the plaintiffs. The defendants' case was that, so far as any misrepresentations were made, the plaintiffs were not deceived by them, as they knew the real facts, and that what in fact induced the plaintiffs to contract was the price offered. The defendants having called no evidence, Mr. Pickford replied, and then Mr. Miller, by further leave of his Lordship, addressed the jury. His Lordship left the following questions to the jury. (1) Were the representations made? (2) If so, were those representations material? (3) Were the plaintiffs induced to enter into the contract by those representations? The jury answered all three questions in the affirmative, and his Lordship gave judgment for rescission of the contract.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1897.
Chitty and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } Dec. 9.

IN RE STEVENS—COOKE V. STEVENS.*

Executor—Administration—Account—"Wilful default."

The Court directed the ordinary accounts to be taken against two executors, but refused to give any relief on the footing of wilful default.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice North's, the question being whether an account against executors ought to be taken on the footing of what is technically called "wilful default"—i.e., whether the executors should be ordered to account not only for moneys actually received by them but also for moneys which, but for their wilful default, they might have received on behalf of their testator's estate. The action was brought for the administration of the estate of Mr. G. C. Stevens, who died on December 23, 1882. By his will he appointed three executors—C. F. Stevens, John Sewell, and M. S. Emerson. John Sewell never acted. The will was not proved till October 15, 1889, when probate was granted to C. F. Stevens alone. Emerson did not renounce probate or disclaim the trusts of the will until after the commencement of the action in April, 1894. For some years Emerson took an active part in the administration of the estate. He was a solicitor, and he alleged that he had acted only as the solicitor of his co-executor, C. F. Stevens. Mr. Justice North, however, held that Emerson had really acted as executor, and had made himself liable as such. The plaintiff in the action was a residuary legatee under the will; the defendants were C. F. Stevens and Emerson. Several instances of wilful default were alleged, but only one of them need be noticed. It arose as follows:—Part of the testator's estate was a sum of £676, payable under a policy on his own life. The testator had mortgaged the policy to his bankers, Messrs. Gurney, in whose possession it was at the time of his death. The insurance company declined to pay the policy money without the production of the probate of the will, and it was not, in fact, paid until November 21, 1889, when it was paid, with interest thereon at 1 per cent. from March, 1883. Meanwhile the executors had to pay out of the estate interest at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the mortgage debt secured by the policy. The difference between the interest thus paid and the interest received amounted to £157 14s. 8d. The plaintiff sought to make the defendants liable for this sum on the ground that it had been lost to the estate by reason of their wilful default or neglect. Mr. Justice North directed the ordinary accounts to be taken against both the defendants as executors, but he refused to give any relief on the footing of wilful default. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Methold were for the appellant; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Christopher James were for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments on the 11th ult. their Lordships reserved judgment, which was delivered this morning, affirming the decision of Mr. Justice North's, and dismissing the appeal with costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said:—In this case a residuary legatee has brought an action against his testator's executors seeking not only the ordinary accounts of their receipts and payments, but also an account against them on the footing of wilful default. So far as the plaintiff seeks to charge them with wilful default the action has been dismissed with costs, and from this decision the plaintiff has appealed. The testator's assets got in by the executors are said not to be sufficient to pay his debts. Hence the importance of the case to the plaintiff. Two acts of wilful default are relied upon and have to be considered. The first is that the executors omitted to get in a debt alleged to have been due to the testator at his death from a person named Clarke. The facts as to this are complicated and the pleadings are somewhat embarrassing. But having regard to the mode in which this part of the case was dealt with in the Court below it would be unjust to the defendants to treat the pleadings as admitting that there was such a debt, and so far as evidence goes no such debt was proved either before Mr. Justice North or before us. The next act of wilful default charged was the omission on the part of the executors to enable a secured creditor of the testator to realize his security sooner than he did. The consequence of this omission was that the testator's estate has been diminished by the amount of interest which would have been saved if the security had been realized sooner. The security was a policy for £375 on the testator's life; he had deposited it with other documents of value with his bankers, and at his death there was due to them on those securities £1,700 odd. The policy was pledged for much more than it was worth. If the executors had in their hands assets sufficient to pay the debts of the deceased, including the debt due to the bankers, the executors ought to have paid the bankers off; and if, instead of doing this, they kept assets in their hands and allowed interest to run up against the estate, and ultimately had to pay more than they would have had to pay if they had not delayed paying the bankers the amount due to them, the executors would have been guilty of a devastavit, and would be disallowed the interest thus unnecessarily paid by them. The policy was not assigned to the bankers and they could not give a valid receipt for the policy moneys without the concurrence of the executors. Moreover, the insurance office which had to pay the policy would not pay the bankers, even with the concurrence of the executors, until the testator's will had been proved. For some reason or other the executors did not wish to prove it, and although eventually one of them did prove the will, the other has not proved it yet. As soon as the will was proved the bankers, or, rather, a person to whom they had assigned their debt and their policy, obtained the policy moneys, with the assistance of the executor who had proved, and the debt was reduced by the amount received from the insurance office. It must not be overlooked that although the executors' accounts have not yet been certified, they have been fully investigated, and there is no proof even now that the executors did wrong in not paying off the bankers and so reducing the policy and getting in the asset which it represented. In the absence, however, of such evidence I am unable to see how a case of wilful default can be established. If debts are paid in the wrong order to the detriment of the creditor the executor is of course answerable. The payment would be disallowed in taking the account of the receipts and payments. But the payment of debts even in a wrong order is not a wrong entitling a legatee to relief, nor does such payment amount to wilful default; and it is wilful default which we have to consider here. It is urged that it is the duty of an executor to prevent any loss to his testator's estate which it is in his power to prevent. But this proposition is far too wide, as is shown inter alia by "Turner v. Turner" (1 Jac. and W., 39), in which it was held that an executor's right of paying one creditor before another justified him as against a legatee in paying even a simple contract debt not bearing interest in preference to a specialty debt bearing interest, although the estate was diminished by the additional interest which had ultimately to be borne. A wrongful payment is one thing, and can be set right by disallowing it when the executor brings in his account. But if it is sought to charge him with loss attributable to some other breach of duty, call it wilful default or by any other name, such breach of duty must be proved, and if no sufficient proof or even prima facie evidence of it is given it is not right to insert in the judgment any declaration of liability or even an inquiry as to liability based upon such supposed breach of duty. In the present case no evidence of any such breach of duty has been given, and the attempt to charge the executors with more than they have received has failed. Whether any payment, by which the executors seek to discharge themselves, ought or ought not to be disallowed must be decided hereafter. That question is not before us now. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs. I have preferred to base my judgment on the above ground rather than to investigate the question whether executors who delay proving their testator's will can be rendered liable for losses which they could have avoided if they had proved it earlier. In the present case the will has been proved by one of the defendants, and the Court, therefore, has the probate before it. The probate shows that both defendants are appointed executors by the will, and it is proved that both of them have accepted the office of executor by acting in the administration of the testator's estate. Under these circumstances I fail to see upon what principle they can derive any benefit from delaying to obtain probate. It appears to me that, having accepted office, they ought to be treated as executors as from that time, and not simply as executors de son tort, as their counsel contended. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue this inquiry. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

CROCKER AND OTHERS V. GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Insurance—Marine—Voyage—Description in policy—Construction—Loss, whether covered. Decision of Mathew, J. (2 Com. Cas., 233), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew at the trial of the action without a jury (reported in 2 Com. Cas., 233).^{*} The action was brought by underwriters upon a policy of reinsurance upon the ship Talavera. The policy was expressed to be on "bull valued as per original policy or policies," "being a reinsurance of policy or policies with Crocker and others subject to the same forms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, whether reinsurance or otherwise, and to pay as may be paid thereon." The risk was described as follows:—"At and from Newcastle (N.S.W.) to any port or ports, place or places, in any order, on the west coast of South America, and for 30 days in port after arrival, however employed, or until sailing on next voyage, whichever may first occur." In the original policy the risk was described as follows:—"At and from Sydney to Newcastle (N.S.W.), while there and thence to any port or ports, place or places, on the west coast of South America and (or) islands adjacent, in any order, once or oftener, while there and thence to any port or ports of call and (or) discharge in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent of Europe between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both included, and for 30 days in port after final arrival, however employed." The ship was totally lost, and the plaintiffs, having paid for a total loss under the original policy, claimed a total loss under the defendants' policy of reinsurance. The defendants denied that the loss was covered by the policy. The Talavera sailed on January 5, 1896, from Newcastle (N.S.W.) to Valparaiso with a cargo of coals. The cargo was shipped in the ordinary course of trade, and was intended to be discharged at the vessel's port of destination. The Talavera arrived at Valparaiso on February 12, 1896, discharged the whole of her cargo, and remained there for more than 30 days. She loaded at Valparaiso 600 tons of ballast and 150 tons of sugar for Talcahuano, a port on the west coast of South America, where she was to load her cargo for the United Kingdom. While on her way to Talcahuano she became a total loss. Vessels making the voyage from Newcastle to the west coast of South America sometimes discharge their Newcastle cargo at more than one port on the coast. Mr. Justice Mathew held that the loss was covered by the policy and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Joseph Hurst appeared for the defendants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Percy Morris for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question was whether the policy of reinsurances covered the risk on the ship to Talcahuano or only to Valparaiso. The original policy covered a round voyage from Sydney to Newcastle in New South Wales, from there to any port or ports on the west coast of South America, and from there home to the United Kingdom. The policy of reinsurance was intended to cover part of that round voyage, and the question was, How much of it did it cover? There was no doubt as to the terminus a quo of the voyage covered by the reinsurance. The point in dispute was as to the terminus ad quem. The words of the policy were—"At and from Newcastle, New South Wales, to any port or ports, place or places, in any order, on the west coast of South America." The plaintiffs said that the meaning of this was that the vessel was to be insured up to the last port on the west coast of South America which she might visit before she started on her homeward voyage. In his opinion that contention was right. Looking at the original policy, at what appeared to be the object of the reinsurance, and at the nature of the voyage, he thought that the terminus ad quem was Talcahuano, the port on the west coast of South America from which she was to load a cargo for the United Kingdom. The loss happened before the vessel arrived at Talcahuano, and therefore the underwriters were liable. But the policy did not end there; it continued "and for 30 days in port after arrival, however employed, or until sailing on next voyage, whichever may first occur." That meant for 30 days after arrival at the port of Talcahuano. It was said that Mr. Justice Mathew had transposed the words "however employed" from the clause in which they occurred to the previous clause. He thought it was not necessary to transpose them, but that according to their true construction they applied to both clauses. The plaintiffs therefore in his opinion were entitled to recover.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY was of the same opinion. It was necessary to observe that this was not the case of an ordinary insurance for a voyage, but that a portion was picked out from a round voyage and made the subject of reinsurance. Authorities had been cited to show that the words "port or ports" used in a policy of insurance as they were used here meant ports of discharge. But in his opinion they ought to be careful not to extend rules of construction to cases in which they were clearly intended not to apply. The words, as used here, must have been intended to apply to ports of loading as well as ports of discharge. With regard to the words "however employed," Mr. Justice Mathew did not transpose them, he merely construed them so as to make them apply to the whole sentence.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL V. DAVIS—LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL V. ROWTON HOUSES.*

Metropolis.—Building.—Consent of County Council—London Building Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. cxxiii.).

Certain buildings held not to be dwelling-houses "to be inhabited or adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working classes."

These were two special cases stated by two metropolitan magistrates raising a question as to whether certain buildings were dwelling-houses "to be inhabited or adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working classes" under the London Building Act, 1894, because if they were the owners were affected by the provisions of that Act. The two cases were heard together by consent.

Mr. Avory and Mr. Daldy appeared for the London County Council; Mr. Macmerran, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill appeared for the Rowton Houses (Limited); Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Marshall Hall for Davis.

The facts as to the Rowton Houses were as follows:—A summons was taken out charging the company with failure to comply with a notice served by the London County Council under sections 14 and 200 (2) of the London Building Act, 1894, requiring them to set back a building known as Rowton-house, situate at Churchyard-road, Newington Butts, so that every part of the external walls should be at a distance in every direction of not less than 20ft. from the centre of the roadway. The respondents had not complied with the said notice, and at the date of the hearing of the summons the building had been erected, and it was nearer to the centre of the road than was permitted. The building in question is erected on the site of 13 old dwelling-houses with gardens at the rear of them which were existing at the date of the commencement of the London Building Act, 1894. The plan of the building had been duly certified by the district surveyor under 13 (5) of the Act, and no land within the prescribed distance of 20ft. was occupied by the new building which was not occupied by the previously existing buildings. The building in question was adapted to provide lodging for single men, at a cheap rate, by the night or by the week, with recreation rooms and convenience for the use of the inhabitants, and has sleeping accommodation for about 800 persons. The cubical contents of the building exceed 25,000 cubic feet. The appellants, the London County Council, contended that the building in question, though a public building within the definition in section 5 (27), was a "dwelling-house to be inhabited or adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working class," within the meaning of section 13 (5), and could not, therefore, legally be erected without their consent. The respondents contended that the building was, in fact, a poor man's hotel, and a public building within the definition in section 5 (28), and was not a dwelling-house within section 13 (5); and they cited the definitions of "dwelling-house," "domestic building," and "public building," in section 5 (25), (26), and (27), in support of that view. The magistrate found as a fact that the building was "adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working class," although it was not exclusively reserved or used by persons of that class, and he held that it was properly described as a poor man's hotel, and that it was a public building, and not a dwelling-house within the meaning of the last proviso but one to section 13 (5), and that such proviso was intended to prevent the construction of narrow alleys and courts and of small dwelling-houses higher than the courts are wide, and had no such application to such a case as the buildings in question, and he dismissed the summons. The case against Davis was stated by the magistrate at Worship-street on an information for non-compliance with a notice from the London County Council in respect of No. 105, Brick-lane. The respondent is the owner of a plot of land fronting Brick-lane, upon which there formerly stood a row of buildings, consisting of ten shops with living rooms behind and above. The respondent, being desirous of pulling down the old buildings and of erecting new ones, sent in a plan of a new building, which was duly certified by the district surveyor. Brick-lane is a highway for carriage traffic, and opposite No. 105 is of the width of 25ft. The new house, No. 105, was built as a shop, with rooms above, and was let to a Mr. Cohen, who sublet most of it to separate families of the working classes. It was contended by the appellants, the County Council, that, because the dwelling-house was occupied by persons engaged in manual labour, it came within the proviso in section 13 (5) of the Act of 1894, and was a "dwelling-house inhabited or adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working class," and therefore could not be erected or re-erected within the prescribed distance—which would in this case be 20ft. from the centre of the roadway—to a height exceeding the distance of the front wall of such building from the opposite side of the street, without the consent of the appellants. The magistrate dismissed the information, on the ground that the words "to be inhabited by persons of the working class" meant for the purpose of being or intended to be inhabited by persons of the working class, and that the words "adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working class" meant specially constructed or arranged for that purpose, such as flats or artisans' model dwellings. There was no evidence that No. 105 was intended to be inhabited or adapted to be inhabited by any particular class of persons. He also held that the fact of its being inhabited by persons who were engaged in manual labour as subtenants of the original tenant, Cohen, was no evidence that the house was erected for the purpose of being so inhabited.

The Court dismissed the appeal in both cases.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS, referring to the facts in Davis's case, said Davis was owner before the Act of 1894 of ten shops. He was desirous, after the passing of the Act, of putting up fresh buildings. He accordingly sent in his plans and description of the proposed buildings, and, as a fact, his new building, No. 105, was erected on the precise site of the old building. No. 105 was let to a man named Cohen, a working clockmaker, at £2 per week, as a shop and a dwelling-house. The construction of the house was that of a shop in front, upon the ground floor, with living rooms behind it, which were occupied by Cohen and his wife. On the upper floors were rooms used as sleeping and dwelling-rooms, and let out to certain cabinet makers, with their wives and families. Cohen's son lived on the top floor. The house was not built with the intention that it should be the residence of persons of the working classes. It was intended to be a shop and dwelling-house, and was so let to Cohen, who sublet part of it. After the house was built notice was given by the London County Council to Davis to set back the house, and a summons was taken out on his failure to comply with the notice. His Lordship referred to the terms of the Building Act, 1894, and said, that in his opinion, it was meant by section 13 (5) of the statute that in order to bring a building within it as being "a dwelling-house to be inhabited by persons of the working classes" it must be a building that the person re-erecting intended should be a dwelling place for people of that class. As to the second part dealing with a dwelling-house "adapted to be inhabited by persons of the working classes," that meant a building structurally adapted for the purpose—i.e., adapted to it in its construction. There was nothing to show here that anything more than a shop and dwelling-house was intended, or that the house in its construction was specially adapted for the dwelling of persons of the working classes. The magistrate was right in his findings and must be supported. As to Rowton House, the circumstances were different. Rowton House was used as a sort of poor man's club, or hotel for single men. There was no provision for any wives or families. It was not a house adapted for persons of the working class in the sense of the statute. True, it might be adapted for working class people to live in, but any house might be said to be adapted for that; in this house there was general provision for any one of any class who might come to it. As to its being a "public building" within the Act, that probably was the case, but it could be none the less a dwelling-house. Looking at the facts of this case, the learned Judge could not think that this was a house intended to be a dwelling-house for persons of the working class. The appeal in this case also must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. He dealt with the provisions of the Act as to the re-erection of new buildings on the site of old ones. The point in them was that the owner was not to lose his rights if he erected the new buildings on the precise sites of the old. That proviso was an exception to the general rule that no erection of new buildings should take place within a certain distance of the centre of the highway. In both the present cases re-erection on old sites had taken place, but there was a proviso on the proviso in the Act. If the owner re-erecting was going to build dwelling-houses for persons of the working classes he was restricted in his rights. The point of that provision was the erection of the buildings and not their use. If they were converted after their erection other provisions came into effect. The words "to be inhabited" meant with the intention that they should be inhabited. The words "adapted" &c., meant to be structurally fit for dwellings for the working classes. What was meant by the working classes in this connexion was that class of persons among which overcrowding was likely to take place. That was the mischief provided against. When a building was intended for their use, or was structurally specially suitable for that purpose, air space had to be provided and the provisions of this section applied. There was no evidence on which the magistrates were bound to find that either of these houses were either structurally fit or intended to be occupied by persons of the working classes. The fact that No. 105 was actually let by Cohen to members of the working class might be some evidence of intention, but not conclusive. The learned Judge then, with regard to Rowton House, referred to the definitions in the Act of "dwelling-house," "domestic building," and "public building." The magistrate had thought it could not be a "dwelling-house" because it came within the definition of "public building." In that he was wrong, but in other respects he was right.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1897.
Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Dec. 10.

IN RE 1202—EX PARTE OFFICIAL RECEIVER.*

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Rescission—Jurisdiction—Discretion—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 104—Bankruptcy Act, 1890, sec. 3, subsec. (6).

The Court has unlimited discretion as to reviewing, rescinding, or varying any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction (Rigby, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal by the Official Receiver against an order of Mr. Registrar Hepe's rescinding the receiving order. On July 22, 1897, a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition, and at the first meeting of the creditors it was agreed that, in order to avoid the expense and delay of bankruptcy, it was for the benefit of the creditors that they should be paid 10s. in the pound on the amount of their debts, and that the creditors should withdraw their proofs. The debtor's father paid all the creditors 10s. in the pound, and by deed the creditors assigned their debts to the father and released the debtor therefrom, and thereupon the creditors withdrew their proofs. The debtor's father then released his claim against the estate. It appeared that soon after the making of the receiving order, and prior to the above-mentioned meeting of the creditors, three of the debtor's principal creditors had been appointed at a private meeting of the creditors to inquire and report as to the position of the debtor's affairs, and generally to act in the interests of the creditors, and they came to the conclusion that it would be for the benefit of the creditors to receive an immediate cash dividend of 10s. in the pound, and that the debtor's assets would not pay so large a dividend in bankruptcy. The debtor attended his preliminary examination by the Official Receiver, and an order was made on certain firms with the consent of the Official Receiver staying all proceedings until November 5, 1897, to enable the debtor to make such application as he might be advised. The debtor thereupon applied to have the receiving order rescinded, and the Registrar rescinded it, stating that the case was a most exceptional one, and that in his opinion the receiving order should be rescinded. The Official Receiver appealed.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. MUIR MACKENZIE, for the Official Receiver, contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order, or, at any rate, the Registrar had exercised his discretion wrongly. A receiving order ought only to be rescinded upon the ground that the debts had been paid in full, or that the receiving order ought never to have been made. Unless one or other of those circumstances existed, where less than 20s. in the pound was paid, a scheme must be carried through under section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which provided that the scheme should be accepted at a meeting of the creditors, and that no application for the approval of the scheme by the Court should be heard until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor. The object of the Act was to protect the creditors, and to have the conduct of the debtor investigated. In this case there had been no public examination of the debtor. If the Registrar's judgment was right, there would be a great inducement to a debtor who had committed offences against the Act to go round to his creditors and get their consent to accept a composition, and then get the receiving order rescinded. They referred to "In re Leslie" (18 Q.B.D., 619), "In re Dixon and Cardus" (5 Morrell's Bank. Rep., 291), "In re Hester" (22 Q.B.D., 632), and "In re Flatau (1893, 2 Q.B., 219).

Mr. H. REED, Q.C., and Mr. CARRINGTON (Mr. H. S. CAUTLEY with them) for the debtor contended that there was jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order under the general power to rescind any order conferred by section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Every case that had been referred to showed that the Court had a discretion to rescind the receiving order, and besides those cases "In re Davidson" (W. N. [1894], p. 210) and "Ex parte Carr" (35 W. R., 150) were to the same effect. Secondly, the Registrar exercised his discretion rightly. The debtor was a young man who had been in business about two years, a hosier, and after he had filed his petition three of his principal creditors investigated his affairs and came to the conclusion that a payment of 10s. in the pound was advantageous to the creditors. There was also the preliminary examination of the debtor by the Official Receiver, and no suggestion was made against the debtor's conduct or acts, and the Official Receiver consented to the order staying proceedings for the purpose of enabling the debtor to make an application to the Court, clearly referring to an application to rescind the receiving order. Now the Board of Trade, in the name of the Official Receiver, appealed against the order rescinding the receiving order. All the circumstances showed that in this case, which the Registrar treated as a very special case, the discretion was rightly exercised.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, Lord Justice Rigby dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the first question was whether there was jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order. The circumstances lay in a narrow compass. It was a very special case. The debtor was a hosier, and not wishing to apply to his father for assistance, he filed his own petition, and a receiving order was made. Then he got his father to come forward and pay his creditors 10s. in the pound. The Official Receiver, who was superintending the proceedings and who stood between the debtor and the creditors, knowing well the position of this young man and knowing that he had committed no delinquency, agreed that 10s. in the pound was an advantageous offer and did not want—at least that was the inference which his Lordship drew—to have the debtor publicly examined, and consented to the receiving order being rescinded. Those facts differentiated this case from all the others, inasmuch as this public official came forward and said that he knew nothing against the debtor in any shape or way, and that he did not want any public examination. The Board of Trade now asked that the order of the Registrar should be discharged. The Attorney-General argued at first that the Court had no discretion to rescind the receiving order, but he soon left that, and contended that the discretion had been wrongly exercised. When he (the Lord Justice) first read section 3, subsection 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, he thought that it was a direct legislative enactment prohibiting this being done until after the public examination had been concluded. It was, however, pointed out that by section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the Court had jurisdiction to rescind any order made by it. In none of the authorities cited from first to last was there any doubt expressed that there existed a discretion in that respect. The last case, "In re Davidson," plainly showed that the discretion existed. It was then said that the discretion to rescind a receiving order ought only to be exercised where 20s. in the pound had been paid to the creditors, or where the receiving order had been wrongly made. In "In re Hester" and "In re Flatau" this Court said that the matter was discretionary and did not limit the exercise of the discretion to the two grounds now suggested. The Court there pointed out what circumstances should be taken into consideration in exercising the discretion. Those circumstances had all been considered in the present case by the Registrar, who came to the conclusion that no further investigation was required, and rescinded the receiving order. This case was a most exceptional case, and he could not say that the Registrar had not exercised his discretion rightly. The appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY regretted that he was compelled to differ from the rest of the Court. He did not wish to say that the Registrar had not a discretion on some grounds to rescind the receiving order; but the discretion was limited. One great evil which the Bankruptcy Acts were intended to aim at was a private arrangement made with creditors. If a general discretion existed as to rescinding receiving orders, it would detract from that beneficial provision. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a number of cases were decided upon this point, among them "In re Hester," which showed that the leading consideration which ought to guide the Court in all these matters was whether the debtor was proposing a scheme within the Act. The Judges refused to determine whether a discretion existed or not; but, as they were affirming the order refusing to rescind the receiving order, they expressly refused to decide whether a debtor, as regards an arrangement with his creditors, was or was not bound to proceed under section 18 of the Act of 1883, which had been repealed and replaced by section 3 of the Act of 1890. They left it open. Then came section 3 of the Act of 1890, under which no application to the Court to approve a scheme was to be heard until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor. That, in his opinion, was enacted to put an end to the doubt whether, as regards schemes of arrangement with creditors, there was a general discretion to rescind the receiving order or not. He (the Lord Justice) did not decide that there was no jurisdiction to rescind, but it was plain that it was never intended that the main or only ground of the application to rescind should be founded on a private arrangement with the creditors. There was nothing special in the present case. The debtor filed his own petition, and thus brought himself under the bankruptcy laws, and he then got a private arrangement made with his creditors. That seemed to be entirely against the provisions and object of the Act, and, in his Lordship's opinion, the exercise of the Registrar's discretion, if the discretion existed, ought to be overruled. The only ground suggested for the exercise of the discretion was the private arrangement with the creditors, and that was no ground at all. He could not see any distinction in principle between rescinding a receiving order and annulling an adjudication under section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and he thought that the Court was entitled to look at section 35 to see upon what grounds an adjudication could be annulled. One ground was payment of the debts in full, and the other ground was that the debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt. In the present case there was nothing to show that the receiving order ought not to have been made, nor were the debts paid in full. He could not take the view that even if the Official Receiver had consented to the order in this case, which he did not seem to have done, that would affect the case. The Official Receiver only consented to a stay of proceedings on certain terms. That was a natural order when the Official Receiver knew nothing against the debtor, but it did not show that nothing could be ascertained against the debtor, because all the means of ascertainment had not been exhausted. It was said that the appeal was really by the Board of Trade, but there was nothing wrong in the Board of Trade, if upon consideration they thought it right to do so, directing the Official Receiver, who was to a great extent their officer, to take the opinion of this Court upon the question. There was nothing special in this case, and in his opinion the order ought to be discharged.

The COURT refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

BOARD V. THE AFRICAN CONSOLIDATED LAND AND TRADING COMPANY.*

Company—Register—Inspection—Shareholders—Right to take notes or extracts from register free of charge.

This was an application on the part of the two plaintiffs, one of whom was a shareholder whose shares were alleged to be forfeited, the other an admitted shareholder, for an order on the defendant company to allow them to inspect and take notes or extracts from the register of shareholders. The plaintiffs grounded their application on section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, which gives members a right of inspection free of the register of shareholders, and other persons a right of inspection on payment of a fee, and also confers a right to copies on both members and other persons on payment at the rate of 6d. per 100 words.

MR. SWINFEN EADY, Q.C., and Mr. STEWART SMITH supported the application on behalf of the plaintiffs.

MR. VERNON SMITH, Q.C., and Mr. W. HIGGINS, for the company, defended, partly on grounds personal to the plaintiffs, of no general interest, and they also argued that the statutory right to receive copies from the company on payment by implication took away the right to take notes or extracts that otherwise would have followed as an incident to the right to inspect.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH said the case seemed to him to be completely covered by authority but for one point. The cases said that where there was power to inspect, if there was nothing to negative the proposition, power was also given by implication to take notes or copies of any part or the whole of the document to inspect which there was a power. The two cases cited, "Holland v. Dixon" (4 The Times L.R., 285) and "Mutter v. Eastern and Midland Railway Company" (4 The Times L.R., 377), were sufficient to establish that. That was a matter of general law, whether relating to a common law right of inspection or a statutory right. The present case seemed to him clearly within the principle, unless it could be distinguished by this; that the 32nd section of the Companies Act, 1862, gave not only a right to inspect, but also a right to have copies at the rate of 6d. per every 100 words. His Lordship did not think that in any way cut down the right that members had to inspection and to take copies or notes free of charge, and that other persons had on payment of a fee of 1s., but was an additional privilege. His Lordship made the order asked for, with costs.

LEEDS AND HANLEY THEATRE OF VARIETIES (LIMITED)
V. BROADBENT.*

Contract—Mortgage deed—Construction—Payment of interest—"Punctually," meaning of.

A mortgage deed stipulated that the half-yearly payments of interest should be "punctually" made.

Held, that a delay of nine days in payment did not contravene this stipulation.

A question of construction of some novelty and interest arose in this case. The defendants, who were the owners of a theatre, in February, 1897, sold the theatre to the plaintiffs for £10,500, out of which sum it was agreed that £7,000 should remain on mortgage. A mortgage to secure payment of that amount, with interest payable half-yearly, was accordingly executed by the plaintiffs in favour of the defendants. The deed contained a provision that payment of the principal money thereby secured should not be required by the mortgagees until the expiration of three years, computed from the date of the deed, if in the meantime every half-yearly payment of interest should be "punctually" paid. The deed contained no express power of sale, and accordingly the provisions of section 20 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 41) were applicable. The first half-year's interest on the £7,000 became due on August 15, 1897, and on August 16 one of the defendants, Broadbent, by whom the matter was transacted, not having received a cheque, wrote to the secretary of the company asking for immediate payment. In reply, the secretary stated that the letter should be submitted to the directors at their meeting on the Friday following. Mr. Broadbent, being dissatisfied with this reply, gave notice calling in the mortgage at the end of three months. The letter was acknowledged, but no cheque sent, and on August 24 Mr. Broadbent wired threatening to issue a writ unless the interest was remitted that day, and the result was that a cheque was then sent, not by the company, but by a gentleman who had an interest in the company's property. The defendants having expressed their intention of holding by the notice and requiring payment accordingly, the plaintiffs brought this action and now moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling or advertising for sale the premises comprised in the mortgage, and from otherwise in any manner enforcing the same.

MR. WARRINGTON, Q.C., and Mr. CHURCH, for the plaintiffs, contended that the payment of interest only nine days after it became due was a "punctual" payment within the meaning of the mortgage, and that the notice calling in the mortgage money was therefore invalid.

MR. BRAMWELL DAVIS, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. ALLEN, for the defendants, insisted that the word "punctually" ought to be construed according to its natural meaning, and referred to "Hicks v. Gardner" (1 Jurist, p. 541) as an authority in their favour.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said that the question as to the meaning of the word "punctually" was one of considerable nicety. It was said that time was of the essence of the contract, but the question was, what time; or, in other words, what was the meaning of the word "punctually"? When that was ascertained there was no difficulty in applying the clause in the deed. The question was one of the meaning of language. No doubt the word "punctually," if construed literally, meant "on the point"—i.e., actually at the exact time specified. In that sense a man was just as unpunctual if he came one minute too early for an appointment as if he came one minute too late; but in ordinary business transactions a man was considered to keep an appointment and to pay money punctually if he came within a short time after the exact time mentioned. This was an unusual clause. In ordinary clauses a period of as much as 30 days was limited within which payment might be made. His Lordship was not disposed to say that "punctually" meant necessarily on the particular day mentioned in the covenant. He certainly could not say that it meant 30 days or two or three days after the specified day. The question was whether the delay of nine days which had occurred in this case was a reasonable delay. Subject to one case which had been cited, the point was an entirely novel one. It would be pedantic to lay hold of the phrase punctum temporis and make that the test of the meaning of the word "punctually" in an English document with reference to the payment of half-yearly interest on a mortgage debt. It was said that the point was concluded by authority, and a case in the Jurist had been referred to. The report of that case was very short. The authorities which were there cited in argument, and to which his Lordship had particularly referred, did not appear to have any direct bearing on the point before the Court. The case was very unlike the present one, and nothing was decided in it as between mortgagor and mortgagee. His Lordship thought that he was entitled to put it aside and, following the bent of his own mind, to construe the word "punctually" as not meaning on the very day specified—i.e., within the 24 hours of that day—but as a matter of business and according to the understanding of business men. In that view his Lordship held that, the delay of nine days not being unreasonable, there had been no default in punctual payment, and consequently that the notice given by the defendants was bad, and there must be an injunction to restrain them from acting on it.

BARTLETT V. MAYFAIR PROPERTY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Borrowing powers—Debentures—Uncalled capital—Companies Act, 1879, sec. 5.

First mortgage debentures issued by a company subsequent to a special resolution passed by it under sec. 5 of the Companies Act, 1879, do not extend to any portion of its uncalled capital dealt with by the resolution.

This case raised an important question of company law which has not previously been the subject of decision. The last paragraph of section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879, is as follows:—"A limited company may by a special resolution declare that any portion of its capital which has not already been called up shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event and for the purpose of the company being wound up; and thereupon such portion of capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up." The opinions of experts in company law differed as to what the actual effect of this curiously worded enactment was. It is quite clear on the authorities that when such a special resolution has not been passed a company may, if its articles so empower it, and there is no prohibition in its memorandum of association, give a valid charge on its uncalled capital for the time being. This was decided by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in 1875 in "In re Phoenix Bessemer Steel Company" (32 L. T., N. S., 854), and Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Kay came to the same conclusion in "Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Company" (Law Rep., 33 Ch. D., 156), although Sir George Jessel's decision was apparently not brought to his attention. These decisions were followed by the Court of Appeal in 1890 in "In re Pyle Works" (Law Rep., 44 Ch. D., 534), a case which was approved of by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in "Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Company" (Law Rep. [1895], A. C., 244). These cases have been largely acted on, and most modern debentures purport to charge the company's uncalled capital for the time being. When the debenture-holders wish to realize this portion of their security, and no winding up of the company has taken place, the Court will give liberty to the receiver in a debenture-holder's action to take proceedings to get in the calls which are charged by the debentures (see "2 Palmer's Company Precedents," 6th ed., p. 400, and Form 483). If a winding up has commenced the charge on uncalled capital remains valid even as against the creditors of the company (see "In re Pyle Works"). If the winding up is voluntary a general meeting of the company may sanction the exercise by the directors of their power to make and enforce calls—"Ladd's Case" (Law Rep. [1893], 3 Ch., 450); but if the winding up is under a compulsory order the directors' powers as to calls come to an end, and the only power to make calls is in the liquidator acting in the winding up—"Fowler v. Broad's Company" (Law Rep. [1893], 1 Ch., 724). In such a case, therefore, even if a debenture-holder's action is pending, the calls must be got in by or, at any rate, in the name of the liquidator (ibid.). Nevertheless, the validity of the charge on uncalled capital is not affected, although the charge has to be realized in a different way. Under such a charge the capital is not often called up at once, and if the words of the Act of 1879 were read very strictly it might be contended that a company could, after giving such a charge, render it a nullity by passing such a special resolution as is referred to in section 5. This point, however, did not arise in the present case. The Mayfair Property Company was registered in August, 1892, with a capital of £50,000, in 5,000 shares of £10 each, and both the memorandum of association and the articles authorized the creation of a charge on the unpaid capital for the time being. By a special resolution passed on September 21, 1892, and confirmed on October 12, 1892, it was declared "That such portion of the company's capital as consists of £5 per share remaining uncalled upon all the ordinary shares of the company shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879." In June, 1894, the company issued first mortgage debentures for an aggregate of £50,000, purporting to be a charge on all its property whatsoever and whosoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being. On August 8, 1896, the present action was commenced on behalf of all the debenture-holders, and a receiver was appointed on August 12. On August 8, 1896, a compulsory winding-up order was made against the company. At this time only £5 per share remained uncalled, and the question was now raised whether the debentures were a first charge on £5 per share which had been called up by the official receiver and liquidator in the winding up. For the debenture-holders it was contended that the Act of 1879 did not affect the validity of the charge as regarded the £5 per share mentioned in the special resolution, reliance being placed on certain observations made by Lord Macnaghten when delivering the judgment in "Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Company." In that case the Act of 1879 did not apply and was not considered; but a clause in the articles of the company (which was registered in New South Wales) provided that the total amount to be called up should not exceed £5 per share unless and until it should be determined by special resolution that the paid-up capital had become insufficient to meet its liabilities, and that it was therefore necessary to call up the whole or a portion of the balance of £5 per share. When the debentures in that case (charging uncalled capital) were issued, the limit of £5 per share had not been reached, but it was held that the charge covered all the uncalled capital, and not merely that portion which remained under the directors' control. On behalf of the official receiver and liquidator in the present case, reliance was placed on the dicta of the present Master of the Rolls in "In re Pyle Works," and it was contended that the uncalled capital covered by the special resolution was not subject to the charge.

Mr. R. F. Norton (Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., with him) was for the debenture-holders; and Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson were for the official receiver and liquidator.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said the question was whether the rights of the mortgagees extended to the capital mentioned in the special resolution. Looking at the language of the section, it seemed to his Lordship that one ought to hold that it meant what prima facie it said. It created a statutory inability in a certain event to call up capital for any purpose except winding-up. His Lordship assented to Mr. Farwell's statement that the uncalled capital mentioned in a special resolution passed under Section 5 of the Act of 1879 was to be preserved intact for the purposes of the liquidation. It was impossible to doubt that that was the meaning of the clause, and that view was fortified by the observations, coming from one of the highest authorities—the present Master of the Rolls—in the case of “In re Pyle Works.” At first sight Lord Macnaghten's remarks in “Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Company,” seemed to raise a difficulty, but when carefully looked at, that case appeared to have no application here. The principal point in that case was not a question in the present case, and the decision on the subsidiary point was not applicable in the present case because the articles of the New South Wales Company did not contemplate a winding-up of the company. His Lordship did not think a similar question arose in that case; but if it did what had then to be considered was an arrangement between the shareholders and not a statutory disability as in the present case. The application of the debenture-holders must therefore be dismissed with costs.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1897.
Rigby, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Dec. 11.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. NEW YORK BREWERIES COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Revenue—Probate duty—Executor de son tort— Intermeddling with estate—Acts done under direction of foreign executor—Shares in English company.

Probate duty is payable in respect of all the assets of a deceased person, whether domiciled or resident here or not, which are locally situate in this country, and such duty is recoverable from any one who, by dealing with English assets of a deceased person under the direction of a foreign executor, has constituted himself executor de son tort.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Grantham), reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 349. The question involved was a most important one—namely (as stated by the Solicitor-General), how far English assets could be dealt with in this country by or under the direction of a foreign executor without taking out probate here. It was an information by the Attorney-General, from which it appeared that the defendant company was an English company, having its share capital divided into preference and ordinary shares, and also having mortgage debentures. The registered office was in London. The company was formed for the purpose (inter alia) of acquiring the businesses of H. Clausen and Son Brewing Company, and of Flanagan, Nay, and Co., both of New York, and by an agreement made in August, 1888, both these businesses were acquired by the company. By Article 43 of the articles of association of the company, “In the case of the death of a shareholder the survivor . . . and the executors or administrators of the deceased . . . shall be the only persons recognized by the company as having any title to the shares.” By Article 44, any person becoming entitled to a share in consequence of the death of a member may, on producing such evidence of title as the directors shall require, be registered himself as a shareholder. By Article 47, “a person entitled to a share by transmission shall be entitled to receive and may give a discharge for any dividends, bonuses, or other moneys payable in respect of the share.” By a condition endorsed on the debentures it was provided that the principal moneys and interest secured by the debentures would be paid at the registered office of the company, or at some bank in London or Westminster to be from time to time appointed by the company. It was stated by the defendants that the interest on the debentures and the dividends on the shares were in fact paid in America to the American share and debenture-holders out of the profits made in that country. Henry Clausen, a person domiciled and resident in New York, died on December 28, 1893, and by his will appointed H. W. Schmidt and P. V. Stocky, of New York, his executors, and on January 19, 1894, letters testamentary of Clausen's estate were granted by the Surrogates Court of New York to the executors. At the date of his death Clausen was the registered holder in the books of the company in London of preference shares, ordinary shares, and debentures of the nominal value of £42,210. There was not, and never had been, any register of shares or debentures of the company elsewhere than in London. The defendant company at the request of the foreign executors and by arrangement with the Commissioners of Inland Revenue transferred one ordinary share and one debenture in the books of the company in London into the names of Schmidt and Stocky so as to raise the question in this case, and paid them the dividends on the shares which had become due after Clausen's death, and the interest on the debentures which had become due before his death. The company, at the times when they so transferred the share and debenture and paid the dividends and interest, knew that the foreign executors had not obtained probate in this country, and did not intend to do so. The Crown contended that the company by so acting had taken possession and administered the share, debenture, and dividends and interest so transferred and paid, and had become an executor de son tort thereof and liable to the penalties and duties imposed by 55 Geo. III., c. 184, s. 37, and 44 and 45 Vict., c. 12, s. 40; and that the company became liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the personal estate of Clausen in this country, and to pay such duty as would have been payable if probate or administration to Clausen's estate had been duly granted. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the defendant company. The Crown appealed, and it was stated on their behalf that as this was a test case they did not claim the penalties, but only the duty.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins (the Attorney-General, Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., with them) appeared for the Crown; Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. Asquith, Q.C. (Mr. A. M. Bremner and Mr. Gore-Brown with them), appeared for the defendant company.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment, in the course of which he said that this was a test case, brought to determine whether an English company limited by shares could, upon the death of a foreign shareholder, with impunity transfer into the names of his foreign executors shares and debentures standing in the name of the deceased shareholder in the books of the company and pay to such executors the arrears of interest and dividends due thereon at the date of his death without such executors taking out, or being about to take out, representation to the deceased in this country. That this was the real question which the parties wished to have decided would be seen from the letter of the defendants' solicitors to the Comptroller of Inland Revenue. The Divisional Court held that the company could legally and with impunity do this, the case before them having been specially argued as to whether the company by so doing would bring themselves within section 37 of 55 Geo. III., c. 184, and become liable to the penalties therein named. The case had been developed in this Court into one very different from what it was in the Court below, the Solicitor-General stating here that he did not ask for penalties. It must be taken that the interest and dividends were paid to the foreign executors in this country. First, what would have been the position of these foreign executors had they come over to this country and obtained from the defendant company in London payment of the interest and dividends due to their testator at the date of his death, and a transfer of the shares and debentures from his name into their names without having taken out or intending to take out representation in this country to their testator. He could not doubt that, upon receipt in this country of their testator's English assets, they would have constituted themselves executors de son tort. They never intended to be executors in this country, and yet they intermeddled as executors with the testator's goods in this country in such a way as to constitute themselves executors de son tort. The point was so stated in "Williams on Executors" (9th ed., 1827). That this would have been the position of these foreign executors when they obtained the English assets of the deceased from the defendant company he had no doubt, and this was so, although they did not personally come to this country. These foreign executors being executors de son tort, how could the defendant company, when called upon in a Court of law, justify what they did at the request of these executors in administering the English assets of the deceased? Mr. Justice Wills, in the Court below, based his judgment upon the ground that, as an executor derived his power from the will, and could do many acts before taking out probate, and could even sue, the defendant company could, therefore, justify administering the English assets of the deceased, as they had acted upon the request of an executor, and had handed over to him the assets of his testator, although he had not at that time taken out probate. If the executor were an English executor about to take out probate, this ordinarily would be so, but he (the Lord Justice) must point out that, when either an executor had to justify what he had done as executor, or another had to justify what he had done at the request of an executor, each must prove that the executor was in fact the executor of the deceased, and this could only be done by production of the probate, or, as Chief Justice Jarvis pithily put it in "Johnson v. Warwick" (17 C.B., at p. 522), "When that will was proved, as here it has been, the Court has the legal optics through which to look at it"; and that this was so was not in reality disputed at the Bar. The American will, as regards these English assets, had no validity whatever in this country, nor had the American executors any right under it to receive the testator's assets here. Until they had taken out representation here to their testator in this country they were pure strangers to the English assets. This was not the case, as put in argument, of a debtor of a testator paying to the executor named in the English will a debt due from him to that testator before that executor had proved the will, but it was a case in which the payment was made to a person who had no legal right to receive it, well knowing that that person would never become legally entitled to receive it. The judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in "Sharland v. Milden" (5 Hare, 469), and that of Vice-Chancellor Wood in "Hill v. Curtis" (L.R., 1 Eq., 80), showed that, even if there was not such knowledge, the defendant company by what they did were executors de son tort. It could not be successfully contended that an executor de son tort was not liable to pay probate duty upon the assets of a testator which he had administered. Without being an executor he intermeddled with the deceased's estate as if he were an executor so as to constitute himself executor de son tort, and, as Mr. Justice Wightman said in "Paul v. Simpson" (9 Q.B., at p. 370), a person who is executor de son tort was executor generally. Those who received and administered the property of a deceased as executors de son tort were primarily liable to account for and pay the duty. The defendant company's case really came to this—that one executor de son tort, when challenged in a Court in this country to justify what he had done, could justify by showing that he acted under the directions of another executor de son tort. That could not be. The defendant company having constituted themselves executors de son tort, it was argued that there was no way by which the Crown could obtain from them the duty payable upon the English assets administered by them. The Solicitor-General did not now ask for penalties under section 37 of 55 Geo. III., c. 184, so the only question was whether by any proceedings by the Crown the defendants could be made to pay the duty. In his opinion it was open to the Attorney-General to file an information against the defendant company, asking that it might be declared that a debt arose and became payable to her Majesty in respect of the duty upon the amount of the English assets in this country at the date of the death of the deceased which the defendants had administered (see "Attorney-General v. Dimond," 1 Cr. and J., 356; "Attorney-General v. Hope," 1 Cr. M. and R., 530; and "Attorney-General v. Brunning," 8 H.L.C., 243), and it was no answer to such an information to say that the defendant company were only executors de son tort. The defendant company were therefore liable to pay the duty claimed upon the assets which they had administered in this country. If it was to be taken that the interest and dividends were paid in America and not here, the same result would follow, and the reason for this would be found in the judgments about to be delivered by Lords Justices Rigby and Collins. It was unnecessary to decide whether the penalties imposed by section 37 of 55 Geo. III., c. 184, could be recovered, but if that point had to be decided he would agree with the judgment of Lord Justice Giffard in Fernandes's Executors' case (L.R., 5 Ch. App., 314), which had an important bearing upon the case in favour of the Crown; nor had he to decide whether the Crown Suits Act (28 and 29 Vict., c. 57) or sections 39 and 40 of 44 and 45 Vict., c. 12, could in the circumstances be resorted to. For these reasons the Crown succeeded, and the appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read a judgment in which he said that by English law duty was payable in respect of all the assets of a deceased person, whether domiciled or resident within this country or not, which were, within the meaning of the authorities, locally situate in England. Local assets included the shares and debentures standing in the name of the deceased in the defendant company and the dividends on the shares and interest on the debentures of the company due to the deceased. If it were possible to evade the duty by omitting to take out representation here to the deceased, the imposition of the duty would in many cases be a vain thing. Accordingly it was plain upon authority that the duty was payable by a person who took upon himself to deal with assets as an executor de son tort, and any person intermeddling with the assets under the direction of an executor de son tort, whether he was a foreign representative or not, was himself chargeable as an executor de son tort. It made no difference that the foreign representative was named as executor in the will by virtue of which he was made representative abroad. That will could not be looked at or given in evidence until representation was taken out here. They were asked to decide here that the defendant company might, without becoming liable to pay duty, lawfully concur in transferring here the shares and debentures and pay the dividends and interest to persons who could not be recognized by English law as representatives of the deceased and who never intended to be representatives here. In his opinion the defendant company could do none of those things. It was suggested that by paying the dividends and interest abroad the company might evade liability. Whether the payments were made abroad out of money transmitted for the purpose or out of money of the company which happened to be abroad made no difference. They were equally payable by the order and direction of the company, and the payment was the act of the company whereby a chose in action of the company locally situate here was dealt with so as to constitute the company executors de son tort. It was further suggested that the Courts in New York would enforce payment there of the full amount of the dividends and interest regardless of the fact that they were chargeable and that the payment of them would make the company chargeable with duty in England. He (the Lord Justice) was very far from being satisfied that this would be so, but if it were the case, however much to be regretted, he did not think that it would affect the Crown's right to duty. It was not desirable to decide anything more than was necessary for determining the real point submitted, but, without deciding any abstract question as to penalties, he might say that it would require very different grounds from anything which had been brought before them to lead him to the conclusion that the decision of Lord Justice Giffard in Fernandes's Executors' case would not be applicable. If the arguments of the defendant company were to prevail, he did not see why foreign executors who did not wish to sue here should ever pay duty on assets here. They would only have to get some one here to collect and transmit to them all the assets here, and that would be an end to the matter.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment, in which he said that what the defendants had done amounted to such an intermeddling with the English assets of the deceased as to constitute them executors de son tort, unless the fact that these acts were done under the authority of the executors named in the American will could make a difference. He agreed that there was a broad distinction between acts done by or under the authority of a mere intruder not named in the will and acts done by or under the authority of a named executor. The latter taking under the will was not in fact a tortfeasor, neither was any one acting under him, and for certain purposes this distinction might be material. But if the acts of the persons who had dealt with the assets were challenged, as they now were by the Crown, and their rights had to be determined in a Court of law before probate was taken out—and a fortiori if it was never intended to be taken out—there was no material difference between the position of the mere intruder and his agents and the executor and his agents. They were each estopped by their acts, whether tortious or innocent, from denying that they were executors, and as they could not prove probate they made themselves liable to probate duty in respect of the assets which they had administered. The distinction was pointed out in "Sykes v. Sykes" (L.R., 5 C.P., at p. 118). It was immaterial in this view whether they were named in the will or not, as the Court could not be informed upon that fact except through the medium of probate. If he was right in holding that the defendant company did intermeddle with the English assets of the testator, the case of "Fernandes's Executors" was exactly in point. He agreed that, as the Crown were not claiming a penalty under section 37 of 55 George III., c. 184, the real question was whether the defendant company were liable to pay duty, and he had no doubt an information would lie against them for not doing so. This point did not seem to have been argued in the Court below. But he was further of opinion that the processes of transferring the title to the share and debenture in the register from the deceased to the executors and paying the interest and dividends did involve a "taking possession" of these assets within the meaning of the statute. If the operation had been carried out in the ordinary way, there must have been a physical taking possession of the documents of title, and even though this step was advisedly omitted in this case, in his opinion there was a constructive taking possession involved in the alteration of the register and the payment of interest and dividends. The interest and dividends, as well as the shares and debentures, formed part of the estate of the deceased in England, being debts due from an English company and payable in England (see "Attorney-General v. Higgins," 2 H. and N., 339; "Attorney-General v. Bouwens," 4 M. and W., 171; "Attorney-General v. Hope," 1 Cr. M. and R., 530). In his opinion the company could not, by paying them in America, escape from the position of having appropriated in their hands, and therefore taken possession of, English assets of the deceased when they paid these sums for interest and dividends.

The COURT refused to grant a stay of execution pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

REG. V. THOMAS WEST.*

Criminal Law—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, sec. 5—Commitment and indictment.

Prisoner was committed for trial on July 27 for a rape on July 19. More than three months after the alleged offence the bill presented to and found by the grand jury was for unlawful carnal knowledge.

Held, that the prosecution had been commenced within three months within the meaning of the proviso to sec. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.

This was a case reserved by Mr. Justice Phillimore for the Court of Crown Cases Reserved at the Durham Assizes on November 25 last, on an indictment charging Thomas West with an offence under section 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict., c. 69.), against a girl over 13 and under 16 years of age, on July 19 last. The original charge was one of rape, and the commitment, dated July 27, was for rape, but as it appeared on the deposition that it was not a case of that description the bill laid before and found by the grand jury was for the other offence. The question raised was whether the provision in the section that no prosecution shall be commenced for such an offence more than three months after the commission of the offence applied inasmuch as the bill was presented to the grand jury more than three months after it. The judge overruled the objection and the prisoner was convicted and sentenced.

Mr. MEYNELL appeared in support of the conviction; the prisoner was not represented.

Mr. MEYNELL submitted that there was a prosecution commenced within the three months. The only possible question was whether the difference between the commitment and the indictment created a difficulty. The commitment was for rape, and the indictment for the lesser offence. He cited "Reg. v. Wallace" (1 East's Pleas of the Crown, 186), which was a case where a man was committed for counterfeiting and indicted for colouring coin, and it was held that the date of the commitment was the important date.

The COURT upheld the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in delivering judgment, said:—The facts were that the prisoner had an information laid against him for rape, and the justices thought fit to commit him for trial for that offence. It came on to be tried at Durham, at a period when more than three months had elapsed since the commission of the offence. It was considered at the Assizes that it would not be proper to put the prisoner on trial for rape, as there was some evidence of consent on the part of the girl; so the bill was sent up for unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl between 13 and 16. It was clear that on a charge of rape it was lawful under section 9 of the statute for a jury to convict the prisoner of the offence under section 5 (1). If the indictment had been for rape, and the jury had convicted of the misdemeanour, no possible question could have arisen. But it was said that this was a substantive charge, and made after the limit of three months from the commission of the offence. Could it be said, therefore, that the prosecution had commenced in time? In the opinion of the learned Chief Justice it could. The prosecution for rape was a prosecution for any offence of which, on a prosecution for rape, a prisoner could properly be convicted. The evidence before the magistrate in the case was such that the magistrate was entitled to send the prisoner to trial on a charge of rape, though he might have some doubt as to whether he would be convicted of it. The principle of omne majus continet in se minus applied. Therefore the lesser charge was included in the greater at the time of the commitment by the magistrate.

The other learned JUDGES concurred.

Criminal Law—Children—Neglect of—Uncleanliness—57 & 58 Vict., c. 41.

This was a case reserved by the Chairman of the Worcester Quarter Sessions. An indictment was preferred against Frederick Cox and his wife, Isabella Cox, under 57 and 58 Vict., c. 41, that being persons over the age of 16, and having "custody and charge" of certain children specified in the indictment, they neglected such children in a manner likely to cause them unnecessary suffering. Frederick Cox was acquitted, but Isabella was convicted. The children in question consisted of a lawful child of Frederick and Isabella Cox, an illegitimate child of Frederick Cox by another woman, and an illegitimate child of Isabella Cox by another man, born before the marriage. It was proved that these children were in a verminous condition as to their heads and were not allowed to come into school in consequence. The indictment contained separate charges against each prisoner as well as joint charges against both.

Mr. Clarke Hall appeared for the Crown, but was not called on to argue.

Mr. STANFORD HUTTON appeared for the prisoner. He contended that Isabella Cox was not responsible for the illegitimate child of her husband, even though the child lived in the house with them. He also contended that as the husband had been acquitted the wife ought to be, and cited "Reg. v. White" (40 L.J., M.C. [1871], 134) to show that the obligation of the husband absolved the wife. As to the age of the children, it was necessary to produce a certificate of birth and proof of identity, which had not been done. He cited on this "Reg. v. Wedge" (9 Car. and Payne, 298). None of these children was produced except one. The fact of a child attending an elementary school was no evidence that it was under 16. Then as to the age of the prisoner, that should be proved strictly.

The COURT affirmed the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, after commenting on one part of the Chairman's direction to the jury, said that as to the points actually left for the Court, (1) the fact that separate counts and joint counts were included in one indictment did not make it a bad indictment. See the case of "Reg. v. Gibson" (8 East's Reports). It was true that in some cases it might work injustice, as where the offence was such that prisoners might themselves be called to give evidence, or where evidence given against one might prejudice the jury against the other prisoner. That, however, would be a case in which application to the Judge at the trial might be made for relief. The second point raised was whether Isabella Cox was a person who had the custody, charge, or care of the children, within the Statute 57 and 58 Vict., c. 41. There was ample evidence in the case that she had the charge and custody of the children. She lived with her husband, a working man. There were in the house the children of the marriage, the illegitimate child of the husband, and the illegitimate child of the wife. It was a question of fact for the jury, whether they were in her "custody and charge." As a question of accuracy it should be noted that the count in the indictment did not allege that the children were in her "care." The next point relied on was there was no legal evidence that the children were under 16 years of age. It had been contended that a certificate of birth and proof of identity of the person was the only satisfactory evidence. But that was not so; the age of children might be proved by any lawful evidence, and it had been done here. One child was produced in Court, and the evidence set out in the case was as follows:—"It was proved by the officer of the National Society of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children that he had seen the children, and he stated what he believed were their respective ages, all of which were under 16. A police constable gave evidence generally confirming the officer. The mistress of the school was called, and said that the eldest children attended a public elementary school. She believed that they were within the statutory age limit for such schools, but beyond this no evidence was given of the age of the children." Then there was a contention as to the propriety of the proof of the parents being over 16. But that was a ludicrous objection. The point was first taken that there was no evidence that the children were under 16, and then that there was no evidence that their parents were over 16. There was nothing in that point, to state it was enough to confute it. The last objection was that there was no evidence that the wife was provided with or could obtain the requisites for keeping the children clean, and as the husband had been acquitted by the jury the wife could not be convicted. That, however, was a question for the jury. They had the character of the neglect before them. Soap and water was all that seemed to be required. The conviction must be affirmed. It might be added, however, that as there did seem to have been some attempt on the part of the woman to cure the children, it need not be treated as a very serious case.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said he was quite of the same opinion, and he would add nothing, lest he should have the appearance of giving the objections more importance than they deserved.

The rest of the COURT concurred.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND EARL GREY.*

Revenue—Estate Duty—Gift inter vivos—Deed—Finance Act, 1894, secs. 1 and 2 (1).

This was an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty in respect of certain property bestowed in 1885 by a deed of the third Earl Grey on the defendant, his nephew, then Albert Henry George Grey, Esq., now the fourth Earl Grey. The deed purported to transfer to the defendant the property for which estate duty was now claimed.

The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Bremner for the defendant.

The information was to the following effect:—By a deed dated October 19, 1885, made between Henry (third) Earl Grey (since deceased) of the one part and the defendant, then Albert Henry George Grey, Esq., of the other part, reciting that the said Henry Earl Grey was absolutely seised of or entitled to considerable family estates and to other estates and real property purchased or acquired by him in the county of Northumberland, but that a portion of the said estates was subject to several life annuities amounting to £2,200 a year, and reciting that another portion of the said estates was subject to a mortgage for £200,000, and reciting that the said Earl Grey was also possessed of personal estate, comprising arrears of rent, &c., and the furniture and effects in and about the mansion-house in which the earl then resided at Howick, and farming stock, crops, and other effects, and reciting that the defendant, Albert Grey, was the nephew of the said Earl Grey and heir-presumptive to the peerage, and that the said Earl Grey was desirous of giving his real and personal estate to the said Albert Grey. It was witnessed that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the natural love and affection which the said earl bore to his nephew, and for other considerations therein appearing, the said earl did thereby convey to the defendant all the real estate of him, the third earl, and all leaseholds and terms of years (if any) belonging to him, to hold the same to the defendant in fee simple, subject, nevertheless as to the parts of the property charged therewith to the payment of the said annuities and to the mortgages affecting the same to the use that the third Earl Grey should thenceforth during his life receive an annual rent-charge of £4,000, to be issuing out of the said hereditaments (other than such parts as the third Earl Grey was to occupy and enjoy under the trusts thereafter declared), and subject to this rent-charge all the hereditaments thereby conveyed were to be held in use of the defendant in fee simple, but as to the said mansion-house at Howick and the premises to be enjoyed therewith subject to the trusts thereafter contained, and as to the leaseholds, &c., for the whole term or interest of the said third earl therein. And it was also witnessed that the third Earl Grey did thereby assign unto the defendant all rents owing, and also all furniture and effects in or about the said mansion-house and premises at Howick, and all stock, crops, effects, and other the personal property of the third Earl Grey other than money at his bankers or elsewhere, and private papers, his wardrobe, and effects in his own personal use, to hold the premises thereby assigned to the defendant subject to the trusts in the deed for his own use. And it was declared that the mansion-house at Howick, together with the gardens, &c., as then occupied by the third earl should be held upon trust to permit him to occupy and enjoy the same during his life. And the defendant covenanted that he would (1) pay the annuities charged on the property; (2) pay the mortgage debt of £200,000 and other charges on the property; (3) pay to the said third Earl Grey the said annual rent-charge of £4,000; (4) at the cost of the defendant that he would keep the mansion-house and buildings at Howick insured, and maintain it in repair and manage the garden; (5) supply farm and garden produce; (6) pay at the death of the said earl his funeral and testamentary expenses; (7) retain unsold and farm certain lands at Howick. And it was provided that in the event of the defendant's dying in the lifetime of the third earl or of any breach by the defendant of any covenant that it should be lawful for the said third Earl Grey to revoke the deed, either wholly or in part, but save in the event aforesaid the deed was to be irrevocable, but any revocation under that power was to be without prejudice to the title of any purchaser or mortgagee from the defendant under a sale or mortgage made previously to such revocation. By an indenture, dated September 26, 1894, between the same parties the third Earl Grey, in consideration of £5,000, sold the rent-charge of £4,000 per annum. It released the covenant to retain unsold and to farm the lands near Howick, to the intent that the lands charged with the payment of the £4,000 per annum might be released, and the deed also did away with the power of revocation. The third Earl Grey died on October 9, 1894. The average net annual income of the property comprised in the deed was very considerably in excess of £4,000. The Crown claimed estate duty on the principal value of the whole of the property comprised in the said deed, as being property passing on the death of the said earl within section 1 and 2 (1) c. of the Finance Act, 1894, which incorporates section 38 of 44 and 45 Vict., c. 12, as amended by section 11 (1) of 52 Vict., c. 7. The defendant refused, contending that no such duty was payable, though he had paid duty in respect of the mansion-house and the effects therein.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL contended that the property in the case was property deemed to pass on the death of the third earl. Any property liable to pay account duty under 44 and 45 Vict., c. 12, section 38, as amended by 52 Vict., c. 7, section 11, was liable to pay estate duty. Here there was an interest in £4,000 a year for life issuing out of the estate other than the mansion-house. The power of revocation by the third earl under the deed was such that he might on the death of the defendant revoke the gift, which might have the effect of depriving the defendant's children of a benefit under the defendant's will. As to the deed of 1894, that was made only ten days before the death of the earl, and it could therefore make no difference.

MR. COZENS-HARDY said that quoad the £4,000 a year sold for the £5,000 under the deed of 1894, he could not in this Court combat the contention of the Crown, as he was bound by the case of "The Attorney-General v. Beech" (66 L.J., Q.B., 800). As to the other portion of the property, the defendant had assumed very onerous obligations. It was not a mere voluntary settlement. It would be an injustice to hold that the mere reservation of some interest should make the whole estate liable to be taxed. It would be just to levy a tax to the extent of the property in which there was an interest. As to the power of revocation, this was only a very limited power arising only on an event which was not at all likely to happen—namely, the death of Albert Grey in the life of the earl, or his failure to keep the covenants.

The COURT upheld the view put forward on behalf of the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said that the defendant had evidently improved the value of the estate by his management, and it did seem somewhat hard that he should have to pay tax on what might be looked on as his own improvements. But the Court could not detract from the language in the Act of Parliament, and it was the language of the Act that was hard. The statutes of 1881 and 1889 were meant to spread the net very wide and to include a great many gifts inter vivos. The deed in this case as drawn brought the case within the section. The agreement was meant for the benefit of the third earl. The defendant had to pay the income of £4,000 a year whether he received it from the estate or not. But there was a power of revocation. The earl even after the agreement had a substantial interest in the estate. If the defendant had died during the life of the earl, the defendant's will would not necessarily have had any effect in respect of the property. It could not be said that by the deed of 1885 the property was handed over to the defendant without reservation. The deed bristled with covenants and limitations. In the opinion of the learned Judge there was no ground for excluding the claim of the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. He thought that in this case an interest on the whole property had been reserved by the third earl, and there was a power of revocation with regard to the whole property. The £4,000 per annum was charged on all the property. It was not as though the property had been divided up and the annuity made chargeable in respect of a part only. He was inclined to think that that would have made a distinction, but as it was not so there must be judgment for the Crown.

WATSON (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) AND SANDIE AND HULL.*
Revenue—Income-tax—Trade exercised within the United Kingdom—Assessment of agent—
Income-tax Act, 1853, Sched. D—Income-tax Act, 1842, secs. 41, 44, 51, 106, 120, & 126.

This was a case stated at a meeting of the General Commissioners of Income-tax for the Division of Liverpool, held on June 22, 1896. Messrs. Sandie and Hull appealed against two assessments—viz., for £500 for the year ended April 5, 1895, and £1,000 for the year ended April 5, 1896, both assessments having been made on them as estimates of the annual profits alleged to have arisen from a trade exercised within the United Kingdom by the firm J. P. Squire and Co., of Boston, U.S.A., packers and provision merchants, under the following circumstances. Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. are packers, that is to say, they own or purchase live stock which they convert into provisions on their premises in Boston, U.S.A. The provisions thus manufactured were stated to be chiefly consumed in the United States, but the surplus is exported by Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. to this and other countries. Messrs. Sandie and Hull are commission agents carrying on business in Liverpool, and among the firms making consignments to them is that of Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co., who, at irregular intervals and in varying quantities, make consignments to them for sale on commission of lard and bacon, being a part of the surplus provisions exported by Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. as aforesaid. Messrs. Sandie and Hull do not receive any remuneration beyond the usual charge and commission. There is no agreement between them, and Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. may at any time, without notice, discontinue their consignments, but the mode of conducting the consignments that are made is that Messrs. J. P. Squire with each consignment send forward documents comprising consignment notes, showing in detail the amount drawn against each lot of goods making up the consignment. Bills of lading with the drafts attached are sent forward through a bank by the same mail. Messrs. Sandie and Hull take up the drafts and realize the goods. Sometimes the draft exceeds the prices realized, and sometimes the price realized exceeds the draft. The risk of profit or loss on the transaction rests with Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. Messrs. Sandie and Hull have full discretion as to the prices at which the goods are sold; they invoice the goods in their own name, receive the proceeds of sales, assume all responsibility of payment by the purchasers, and from time to time render statements to Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co., showing full receipts and debiting the said account with their charges and commission, and remitting to Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. the credit, or drawing upon them for the debit balance, as the case may be. Under these circumstances, Messrs. Sandie and Hull contended, first, that Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. were not persons exercising a trade within the United Kingdom, either within the terms of Schedule D, 16 and 17 Vict., c. 34, alone, or read with Section 41 of 5 and 6 Vict., c. 35; second, that they were not agents of Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. within the terms of Section 41 of 5 and 6 Vict., c. 35, and they further contended that, if they were agents, it was impossible for them to ascertain what profit, if any, Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. might make in respect of those portions of goods manufactured by them which were consigned to this country, and that they could not therefore, as agents, make any deduction in respect of income-tax. The surveyor referred to Sections 41 and 44 of the Income-tax Act of 1842, by which non-residents are made chargeable in the name of their agents for profits derived from sources in the United Kingdom, and the said agents are empowered to deduct duties paid out of moneys they have in hand belonging to such non-residents. He contended that as Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. actually transacted business in this country through their agents (Messrs. Sandie and Hull), the results of which must show either a profit or a loss, any profit from the said business was liable to be assessed, and that Messrs. Sandie and Hull as agents were responsible under section 41, above referred to, for doing all matters necessary for the making of proper assessments. As no accounts had been furnished showing that the estimates were incorrect, the surveyor submitted that the assessments should be confirmed. The Commissioners considered that the assessments should be discharged, and accordingly allowed the appeal, subject to the case. The questions for the Court were (1) whether Messrs. J. P. Squire and Co. exercised a trade within the United Kingdom; (2) whether Messrs. Sandie and Hull are the agents of Messrs. Squire and Co. within the meaning of section 41 of 5 and 6 Vict., c. 35; (3) whether Messrs. Sandie and Hull as such agents are liable to be assessed in respect of such trade.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr. Danckwerts with him), for the Crown, said the question was whether the contracts were made in this country. It was a different thing if the goods were sold outright from abroad. Here the goods were sent over and the contracts made in this country. He referred to Schedule D of the Income-tax Act, 1853, as to persons residing abroad having a trade exercised within the United Kingdom, and to the following sections of the Act of 1842:—Section 106, section 41, section 44, section 51, section 120, and section 126. A person not resident here, but carrying on business here by means of his agent, was chargeable. He cited "Erichsen v. Last" (8 Q.B.D., 414); "Tischler v. Apthorpe" (52 L.J., 814, 2 Tax Cas., 89); "Pommery v. Apthorpe" (35 W.R., 307, 2 Tax Cas., 182); "Werle v. Colquhoun" (20 Q.B.D., 753); "Grainger v. Gough" (1896, App. Cas., 325).

Mr. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C. (Mr. James Fox with him), contended that this case was not within any of the authorities cited. There was no privity of contract between Squire and Co. and the English purchaser. Sandie and Hull were taxable for their profits, but Squire and Co. were not, as they resided out of the country. It would upset the trade of the country if this contention were upheld. His view of the transaction was that Squire and Co. only made a contract with Sandie and Hull, and sold to them at a price which was afterwards determined by the result of Sandie and Hull's sale.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM dissented from the description of what the arrangement amounted to.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that at any rate the name of Squire was not mentioned in the contracts made in this country.

The COURT adopted the view in favour of the Crown and allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said that the argument of the counsel for the respondents was not supported by the facts. He had assumed that the property in the goods passed to Messrs. Sandie and Hull, but that did not appear to be so. They remained the goods of Messrs. Squire, though their name was not used. It was Messrs. Squire's business, and they came within the Act as trading within this country. This case was stronger than the cases cited. Here the goods were all actually in England before the contract of sale was entered into. In the other cases some of them, at any rate, were in foreign countries.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. This case came within the principle of the cases cited, and judgment should be given for the Crown.

IN RE GILBERT—EX PARTE GILBERT.*

Bankruptcy—Deceased insolvent—Administration of estate in bankruptcy—Retainer by executrix of assets.

This was an application by the executrix of a deceased insolvent, and raised a novel point of law. On September 2 last H. F. Gilbert, who was carrying on business in a small way as a clothier, died insolvent, having by his will appointed his wife his executrix. His only assets were the leasehold premises and stock-in-trade of the business and some book-debts, which were valued altogether at about £300. He owed his wife £870, and his other unsecured debts amounted to about £800. His widow proved the will at once and took possession of the business premises and stock-in-trade, got in a few of the book-debts, and proceeded to carry on the business on her own account and for her own benefit. Shortly afterwards a creditor of the deceased applied to her for particulars of the estate. She replied through her solicitor claiming her right as executrix to retain the whole of the assets in satisfaction of her debt. The creditor then presented a petition under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that the estate of the deceased insolvent might be administered in bankruptcy, and obtained the usual order, and a Mr. Nicholson became the trustee in bankruptcy. On October 12 Mr. Nicholson, under an order of the Court, took possession of the business premises and stock-in-trade. Thereupon Mrs. Gilbert now applied that the trustee in bankruptcy might be ordered to deliver up to her possession of the business premises and stock-in-trade, on the ground that they were her property. On behalf of the trustee it was contended that an executor's right of retainer—i.e., to pay himself, did not arise until he had realized the assets of the testator, and that he was not entitled to retain such assets in specie in payment of his debt.

Mr. Stevens appeared for the executrix; Mr. Carrington appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said it was curious that there was no direct authority on the point. It might very well be that where the assets of a testator exceeded in value the debt to the executor, the executor could not set up a right to retain in specie unless he had clearly appropriated certain of the assets of ascertained value in payment of his debt. But where the assets of a testator were manifestly much less in value than the debt due to the executor, he was not prepared, in the absence of authority, to hold that the executor could not retain the assets in specie in satisfaction of the debt, but was bound to realize the estate before he could pay himself. In the present case the executrix had clearly asserted her right to retain in specie before she received notice of the petition in bankruptcy. Under the circumstances, therefore, she was entitled to judgment.

ALLEN V. FLOOD.*

Action, Cause of—Inducing discharge of servant—Malice—Inducing to abstain from employing.

Where the defendant, by means which were not unlawful, induced a third person to do an act which was not unlawful, but was injurious to the plaintiff, Held, that an action would not lie (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Ashbourne, and Lord Morris dissenting).

Decision of the Court of Appeal (11 The Times L.R., 335, and [1895] 2 Q.B., 21) reversed.

Judgment was given in this trade union appeal, which has been twice argued before their Lordships. The litigation has been protracted over nearly three years—an unusual period in recent times—but not comparable to that over which the famous Mogul case, which was much cited during the present appeal, extended, for that lasted altogether more than five years. The trial before Mr. Justice Kennedy was in February, 1895, and judgment (11 The Times L.R., 276) was given in accordance with the findings of the jury in the following March. Within a month the case found itself in the Court of Appeal, which affirmed (11 The Times L.R., 335) the decision of the learned Judge of first instance. The appeal came before the Lords in the first instance in December, 1895, and was argued before the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris, Lord Shand, and Lord Davey. As there was a diversity of opinion among the noble and learned Lords, it was announced in December, 1896, that the appeal was to be reheard in the presence of certain of her Majesty's Judges; and on March 25, 1897, and the following days it was heard before a House strengthened by the addition of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and Lord James of Hereford and the members of the Bench who assembled to hear the arguments and to tender their advice, namely, Mr. Justice Hawkins, Mr. Justice Mathew, the late Mr. Justice Cave, Mr. Justice North, Mr. Justice Wills, Mr. Justice Grantham, Mr. Justice Lawrance, and Mr. Justice Wright. Six of the learned Judges thought the appeal should be dismissed, whilst two, Mr. Justice Mathew and Mr. Justice Wright were in favour of its allowance. It will be seen that the decision of their Lordships was the other way and that the appeal has been allowed by a majority of six to three. In the days when it was the rule rather than the exception in common law appeals to summon the Judges, the legal peers did not always adopt the views of the majority of the Judges. But probably no precedent exists in which their Lordships have overruled such a preponderance of judicial decision and opinion as existed in the present appeal. Four Judges below had unanimously been in favour of the respondents, and thus on this side, with the six assessor Judges and the dissenting minority of the Lords, there were 13; and on the other eight—six law Lords and two Judges.

The facts of the case were stated, with more or less of comment and inference, by several of their Lordships; but the following may be taken as a bare outline:—The respondents Flood and Taylor were workmen engaged by the day at the works of the Glengall Company. They were shipwrights doing wood work on a vessel called the Sam Weller. The company employed a far larger number of men doing iron work than of shipwrights; and there was a strong feeling against the respondents on the ground that they had previously, being shipwrights, done iron work for another firm. One of the iron men on April 12, 1894, telegraphed to the appellant, Allen, who was a delegate or official of the Boilermakers' Union, and he came to the dock and saw the man who had sent the telegram. This man, Elliott by name, told Allen that the men were talking of throwing down their tools at dinner-time. Allen warned Elliott to be careful, and said the men must not leave without the sanction of the union. Shortly afterwards the appellant saw Mr. Halkett, the managing director, to whom he showed the telegram, observing that the men felt aggrieved at having to work with Flood and Taylor, and that if these were continued on the job the iron men would leave off work or be called out. The two men were thereupon dismissed by Mr. Halkett and brought their action against Allen. At the trial Mr. Justice Kennedy, after stating that no case had been established of conspiracy or of coercion or intimidation, left two questions to the jury:—1. "Did Allen maliciously induce the company to discharge the plaintiffs?" 2. "Did Allen maliciously induce the company not to engage the plaintiffs?" The questions were answered adversely to the appellant, against whom damages was given. The question addressed to the Judges were:—"Assuming the evidence given by the plaintiff's witnesses to be correct, was there any evidence of a cause of action fit to be left to the jury?"

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Robson, Q.C. (with whom was Mr. E. Morten), argued for the appellants; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs were for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the facts and analyzing the evidence, said in the course of his judgment,—The first objection made to the plaintiffs' right to recover for the loss which they thus undoubtedly suffered is that no right of the plaintiffs was infringed, and that the right contended for on their behalf is not a right recognized by law, or at all events only such a right as that every one else is entitled to deprive them of if they stop short of physical violence or obstruction. I think the right to employ their labour as they will is a right both recognized by the law and sufficiently guarded by its provisions to make any undue interference with that right an actionable wrong. Very early authorities in the law have recognized the right, and in my view no authority can be found which questions or qualifies it. The schoolmaster who complained that his scholars were being assaulted and brought an action; the quarryowner who complained that his servants were being menaced and molested, were both held to have a right of action. And it appears to me that the importance of those cases, and the principle established by them, has not been sufficiently considered. It is said that threats of violence or of actual violence were unlawful means; the lawfulness of the means I will discuss hereafter. But on the point on which these cases are important is the existence of the right. It was not the schoolmaster who was assaulted, it was not the quarryowner who was assaulted or threatened; but, nevertheless, the schoolmaster was held entitled to bring an action in respect of the loss of scholars attending his school, and the quarryowner in respect of the loss of workmen to his quarry. They were third persons; no violence or threats were applied to them, and the cause of action, which they had a right to insist on, was the indirect effect upon themselves by violence and threats applied to others. In my view these are binding authorities to show that the preliminary question—namely, whether there was any right of the plaintiffs to pursue their calling unmolested must be answered in the affirmative. The question of what is the right invaded would seem to be reasonably answered, and the universality of the right to all her Majesty's subjects seems to me to be no argument against its existence. It is, indeed, part of that freedom from restraint, that liberty of action which, in my view, may be found to be running through the principles of our law. As I have said, I will deal separately both with the remedy for the infringement of that right, if it has been infringed, and with the means by which it is alleged to have been infringed. After a quotation from the language of Baron Bramwell in "Reg. v. Drutt and others" (10 Cox's Criminal Law Cases, page 600), the noble and learned Lord said:—"It is said, indeed, that an action for the infringement of such a right is a novelty; but I do not concur that it is, or that if it were it would be a sufficient argument. The whole history of the action upon the case from the 13 Edward I., c. 24, downwards affirms the principle that where cases fall under the same right and require a like remedy new precedents should be created. So in "Pasley v. Freeman" (3

T. B., 63), per Mr. Justice Ashhurst:—"Another argument which has been made use of is that this is a new case, and that there is no precedent for such an action. Where cases are new in their principle, there I admit that it is necessary to have recourse to legislative interposition in order to remedy the grievance; but where the case is only new in the instance, and the only question is upon the application of a principle recognized in the law of such new case, it will be just as competent to Courts of justice to apply the principle in any case that may arise two centuries hence as it was two centuries ago. If it were not so, we ought to blot out of our law-books one-fourth part of the cases that are to be found in them." It is said that the company were acting within their legal rights in discharging the plaintiffs. So they were, but does that affect the question of the responsibility of the person who caused them so to act by the means he used? The question must be whether what was done in fact, and what did in fact procure the dismissal of the plaintiff, was an actionable wrong or not. I have never heard that a man who was dismissed from his service by reason of some slander could not maintain an action against the slanderer because the master had a legal right to discharge him. In treating this question I can desire no more apt exposition of the law than what is contained in Lord Justice Bowen's admirably-reasoned judgment in the Mogul case in the Court of Appeal. "Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence, 'Tarleton v. M'Gawley' (Peak N.P.C., 270); the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing, 'Clifford v. Brandon' (2 Camp., 358), 'Gregory v. Brunswick' (6 Man. and Gr., 205); the disturbance of wildfowl in decoys by the firing of guns, 'Carrington v. Taylor' (11 East, 571) and 'Keeble v. Hickeringill' (11 East, 574 n.); the impeding or threatening servant or workmen, 'Garret v. Taylor' (Cro. Jac., 567); the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts, 'Bowen v. Hall' (6 Q.B.D., 333), 'Lumley v. Gye' (2 Ell. and Bl., 216), all are instances of such forbidden acts." It will be observed that in what Lord Justice Bowen says, if there be intimidation, obstruction, or molestation, or if there be intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other (always assuming that there is no just cause for it), are each of them, where damage has been caused, actionable wrongs. And so Sir William Erle, in a passage quoted by the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher), points out that "every person has a right under the law, as between himself and his fellow-subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description, done, not in the exercise of the actor's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction, would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition." The Lord Justice was too keen a reasoner not to observe that the words "without just cause or excuse," which he had used, required exposition to render his reasoning complete, and accordingly he explains in another part of his judgment what his view was of malice. His Lordship thus describes the state of mind which in his view would negative just cause or excuse. "Mogul Steamship Com- pany v. M'Gregor, Gow, and Co." (23 Q.B.D., p. 613). . . "Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a malicious wrong [see 'Bromage v. Prosser' (4 B. and Cr., 247); 'Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty, per Lord Blackburn' (7 App. Cases, 741 at p. 772)]." My Lords, I must for my own part disclaim the idea that you can get rid of observations such as these in the learned Judge's judgment by saying that they are obiter. Now it will be observed that Lord Justice Bowen points out that not only contractual rights are comprehended within his view, but other rights, such as the right to carry on the business of an actor and the like. In the same case, when appealed to this House, it appears to me that the principle upon which that decision was arrived at is an important one as excluding what is here suggested to be lawful. I myself asked in that case:—"What legal right is interfered with? What coercion of the mind or will or of the person is effected? All are free to trade upon what terms they will, and nothing has been done, except in rival trading, which can be supposed to interfere with the appellants' interests." Lord Watson pointed out that the withdrawal of agents at first appeared to him to be a matter attended with difficulty, but that on consideration he was satisfied that it could not be regarded as an illegal act. "In the first place, it was impossible that any honest man could impartially discharge his duty of finding freights to parties who occupied the hostile position of the appellants and respondents, and, in the second place, the respondents gave the agents the option of continuing to act for one or other of them in circumstances which placed the appellants at no disadvantage." And he added:—"That it had not been proved and not been suggested that the respondents used either misrepresentation or compulsion for the purpose of obtaining the object of their combination." And Lord Bramwell begins his judgment by saying that the plaintiffs in that case "did not complain of any trespass, violence, force, fraud, or breach of contract, nor of any direct tort or violation of any right of the plaintiffs, like the case of firing to frighten birds from a decoy; nor of any act, the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them." Lord Morris expressed his intention to adopt entirely the principles laid down by Lord Justice Bowen. Lord Field justifies his opinion, which he says may be supported upon the principles laid down in 'Keeble v. Hickeringill,' as to which I shall have a word to say hereafter. But he goes on to say that "everything that was done by the respondents was done in the exercise of their right to carry on their own trade, and was bona fide so done. There was not only no malice or indirect object in fact, but the existence of the right to exercise a lawful employment, in the pursuance of which the respondents acted, negatives the presumption of malice which arises when the purposed infliction of loss and injury upon another cannot be attributed to any legitimate cause, and is therefore presumably due to nothing but its obvious object of harm." And Lord Hannen says, "that he considered that a different case would have arisen if the evidence had shown that the object of the defendants was a malicious one—namely, to injure the plaintiff, whether they, the defendants, should be benefited or not." And he concludes his judgment by saying "that it appears to him that in that case there was nothing indicating an intention to injure the plaintiffs, except in so far as such injury would be the result of the defendants obtaining for themselves the benefits of the carrying trade, by giving better terms to customers than their rivals, the plaintiffs, were willing to offer." I have been careful to call attention to the opinions of the noble and learned Lords, not only because I think a use has been made of the decision in that case which is not justified by anything in the opinions delivered; but rather because I think that upon the principles I have indicated before that these opinions form a very considerable body of authority, that if the elements which each noble Lord in turn pointed out did not exist in that case had in fact existed, the decision would have been the other way. I do not think that the case of "Keeble v. Hickeringill" stands alone, though if it did, considering who decided it, and that certainly in later years it has been much quoted and commented on, and never until now, so far as I am aware, criticized or questioned, I should be quite content to rely upon the authority of so profound a lawyer as Sir John Holt, and such an expositor as he was of the spirit of freedom which runs through the English law, but it will be also observed that in this House Lords Bramwell and Field, and in the Court of Appeal Lord Justice Bowen, assume it to be good law. It is interesting to observe that that case has been recognized and acted upon in the American Courts, where these questions of capital and labour have not infrequently arisen. The noble and learned Lord then discussed several American cases:—"Walker v. Cronin" (107 Mass., 555), "Benton v. Pratt" (2 Wend., 385), "Rice v. Manley" (C.A., State of New York, 21 Sichels, 82) (66 N. Y.), "Bixby v. Dunlap" (22 Amer., 475), and "Angle v. Chicago, &c. Co." (44 Davis, Sup. Ct. U.S. 1; 151 U.S. Rep.). I now revert to that part of the case which I admit has to be carefully considered—whether in what the defendant did in order to procure the dismissal of the plaintiffs he came within any of the rules which have been laid down in the cases quoted. Now, to my mind, he was guilty of intimidation and coercion from that intimidation—though in using that phrase, "or intimidation," I am not using it in the technical sense which the statutes upon the subject have been construed to mean. I will explain in what sense I do understand the words, but in passing I must deprecate the language which has been used to minimize the effect of what Allen said. I observe it is described as "inconvenience." That is not how it is described by the witness. Edmonds, the foreman of the Glengall Company, thus described what would have been the effect upon the business of the firm. He said:—"They were rather busy just then with boilermakers; that they employed three times as many boilermakers as shipwrights; and if the boilermakers had knocked off work or struck, it would have stopped the business of the company altogether—entirely—at that time, and that it was a very serious matter to the firm, and that the discharge of the men was in order to prevent their having to stop their business." It seems to me very obvious to ask whether the threat to do that which will have such an effect as the witness described is a coercion of the will or not. The men were good workmen and of good character; they were working, even according to Allen's own view, at their own trade as shipwrights, but they had worked upon a former occasion for a different employer upon an iron ship. And now it is important to call attention to the exact question which was left to the jury. Mr. Justice Kennedy said:—"The question that I want you to answer is that, if you find he induced the Glengall Iron Company by the threat which is suggested by the plaintiffs of calling out all the men on strike" (observe the phrase used, "the threat suggested by the plaintiffs of calling out all the men on strike," and that that induced the Glengall Iron Company to discharge the plaintiffs, and yet it is to be said Allen's threat had nothing to do with the discharge of the plaintiffs), "and he continued in that course of conduct if there was any attempt to employ them again, did he do that with the malicious intention which I have endeavoured to explain—that is merely, not for the purpose of forwarding that which he believed to be his interest as a delegate of his union in the fair consideration of that interest, but for the purpose of injuring these plaintiffs and preventing them doing that which they were each of them entitled to do." It appears to me that that is a direction of which the defendants cannot complain, since it puts what is to my mind an alternative more favourable to them. In my view his belief that what he was doing was for his interest as a delegate of his union would not justify the doing of what he did do. It is alleged, and to my mind and to the mind of the jury proved, that the employers were compelled under pressure of the threats that he used to discharge the plaintiffs. I have not used the word "intimidated," because I observe the learned Judge says there was no intimidation in a legal sense. If what was meant by that was that there was no threat of violence to person or property, it is true; but the word "intimidation" is not always to be construed as it has been construed under 26 Geo. IV., c. 129. The construction of it in that statute flowed from the other words with which the word "intimidate" is associated; and if, instead of the word "intimidate," that which was held out as the inducement to dismiss the plaintiffs flow—that such a stoppage of the works should be occasioned as that the business of the company would seriously suffer, I should think that would be a thing which would be likely to produce fear from the consequences of the company retaining them in their employment, and a company which abstained from doing so by reason of that fear would justly be described as intimidated. But the objection made by the defendants appears to be that the word "malicious" adds nothing; that if the thing was lawful it was lawful absolutely; if it was not lawful it was unlawful—the addition of the word "malicious" can make no difference. The fallacy appears to me to reside in the assumption that everything must be absolutely lawful or absolutely unlawful. There are many things which may become lawful or unlawful according to circumstances. In a decision of this House it has undoubtedly been held that whatever a man's motives may be, he may dig into his own land and divert subterranean water which but for his so treating his own land might have reached his neighbour's land. But that is because the neighbour had no right to the flow of the subterranean water in that direction, and he had an absolute right to do what he would with his own property. But what analogy has such a case with the intentional inflicting of injury upon another person's property, reputation, or lawful occupation? To dig into one's own land under the circumstances stated requires no cause or excuse. He may act from mere caprice, but his right on his own land is absolute, so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others. But referring to Lord Justice Bowen's observation, which to my mind is exactly accurate, "in order to justify the intentional doing of that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage, another in that other person's property or trade" you must have some just cause or excuse. Now, the word "malicious" appears to me to negative just cause or excuse, and, without attempting an exhaustive exposition of the word itself, it appears to me that if I apply the language of Lord Justice Bowen it is enough to show that this was within the meaning of the law "malicious."

If the representative of the men had in good faith and without indirect motive pointed out the inconvenience that might result from having two sets of men working together on the same ship, whose views upon the particular question were so diverse that it would be inexpedient to bring them together, no one could have complained; but if his object was to punish the men belonging to another union because on some former occasion they had worked on an iron ship, it seems to me that the difference of motive may make the whole difference between the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what he did. I turn now to the course of the trial, which is important in more ways than one. It is manifest that both the form of the statement of claim and the evidence directed at the trial were intended to raise the question of the right of the Boilermakers' Union to use what I will call their union for the combined action against the individual plaintiffs who belonged to another union. The plaintiffs apparently proceeded upon the assumption that what was represented to them as having been said by Allen was said in his character of delegate of and speaking with the authority of the Boilermakers' Union, and accordingly the general secretary of this trade union and the chairman at the time of these transactions were both joined as defendants. Had they adopted or had been proved to authorize the course taken by Allen, a question would have arisen whether or not they were all three parties to a conspiracy. Whether that charge could have been maintained against them or not, I at present desire to say nothing. Such a question may arise again, and I wish to keep myself free to consider that question when it arises. But the chairman and the secretary of the union absolutely disclaimed any general or specific authority on the part of Allen either to threaten the employers or to withdraw the men. As to specific authority, the chairman proved that he had never heard of the dispute until he was served with the writ in the action. He says in terms that he never gave any authority to Mr. Allen to threaten employers to withdraw men from the work, and to do any such thing he regarded as a very serious matter for any delegate to take upon himself; and so far from adopting what Allen is sworn to have done, that the union would hunt the two men out of every employment where they were known to be because they had once worked on an iron ship, he emphatically denies the right of his union to do anything of the sort; he says in terms, "providing that the shipwright, after being at the ironwork, started in some other place, for instance, then I would say we have no right whatever to interfere with him unless we were then beginning ironwork again. If he started at woodwork we would not interfere with him in any other place." The learned counsel then puts a question to him (I think somewhat under a misapprehension as to what the learned Judge himself meant by a question he put), "You say that may depend on circumstances?" And his answer is, "I do not say they would in that instance, because in no instance have I ever known men interfering with him when he went to some other works and started his own particular work." My Lords, I think it is only just to the Boilermakers' Union to point out how emphatically and distinctly their authorized officers (chairman and general secretary) disclaimed any such practice or principle as that which Allen is sworn to have attributed to them, and accordingly no imputation or liability could properly be attributed to the Boilermakers' Union or their authorized officers; but does that relieve Allen from the consequences of what he did? If concerted collective action to enforce, by ruining the men's employment, the will of a large number of men upon a minority, whether the minority consists of a small or of a large number, be a cause of action where the actual damage is produced, it would seem to be a very singular result that the action of an individual who falsely assumes the character of representing a large body, uses the name of that large body to give force and support to the threat which he utters, and so produces the injury to the individual, or to the minority, could shield himself from responsibility by proving that the body whose power and influence he had falsely invoked as his supporters had given him no authority for his threats; so that, if they in truth authorized him, he and they might all have been responsible, while the false statement that he made, though acting upon the employer by some pressure because it was believed and producing the same mischief to the person against whom it was directed, could establish no cause of action against himself because it was false. I regret that I am compelled to differ so widely with some of your Lordships, but my difference is founded on the belief that in denying this plaintiff a remedy we are departing from the principles which have hitherto guided our Courts in the preservation of individual liberty to all. I am encouraged, however, by the consideration that the adverse views appear to me to overrule the views of most distinguished Judges, going back now for certainly 200 years, and that up to the period when this case reached your Lordships' House there was a unanimous consensus of opinion; and that of eight Judges who have given us the benefit of their opinions six have concurred in the judgments which your Lordships are now asked to overrule.

LORD WATSON in the course of his judgment, after stating the facts and dealing with the evidence, said,—Although the rule may be otherwise with regard to crimes, the law of England does not, according to my apprehension, take into account motive as constituting an element of civil wrong. Any invasion of the civil rights of another person is in itself a legal wrong, carrying with it liability to repair its necessary or natural consequences, in so far as these are injurious to the person whose right is infringed, whether the motive which prompted it be good, bad, or indifferent. But the existence of a bad motive, in the case of an act which is not in itself illegal, will not convert that act into a civil wrong, for which reparation is due. A wrongful act, done knowingly, and with a view to its injurious consequences, may, in the sense of law, be malicious; but such malice derives its essential character from the circumstance that the act done constitutes a violation of the law. There is a class of cases which have sometimes been referred to as evidencing that a bad motive may be an element in the composition of civil wrong; but in these cases the wrong must have its root in an act which the law generally regards as illegal, but excuses its perpetration in certain exceptional circumstances, from considerations of public policy. These are well known as cases of privilege, in which the protection which the law gives to an individual who is within the scope of these considerations consists in this, that he may with immunity commit an act which is a legal wrong, and but for his privilege would afford a good cause of action against him; all that is required in order to raise the privilege and entitle him to protection being that he shall act honestly in the discharge of some duty which the law recognizes, and shall not be prompted by a desire to injure the person who is affected by his act. Accordingly, in a suit brought by that person, it is necessary for him to prove an intent to injure in order to destroy the privilege of the defendant. But none of these cases tend to establish that an act which does not amount to a legal wrong, and therefore needs no protection, can have privilege attached to it, and still less that an act in itself lawful is converted into a legal wrong, if it was done from a bad motive. Lord Bowen (at that time Lord Justice Bowen), in the case of "Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor," laid it down that in order to constitute legal malice, the act done must, apart from bad motive, amount to a violation of law. The learned Judge, with his accustomed accuracy and felicity, said (23 Q.B.D., 612):—"We were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel to accept the position from which their argument started, that an action will lie if a man maliciously and wrongfully conducts himself so as to injure another in that other's trade. Obscurity resides in the language used to state this proposition. The terms 'maliciously,' 'wrongfully,' and 'injure,' are words which have accurate meanings well known to the law, but which also have a popular and less precise signification, into which it is necessary to see that the argument does not imperceptibly slide. An intent to 'injure' in strictness means more than an intent to harm. It connotes an attempt to do wrongful harm. 'Maliciously,' in like manner, means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful to the detriment of another. The term 'wrongful' imports in its term the infringement of some right." The words which I have quoted are in substantial agreement with the language used by Mr. Justice Bayley in "Bromage v. Prosser" (4 B. and C., 25), to the effect that, "malice in common acceptation means ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse." According to the learned Judge, in order to constitute legal malice, the act done must be wrongful, which plainly means an illegal act subjecting the doer in responsibility for its consequences, and the intentional doing of that wrongful act will make it a malicious wrong in the sense of law. Whilst it is true that no act in itself lawful requires an excuse, it is equally true that some acts in themselves illegal admit of a legal excuse, and it is to these that Mr. Justice Bayley obviously refers. The root of the principle is that, in any legal question, malice depends, not upon evil motive which influenced the mind of the actor, but upon the illegal character of the act which he contemplated and committed. In my opinion it is alike consistent with reason and common sense that when the act done is, apart from the feelings which prompted it, legal, the civil law ought to take no cognizance of its motive. It does not appear to me to admit of doubt that the jury, in finding the action of the company to have been maliciously induced by the appellant, simply meant to affirm that the appellant was influenced by a bad motive—namely, an intention to injure the respondents in their trade or calling of shipwrights. At the trial, the case for the plaintiffs was conducted, and was submitted to the jury by the learned Judge who presided, upon the lines laid down by the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices Lopes and Smith in "Temperton v. Russell" (1893, 1 Q.B.D., 715). When the present case was before the Appeal Court the same doctrine was repeated by the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Lopes, and was expounded at great length by Lord Esher. Lord Justice Rigby deferred to, but did not express his concurrence in, the authority of "Temperton v. Russell," which he accepted as binding upon him. I do not dispute that the law laid down in this case by the presiding Judge, and upheld by the Court of Appeal, would justify the verdict of the jury. It simply comes to this—that to induce another person to commit an act which is within his legal right does not in itself afford a cause of action, but that the person who procures his action is guilty of a legal wrong if he was actuated by an intent to injure, and is liable in reparation to those against whom his evil intent was directed. Whether mere

"persuasion" or mere "advice" entails liability on the person using them appears to me to be a speculation which it would be unprofitable to discuss, and I shall therefore assume that the words refer to the means used by a person who, in the sense of law, "procures" the act of another. A breach of contract is in itself a legal wrong; and in "Lumley v. Gye" (2 E. and B., 216) it was said by Mr. Justice (afterwards Chief Justice) Erle:—"It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong." In the same case it was held by the majority of the learned Judges that the defendant was liable in damages, upon the express ground that, in knowingly procuring an illegal act, he had committed a wrong which the law regards as malicious. They regarded malice as signifying, in law, not that the defendant had been actuated by a bad motive, but that he had procured the commission of an act which he knew to be illegal. There are, in my opinion, two grounds only upon which a person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for its consequences. In the first place, he will incur liability if he knowingly, and for his own ends, induces that other person to commit an actionable wrong. In the second place, when the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor, and is therefore not wrongful in so far as he is concerned, it may yet be to the detriment of a third party, and in that case, according to the law laid down by the majority in "Lumley v. Gye," the inducer may be held liable if he can be shown to have procured his object by the use of illegal means directed against that third party. The doctrine laid down by the Court of Appeal, in this case, and in "Temperton v. Russell," with regard to the efficacy of evil motives in making—to use the words of Lord Esher—"that unlawful which would otherwise be lawful," is stated in wide and comprehensive terms; but the majority of the consulted Judges who approve of the doctrine have only dealt with it as applying to cases of interference with a man's trade or employment. Even in that more limited application it would lead, in some cases, to singular results. One who committed an act not in itself illegal, but attended with consequences detrimental to several other persons, would incur liability to those of them whom it was proved that he intended to injure, and the rest of them would have no remedy. A master who dismissed a servant engaged from day to day, or whose contract of service had expired, and declined to give him further employment because he disliked the man, and desired to punish him, would be liable in an action for tort. And ex pari ratione a servant would be liable in damages to a master whom he disliked if he left his situation at the expiry of his engagement and declined to be re-engaged, in the knowledge and with the intent that the master would be put to considerable inconvenience, expense, and loss before he could provide a substitute. If that be the state of the law it is somewhat remarkable that there is no case to be found in the books of any such action having been sustained. The authority which is mainly relied on as supporting the doctrine of the recent cases is "Keeble v. Hickeringill" (11 East, p. 576, note), which was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench about two centuries ago. I am very far from suggesting that the antiquity of a decision furnishes a good objection to its weight, but it is a circumstance which certainly invites and requires careful consideration, unless the decision is directly in point, and its principle has since been recognized and acted upon. A variety of well-known cases, including even "Lumley v. Gye" (2 E. and B., 216) were relied on by the respondents as showing that the so-called principle of "Keeble v. Hickeringill" has been from time to time applied by the English Courts since the date of that judgment. Except in the case of "Carrington v. Taylor," which I have already noticed, I have been unable to discover in these authorities, which I do not consider it necessary to examine in detail, any trace of the doctrine for which the respondents contend, until recent years, when it is first dimly foreshadowed in a dictum which occurs in "Bowen v. Hall" (6 Q.B.D., 333), and is subsequently developed in "Temperton v. Russell" and in the present case. The authorities antecedent to "Rowen v. Hall," as well as that decision itself, are all cases belonging to one or other of these three classes: (1) cases of privilege, where the perpetrator of an act which per se constituted a legal wrong, was protected from its usual consequences, in the event of its being proved that he was actuated by an honest desire to fulfil a public or private duty; (2) cases in which the act complained of was in itself a plain violation of private right; and (3) cases in which an act detrimental to others, but affording no remedy against the immediate actor, had been procured by illegal means. After discussing several other cases the noble and learned Lord proceeded:—"Lumley v. Gye" is a weighty authority in this branch of the law, but it does not lend any aid to the respondent's argument. It was an action of damages against a defendant who had induced a professional singer to break her engagement with the plaintiff, to his detriment, and it was resisted mainly upon the ground that the engagement broken did not constitute the relationship of master and servant between the contracting parties. That plea was over-ruled, and the defendant found liable. The principle of the decision (from which Coleridge, J., alone dissented) was clearly explained by Mr. Justice (afterwards C.J.) Erle, whose opinion is in complete accordance with the views expressed by the other learned Judges who constituted the majority of the Court. He said:—"The authorities are numerous and uniform that an action will lie against a person who procures that a servant should unlawfully leave his service. The principle involved in these cases comprises the present, for there the right of action in the matter arises from the wrongful act of the defendant in procuring that the person hired should break his contract, by putting an end to the relation of employer and employed, and the present case is the same." The learned Judge went on to say, in language which I have already referred to:—"It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong." These statements embody an intelligible and a salutary principle, and they contain a full explanation of the law upon which the case was decided. He who wilfully induces another to do an unlawful act, which, but for his persuasion, would or might never have been committed is rightly held to be responsible for the wrong which he procured. None of the learned Judges made any reference to the case of "Keeble v. Hetherington," and not a single expression is to be found in their opinions, tending to suggest that an injurious motive can impart a wrongful character either to a lawful act or to its procurement by means which are not in themselves illegal. In "Bowen v. Hall" (1840, 6 Q.B.D., 333) the wrong complained of was the intentional inducing of a breach of contract to the detriment of the plaintiff, who was obviously entitled to succeed if "Lumley v. Gye" had been well decided. According to the opinion expressed by C. J. Erle and the other Judges of the majority in that case, the defendant in "Bowen v. Hall" had been guilty of a wrong which was in the sense of law malicious, because he had knowingly procured the commission of an illegal act. The judgment in "Lumley v. Gye" was followed by Earl Selborne and by Lord Esher (at that time Lord Justice Brett), whilst C. J. Coleridge adhered to the opposite view, which had been taken by Mr. Justice Coleridge. Lord Esher, in delivering the judgment of Earl Selborne and himself, substantially affirms the reasoning of the majority in "Lumley v. Gye," but there are one or two sentences in his judgment relating to points with which the learned Judges who decided that case did not deal, and which were not raised by the facts either of "Lumley v. Gye" or of the case before him. His Lordship said, "Merely to persuade a man to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact as in the second case put by Coleridge, J. But if the persuasion he used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act which is in law or in fact a wrong act, and, therefore, a wrongful act, and, therefore, an objectionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact." These words are obviously susceptible of two very different constructions, according as they are understood to refer to the procurement of an act which is in violation of the law, and therefore a legal wrong, or to the procurement of a lawful act. Prima facie, they would have appeared to me to refer to the procuring of an illegal act, because the assumption upon which the whole passage is framed is that there has been successful persuasion to break a contract, which is an undoubted violation of the law; and in that case there would be a malicious wrong as it is defined in "Lumley v. Gye." But the words have now been explained by their author to mean, not merely that the procuring of an unlawful act with intent to injure is a malicious wrong, giving a good cause of action, but that the presence of injurious intent in the mind of the procurer gives a good cause of action, although the act procured is in itself lawful. In that aspect of them the words can only be regarded as obiter dicta, because no such question was raised by the circumstances of the case. I am quite alive to the fact that the question which we have to decide is one of importance, and also that it has never been previously considered by this House. Having come to the conclusion with the majority of your Lordships who have heard the appeal that the doctrine advanced by the respondents is neither sound in principle nor supported by authority, I move that the orders appealed from be reversed and judgment entered for the appellant, that the appellant have his costs of this appeal, and costs in both Courts below, including the costs of the trial.

The judgment of LORD ASHBORNE was read in his absence by Lord Morris, and was in concurrence with that of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD HERSHELL, in the course of his judgment, after stating the facts, said,—The question is whether the findings of the jury entitled the plaintiffs to judgment. After a careful and prolonged consideration of the arguments addressed to your Lordships when the case was first presented at the bar of this House, I arrived at the conclusion that the question must be answered in the negative. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the company in declining to employ the plaintiffs were violating no contract; they were doing nothing wrongful in the eye of the law. The course which they took was dictated by self-interest; they were anxious to avoid the inconvenience to their business which would ensue from a cessation of work on behalf of the ironworkers. It was not contended at the bar that merely to induce them to take this course would constitute a legal wrong, but it was said to do so because the person inducing them acted maliciously. The Master of the Rolls declined in the present case to define what was meant by "maliciously"; he considered this a question to be determined by a jury. But if acts are, or are not, unlawful and actionable, according as this element of malice be present or absent, I think it is essential to determine what is meant by it. I can imagine no greater danger to the community than that a jury should be at liberty to impose the penalty of paying damages for acts which are otherwise lawful because they choose, without any legal definition of the term, to say that they are malicious. No one would know what his rights were. The result would be to put all our actions at the mercy of a particular tribunal whose view of their propriety might differ from our own. However malice may be defined, if motive be an ingredient of it, my sense of the danger would not be diminished. The danger is, I think, emphasized by the opinions of some of the learned Judges. In a case to which I shall allude immediately, the Master of the Rolls included within his definition of malicious acts persuasion used for the purpose "of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff." Mr. Justice Wills thinks this "going a great deal too far," and that whether the act complained of was malicious depends upon whether the defendant has, in pursuing his own interests, "done so by such means and with such a disregard of his neighbour as no honest and fair-minded man ought to resort to." Here it will be seen that malice is not made dependent on motive. The assumed motive is a legitimate one, the pursuit of one's own interest. The malice depends on the means used and the disregard of one's neighbour, and the test of its existence is whether these are such as no honest and fair-minded man ought to resort to. There is here room for infinite differences of opinion. Some, I daresay, applying this test, would consider that a strike by workmen at a time damaging to the employer or a "lock-out" by an employer at a time of special hardship to the workmen were such means and exhibited such a disregard of his neighbour as an honest and fair-minded man ought not to resort to. Others would be of the contrary opinion. The truth is this suggested test makes men's responsibility for their actions depend on the fluctuating opinions of the tribunal before whom the case may chance to come as to what a right-minded man ought or ought not to do in pursuing his own interests. Again, the late Mr. Justice Cave (whom I cannot name without deploring his loss) expressed the view that the action of the appellant might have been justified on the principles of trade competition if it had been confined to the time when the men were doing ironwork, but that it "was without just cause or excuse, and consequently malicious," inasmuch as the respondents were not at the time engaged upon ironwork. On the other hand it is evident, from the reasoning of some of the learned Judges who think the respondents entitled to succeed, that they would not be prepared to adopt this distinction, and would regard the act as "malicious" in either case. The present case was treated in the Court below as governed practically by the previous decisions of the same Court in "Bowen v. Hall" and "Temperton v. Russell." The former of these cases was an action brought against the defendant for maliciously inducing a person who had entered into a contract of service with the plaintiff to break that contract. It raised, for the first time in the Court of Appeal, the question whether "Lumley v. Gye" was rightly decided. The Master of the Rolls delivered the judgment of the Court, in which the late Lord Selborne concurred, the late Lord Chief Justice dissenting. The law was thus laid down in the judgment of the majority of the Court:—"Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact as in the second case put by Coleridge, J. But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and, therefore, a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact." This case was followed, and the view of the law thus expressed was reasserted by the Master of the Rolls in "Temperton v. Russell." It will be seen that "malicious" is here defined as the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff. It is said that a malicious act thus defined is, in law and in fact, a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act. I am not sure that I quite understand what is meant by saying that it is "in fact" a wrong act, as distinguished from its being so in "in law," and that because so wrong it is therefore wrongful. I can only understand it as meaning that it is an act morally wrong. The law certainly does not profess to treat as a legal wrong every act which may be disapproved of in point of morality; but, further, I cannot agree that all persuasion where the object is to benefit the person who uses the persuasion at the expense of another is morally wrong. Numberless instances might be put in which such persuasion, which is of constant occurrence in the affairs of life, would not be regarded by any one as reprehensible. The judgment is grounded almost wholly upon the presence of this element, that the purpose of the inducement is to injure the plaintiff or to benefit the defendant at his expense. The fact that the act which is induced by the persuasion is the breach of a contract with the plaintiff is treated as a subordinate matter, which without this element would not be a wrong act, or an act wrongful, and therefore actionable. The motive of the person who did the act complained of was thus treated as the gist of the action. In "Temperton v. Russell," the further step was taken by the majority of the Court—A. L. Smith, L. J., reserving his opinion on the point—of asserting that it was immaterial that the act induced was not the breach of a contract, but only the not entering into a contract, provided that the motive of desiring to injure the plaintiff, or to benefit the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, was present. It seems to have been regarded as only a small step from the one decision to the other, and it was said that there seemed to be no good reason why, if an action lay for maliciously inducing a breach of contract, it should not equally lie for maliciously inducing a person not to enter into a contract. So far from thinking it a small step from the one decision to the other, I think there is a chasm between them. The reason for a distinction between the two cases appears to me to be this; that in the one case the Act procured was the violation of a legal right, for which the person doing the act which injured the plaintiff could be sued, as well as the person who procured it, whilst in the other case no legal right was violated by the person who did the act from which the plaintiff suffered, he would not be liable to be sued in respect of the act done, whilst the person who induced him to do the act would be liable to an action. I think this was an entirely new departure. A study of the case of "Lumley v. Gye" has satisfied me that in that case the majority of the Court regarded the circumstance that what the defendant procured was a breach of contract as the essence of the cause of action. It is true that the word "maliciously" was to be found in the declaration the validity of which was then under consideration, but I do not think the learned Judges regarded the allegation as involving the necessity of proving an evil motive on the part of the defondant, but merely as implying that the defendant had wilfully and knowingly procured a breach of contract. It is certainly a general rule of our law that an act prima facie lawful is not unlawful and actionable on account of the motive which dictated it. I put aside the case of conspiracy, which is anomalous in more than one respect. It has recently been held in the House, in the case of "The Mayor of Bradford v. Pickles," that acts done by the defendant upon his own land were not actionable when they were within his legal rights, even though his motive were to prejudice his neighbour. The language of the noble and learned Lords was distinct. The Lord Chancellor said,—“This is not a case where the state of mind of the person doing the act can affect the right. If it was a lawful act, however ill the motive might be, he had a right to do it. If it was an unlawful act, however good the motive might be, he would have no right to do it.” The statement was confined to the class of cases then before the House, but I apprehend that what was said is not applicable only to rights of property, but is equally applicable to the exercise by an individual of his other rights. The question raised by the decision under appeal is one of vast importance and wide-reaching consequences. In "Temperton v. Russell" it was held that the principle of "Lumley v. Gye" and "Bowen v. Hall" was not confined to breaches of contract of service, but applied to breaches of any contract. The law laid down in "Bowen v. Hall" in terms applies to all contracts, and I quite agree that the nature of the contract can make no difference. If the judgment under appeal is to stand, and the fact that the act procured was unlawful as being a breach of contract be immaterial, it follows that every person who persuades another not to enter into any contract with a third person may be sued by that third person if the object were to benefit himself at the expense of such person. I understood it to be admitted at the Bar, and it was indeed stated by one of the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal, that it would have been perfectly lawful for all the ironworkers to leave their employment and not to accept a subsequent engagement to work in the company of the plaintiffs. At all events, I cannot doubt that this would have been so. I cannot doubt either that the appellant or the authorities of the union would equally have acted within his or their rights if he or they had "called the men out." They were members of the union. It was for them to determine whether they would become so or not, and whether they would follow or not follow the instructions of its authorities, though no doubt if they had refused to obey any instructions which under the rules of the union it was competent for the authorities to give, they might have lost the benefits they derived from membership. It is not for your Lordships to express any opinion on the policy of trade unions, membership of which may undoubtedly influence the action of those who have joined them. They are now recognized by law; there are combinations of employers as well as of employed. The members of these unions, of whichever class they are composed, act in the interest of their class. If they resort to unlawful acts they may be indicted or sued. If they do not resort to unlawful acts they are entitled to further their interests in the manner which seems to them best and most likely to be effectual. I now proceed to consider on principle the proposition advanced by the respondents, the alleged authorities for which I have been discussing. I do not doubt that every one has a right to pursue his trade or employment without "molestation" or "obstruction" if those terms are used to imply some act in itself wrongful. This is only a branch of a much wider proposition—namely, that every one has a right to do any lawful act he pleases without molestation or obstruction. If it be intended to assert that an act not otherwise wrongful always becomes so if it interferes with another's trade or employment, and needs to be excused or justified, I say that such a proposition in my opinion has no solid foundation in reason to rest upon. A man's right not to work or not to pursue a particular trade or calling, or to determine when or where or with whom he will work, is in law a right of precisely the same nature and entitled to just the same protection as a man's right to trade or work. They are but examples of that wider right of which I have already spoken. That wider right embraces also the right of free speech. A man has a right to say what he pleases, to induce, to advise, to exhort, to command, provided he does not slander or deceive or commit any other of the wrongs known to the law of which speech may be the medium. Unless he is thus shown to have abused his right, why is he to be called upon to excuse or justify himself because his words may interfere with some one else in his calling? In the course of the argument one of your Lordships asked the learned counsel for the respondents whether, if a butler on account of a quarrel with the cook, told his master that he would quit his service if the cook remained in it, and the master preferring to keep the butler terminated his contract with the cook, the latter could maintain an action against the butler. One of the learned Judges answers this question without hesitation in the affirmative. As in his opinion the present action would lie, I think he was logical in giving this answer. But why, I ask, was not the butler in the supposed case entitled to make his continuing in the employment conditional on the cook ceasing to be employed? And, if so, why was he not entitled to state the terms on which alone he would remain, and thus give the employer his choice? Suppose after the quarrel each of the servants made the termination of the contract with the other a condition of remaining in the master's service, and he chose to retain one of them, would this choice of his give the one parted with a good cause of action against the other? In my opinion a man cannot be called upon to justify either act or word merely because it interferes with another's trade or calling, any more than he is bound to justify or excuse his act or word under any other circumstances, unless it be shown to be in its nature wrongful, and thus to require justification. The notion that there may be a difference in this respect between acts affecting trade or employment and other acts seems to be largely founded on certain dicta of Lord Justice Bowen in the case of the "Mogul Steamship Company." It must be remembered that these were mere obiter dicta, for the decision was that the defendants were not liable. The passage perhaps chiefly relied upon is the following:—"Now intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does in fact damage, another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a malicious wrong." It will be noted that the learned Judge here makes no distinction between acts which interfere with property and those which interfere with trade. For the purpose then in hand, the statement of the law may be accurate enough, but if it means that a man is bound in law to justify or excuse every wilful act which may damage another in his property or trade, then I say, with all respect, the proposition is far too wide, everything depends on the nature of the act, and whether it is wrongful or not. Whatever may be the effect of the dicta of some of the Judges in the case of "The Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor," I regard it as an authority supporting the appellant's case. Certain owners of ships formed an association with the object of securing to themselves exclusively a particular carrying trade. They allowed a rebate on the freights to all shippers who shipped only with members of the association. They also sent ships to ports where the plaintiffs were endeavouring to obtain cargoes, to carry at unremunerative rates, in order to secure the trade to themselves. A circular was sent by an agent of the defendants reminding shippers at a particular port that shipments for London by any of the plaintiffs' steamers at any of the ports in China would exclude the firm making the shipment from participation in the returns of freight, during the whole six-monthly period in which they had been made even though the firm elsewhere might have given exclusive support to the steamers of the combination. It was held by this House that the plaintiffs had no cause of action. This, too, be it observed, though the action was in respect of a conspiracy, what was done being in pursuance of a common course of action concerted by several ship-owners. In that case the very object of the defendants was to induce shippers to contract with them, and not to contract with the plaintiffs, and thus to benefit themselves at the expense of the plaintiffs, and to injure them by preventing them from getting a share of the carrying trade. Its express object was to molest and interfere with the plaintiffs in the exercise of their trade. It was said that this was held lawful because the law sanctions acts which are done in furtherance of trade competition. I do not think the decision rests on so narrow a basis, but rather on this, that the acts by which the competition was pursued were all lawful acts, that they were acts not in themselves wrongful, but a mere exercise of the right to contract with whom, and when, and under what circumstances and upon what conditions they pleased. I am aware of no ground for saying that competition is regarded with special favour by the law; at all events, I see no reason why it should be so regarded. A further point to which I have not yet alluded was raised by the junior counsel for the respondents on the first argument at the Bar. It was strenuously insisted upon by both learned counsel, on the occasion of the second argument. It was said that the appellant had been guilty of misrepresentation, which had induced the company to take the course they did. No such point is to be found suggested in the pleadings, no such point was raised at the trial or in the Court of First Instance, or until the junior counsel for the respondents addressed your Lordships. The jury were not asked whether there had been a misrepresentation, and have not found that this was the case. It is certainly not admitted by the appellant. Under these circumstances it would, in my opinion, be without justification and contrary to precedent for your Lordships to attach any weight to the point now. But I think it right to add that it does not seem to me to have been made good as a matter of fact. For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment should be reversed, and judgment entered in the action for the defendant with costs. I have only very recently had the opportunity of knowing the views entertained by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack with regard to this case. In consequence of them, I think it right to add the following observations. I am not behind my noble and learned friend in the desire to preserve individual liberty. But I think it is never in greater danger than when a tribunal is urged to restrict liberty of action because the manner in which it has been exercised in a particular instance may be distasteful. I am unable to regard as altogether accurate the statement of my noble and learned friend that up to the period when this case reached your Lordships' House there was a unanimous consensus of opinion. I think he has overlooked the following facts. When the Court of Appeal in "Bowen

v. Hall" held that an action lay for maliciously inducing another to break his contract, the late Lord Chief Justice, differing from his two colleagues, was of opinion that even in such a case an action could not be maintained. When in "Temperton v. Russell" Lord Esher and Lord Justice Lopes carried the doctrine further, and held that an action would lie for maliciously inducing another not to enter into a contract, Lord Justice A. L. Smith, notwithstanding the strong expression of opinion by those learned Judges, significantly reserved his own opinion on the point. And when in the present case Lord Esher and Lord Justice Lopes reaffirmed the opinions they had previously pronounced, Lord Justice Rigby only concurred in the judgment under appeal in deference to the opinions expressed in the previous case. In my opinion the conclusion at which I have arrived is not in conflict with any decision, or even with the pronounced opinions of any Judges except those enunciated in the recent cases now under review. On the contrary, I believe, with all deference to my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, that any other conclusion would run counter to principles of the common law which have been long well established.

LOED MACNAGHTEN stated the facts, and continued:— Even if I am wrong in my view of the evidence and the verdict; if the verdict amounts to a finding that Allen's conduct was malicious in every sense of the word, and that he procured the dismissal of Flood and Taylor—that is, that it was his act and conduct, and his act and conduct alone, which caused their dismissal—and if such a verdict were warranted by the evidence, I should still be of opinion that judgment was wrongly entered for the respondents. I do not think that there is any foundation in good sense or in authority for the proposition that a person who suffers loss by reason of another doing or not doing some act which that other is entitled to do or to abstain from doing at his own will and pleasure, whatever his real motive may be, has a remedy against a third person who by persuasion or some other means, not in itself unlawful, has brought about the act or omission from which the loss comes, even though it could be proved that such person was actuated by malice towards the plaintiff, and that his conduct if it could be inquired into was without justification or excuse. The case may be different where the act itself to which the loss is traceable involves some breach of contract or some breach of duty, and amounts to an interference with legal rights. There the immediate agent is liable, and it may well be that the person in the background who pulls the strings is liable too, though it is not necessary in the present case to express any opinion on that point. But if the immediate agent cannot be made liable, though he knows what he is about and what the consequences of his action will be, it is difficult to see on what principle a person less directly connected with the affair can be made responsible unless malice has the effect of converting an act not in itself illegal or improper into an actionable wrong. But if that is the effect of malice, why is the immediate agent to escape? Above all, why is he to escape when there is no one else to blame, and no one else answerable? And yet many cases may be put of harm done out of malice without any remedy being available at law. Suppose a man takes a transfer of debt with which he has no concern for the purpose of ruining the debtor, and then makes him bankrupt out of spite, and so intentionally causes him to lose some benefit under a will or settlement; suppose a man declines to give a servant a character because he is offended with the servant for leaving; suppose a person of position takes away his custom from a country tradesman in a small village merely to injure him on account of some fancied grievance not connected with their dealings in the way of buying and selling—no one, I think, would suggest that there could be any remedy at law in any of those cases. But suppose a customer, not content with taking away his own custom, says something not slanderous or otherwise actionable or even improper in itself to induce others not to employ the tradesman any more. Neither one nor the other is liable for taking away his own custom, nor is he liable for withdrawing his. Is it possible that the one can be made liable for inducing the others not to employ the person against whom he has a grudge? If so a fashionable dressmaker might now and then, I fancy, be plaintiff in a very interesting suit. The truth is that questions of this sort belong to the province of morals rather than to the province of law. Against spite and malice the best safeguards are to be found in self-interest and public opinion. Much more harm than good would be done by encouraging or permitting inquiries into motives when the immediate act alleged to have caused the loss for which redress is sought is in itself innocent or neutral in character and one which anybody may do or leave undone without fear of legal consequences. Such an inquisition would, I think, be intolerable, to say nothing of the probability of injustice being done by juries in a class of cases in which there would be ample room for speculation and wide scope for prejudice. As regards authority, there is, I think, very little to be said. It is hardly necessary to go further back than "Lumley v. Gye" in 1853. There is not much help to be found in the earlier cases that were cited at the Bar, not even I think in the great case about frightening ducks in a decoy, whatever the true explanation of that decision may be. In "Lumley v. Gye" it was held that an action would lie for procuring a person to break a contract for personal service. The subsequent cases of "Bowen v. Hall" and "Temperton v. Russell" are authorities for the proposition that the principle is not confined to contracts for personal service. There is no doubt much to be said for that proposition. But the judgment under appeal does not depend on "Lumley v. Gye," or on any decision before or after that case. It rests only on certain dicta, to be found first in "Bowen v. Hall," and afterwards repeated in "Temperton v. Russell." Those dicta are of great weight, owing to the eminence of the Judge by whom they were pronounced, but they certainly were not necessary for the decision in either case. "Lumley v. Gye" was heard on demurrer. The counts which were demurred to alleged that the defendant knew "the premises," that is, the existence of the contract stated in the declaration, and was "maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff." Mr. Willes, for the defendant, in reply, pointing out that malice was never averred in actions for seducing servants, argued that "the averment of malice can make no difference": and that seems to have been the opinion of the majority of the Court, who thought the action would lie. Crompton, J., treats the allegation of malice as meaning nothing more than the allegation of notice, and Erle, J., indicates that the principle on which the action is to be rested is that "the procurement of the violation of the right"—that is, the plaintiff's right under the contract—"is a cause of action." If so, it would seem to follow that, provided the violation is committed knowingly, it cannot matter whether the thing is done maliciously or not. And, therefore, with all deference to the opinion of Blackburn, J., who, if I rightly understand his words in "Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks" (L.R., 10 Q.B., 453), seems to say that "malicious intention" was the gist of the action, I should be disposed to hold that, if a right has been knowingly violated, an allegation of malice is superfluous, and that if there has been no violation of any right, malice by itself is not a cause of action. I cannot, therefore, agree with the late Master of the Rolls in thinking that the act complained of was "wrongful," because it was "malicious," and that if there be a malicious act, and loss resulting from that act, it does not matter whether there has been a violation of right or not. In order to prevent any possible misconstruction of the language I have used, I should like to add that, in my opinion, the decision of this case can have no bearing on any case which involves the element of oppressive combination. The vice of that form of terrorism commonly known by the name of "boycotting," and other examples of oppressive combination seems to depend on considerations which are, I think, in the present case conspicuously absent. I am of opinion that judgment should be entered for the appellant.

LORD MORRIS read a judgment in agreement with that of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD SHAND.—I am of opinion that the judgment complained of should be reversed and judgment entered for the defendant with costs. Certain facts have, with reference to the evidence and the verdict of the jury, been clearly established. (1) It is clear that the plaintiffs had no contract with their employers, the Glengall Iron Company, entitling them to continuous employment. They were engaged to work by the day, entitled to leave the employment at the end of each day, and, on the other hand, subject to the risk that their employers might at any time cease to employ them further. While this was so, it is, however, to be observed that it is matter of clear inference, and, indeed, of some direct evidence, that the employment would have gone on for some time longer than it did if the employers had not been induced to discontinue it. (2) It is, in my opinion, further clear that the employment was discontinued by the employers, the Glengall Iron Company, because of the representations made to them by the defendant Allen. This has, I think, been proved, and, indeed, has been expressly affirmed by the verdict of the jury. There is no real controversy as to the statement or representation made by the defendant which induced the employers to discontinue the plaintiffs' services. The defendant, in effect, stated that if the plaintiffs were continued as workers, even at woodwork only, on the vessel then in the course of being repaired, the boilermakers then engaged at the ironwork on the ship would cease work, and so put a stop to the completion of the repairs. Coming now directly to the merits of the question in controversy in the case the argument of the plaintiffs and the reasons for the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges seem to me to fail because, although it is no doubt true that the plaintiffs were entitled to pursue their trade as workmen "without hindrance," their right to do so was qualified by an equal right, and indeed the same right, on the part of other workmen. The hindrance must not be of an unlawful character. It must not be by unlawful action. Amongst the rights of all workmen is the right of competition. In the like manner, and to the same extent as a workman has a right to pursue his work or labour without hindrance, a trader has a right to trade without hindrance. That right is subject to the right of others to trade also, and to subject him to competition—competition which is in itself lawful, and which cannot be complained of where no unlawful means (in the sense I have already explained) have been employed. The matter has been settled in so far as competition in trade is concerned by the judgment of this House in the case of the "Mogul Steamship Company" (1862, Appeal Cases, 25). I can see no reason for saying that a different principle should apply to competition in labour. In the course of such competition, and with a view to secure an advantage to himself, I can find no reason for saying that a workman is not within his legal rights in resolving that he will decline to work in the same employment with certain other persons, and in intimating that resolution to his employers. It is further to be observed, distinguishing the case from one in which a contract might have subsisted between the plaintiffs and their employers for a definite period, or for the work it might be on a particular ship until the whole was completed, in which case the refusal to continue to give the work would be a breach of contract on the employers' part—that there was here no such breach of contract. The employers' act in dispensing with the services of the plaintiffs at the end of any day was a lawful act on their part. The defendant induced them only to do what they were entitled to do, and in the absence of any fraud or other unlawful means used to bring this about, the action fails. My noble and learned friends, Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten, have reserved their opinions as to the law applicable to a case in which the ground of action is that the defendant had induced an employer to commit a breach of contract, as in the cases of "Lumley v. Gye," "Bowen v. Hall," and the first branch of "Temperton v. Russell." I desire also to reserve my opinion as to that case. The person who has committed a breach of contract is, of course, liable in damages in consequence. If it has not yet been decided by this House that a third party who had, without the use of fraud or other unlawful means, induced the contracting party to break his contract himself thereby incurs liability in damages, the question seems to me worthy of full discussion and consideration. The proper and usual application of the maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se in cases in which a wrongful act has been performed is to hold the person who has committed the wrong—i.e., in the case supposed the person who has broken his contract, liable, although his act has been done through another acting for him, and it is at least open to consideration whether the maxim would apply to one who is not himself the wrongdoer, committing a breach of contract, but only persuades or induces another to do so. I have little, if anything, to add to what I have already said as giving my reasons or grounds of judgment. The case was not presented by the learned Judge to the jury as one of conspiracy, and does not raise any question of that kind. Combination of different persons in pursuit of a legitimate trade object occurred in the case of the Mogul Steam Ship Company, and was there held to be lawful. Combination for no such object, but in pursuit really of a malicious purpose to ruin or injure another would, I should say, be clearly unlawful, but this case raises no such question. As to the older authorities referred to in the argument I agree in the views of my noble and learned friends, Lord Herschell and Lord Watson, and I agree in thinking with them and with my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten that "Lumley v. Gye" was not decided on any question of malice. It was urged by the counsel for the respondent that a disapproval of the law laid down in "Temperton v. Russell," and repeated in this case, will be attended with dangerous consequences as extending the power of trade unions or combinations beyond limits which these cases laid down, and I am not insensible to the truth of the observation that a certain amount of restraint which these cases introduced will be removed. But if that measure of restraint was not founded, as I believe it was not, on sound legal principle, it is only right that by legal decision in this Court of last resort it should be removed. And if the force of combination should be harshly or oppressively used, if it should be used in circumstances in which right-minded men would deplore its use, it must be observed that those against whom combination it is so employed have precisely the same liberty of action for resisting oppressive measures and for causing those who use them to desist from that course of action.

LORD DAVEY read a judgment to the same effect; and the judgment of LORD JAMES of HEREFORD also in favour of allowing the appeal was read by Lord Shand.

The orders appealed from were reversed and judgment entered for the appellant with costs in the House and in both Courts below, including the costs of the trial.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC V. THE VESTRY OF THE PARISHES OF ST. MARGARET AND ST. JOHN, WESTMINSTER.*

Rating—Rateability—Exemptions—"Society instituted for purposes of . . . the fine arts"—Royal College of Music—6 and 7 Vict., c. 36.

This was a special case, stated by order of a Judge, raising the question whether the Royal College of Music was exempt from rating under 6 and 7 Vict., c. 36. The Scientific Societies Act, 1843, provided by section 1 that no persons should be assessed or rated "in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts of houses or buildings, belonging to any society instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively, either as tenant or owner, and occupied by it for the transaction of its business and for carrying into effect its purposes, provided that such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions, and shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members."

Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the college; Mr. R. Cunningham Glen in support of the rate.

The Royal College of Music was incorporated by Royal charter May 23, 1883, and is governed by the charter and two amendments. The college and its affairs are carried on wholly in accordance with and for the purposes of the charter. The recitals on the charter state:—"The purposes for which the corporation is founded are—first, the advancement of the art of music by means of a central and examining body charged with the duty of providing musical instruction of the highest class and of rewarding with academical degrees and certificates of proficiency and otherwise persons whether educated or not at the college; secondly, the promotion and supervision of such musical instruction in schools and elsewhere as may be thought most conducive to the cultivation and dissemination of the art of music in the United Kingdom; and, lastly, generally the encouragement and promotion of the cultivation of music as an art throughout our dominions." At the college there were pupils, some of whom were scholars and exhibitors and others students. The college was not allowed to make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members. It was also provided that no graduate competing for, entitled to, or holding a Fellowship from or in the gift of the corporation shall, while he is competing for or entitled to or holds such Fellowship, be a member of the corporation. By the regulations it was provided that the buildings of the Royal College of Music should be used exclusively for the transaction of its business and the carrying into effect the purposes of the charter and the amendments to it. The building of the college is situated in Prince Consort-road, in the parish of St. Margaret, and is built upon land demised to the institution by indenture, dated December 30, 1891, by the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, for 999 years, at a nominal annual rent of £5. The lease provides for the erection of the college and its use solely for the purposes of the charter. The building was duly completed out of funds provided by private munificence, and was the subject of the rates now in question. The college was supported in part by annual voluntary subscriptions from a number of individuals and from the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, and an annual subscription from her Majesty out of a grant voluntarily voted to her Majesty by Parliament for that purpose. The revenue account of the college showed annual subscriptions £1,632, dividends and interest from investments of donations made to the college upon trust for scholarships, prizes, &c., £4,639; fees from pupils, £11,535; Government grant, £500, &c. It was stated that the fees from candidates and pupils were insufficient to defray the expenses of examinations and tuition, and teaching by the college was not carried on at a profit, or with a view of making a profit over and above the expenses. The college does not train either teachers or professional musicians or singers as such, having no course of instruction arranged with that view, but teaches the science and art of music in all its branches to all its pupils alike and imparts the same course of musical instruction to all. Without the annual voluntary contributions, the donations, and the dividends from invested funds the college could not meet its expenses. The college had not made, and did not make, any dividend, gift, division, or bonus on money unto or between any of its members.

Mr. DANCKWERTS contended that the buildings were exempt under the Act. Music was a fine art, the building was used for musical purposes only, and it was supported by annual voluntary subscriptions. He referred to "The Overseers of the Savoy v. Art Union, London" (1896, App. Ca., 296, at page 313), "Mayor of Manchester v. Molham" (1896, App. Ca., 500), "Reg. v. Institute of Civil Engineers" (5 Q.B.D., 48), "The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest" (15 App., 334), which, he said, minimized the authority of the last previous case, "Reg. v. Pocock" (8 Q.B., 729), "Reg. v. Overseers of Manchester" (16 Q.B., 449). By looking at the charter they would see that the purpose of the charter was the advancement of the art of music exclusively.

Mr. GLEN submitted that the Royal College of Music was not exempt. It was not devoted exclusively to propagating music as an art. The case of the Institute of Civil Engineers showed that it was not the purpose of the charter, but the mode on which an institution was carried out that the Courts looked at. "Reg. v. Grant" (16 Q.B.). The main source of income was the fees paid by persons whose object was their own advancement. The primary object of the society was the advantage of the pupils by education, many of whom became teachers of music afterwards. To teach how to teach was not a primary diffusion of art.

Mr. DANCKWERTS, in reply, said where there was an incorporated society the charter must be looked at; it was where there was no charter that the method of carrying out the society was the basis of decision. The college did not train teachers as such, though they did train people who subsequently might go out as teachers.

Mr. JUSTICE HAWKINS delivered an elaborate written judgment, and said the question was whether the Royal College of Music was exempt under the statute. He then referred at length to the section and the facts set out in the case. It was difficult, he said, to imagine anything which could be better described as being instituted for the purpose of the fine arts exclusively than the Royal College of Music. The building had been exclusively used for the purposes of the college. The proviso in the section that no bonus was to be paid to members had been fulfilled. The College of Music was supported partly by voluntary subscriptions. It was true that the sum of £1,632 given as voluntary annual subscriptions was only a small portion of the income of the establishment, but still it was a substantial sum and enough to satisfy the requirements of the section. Then there were invested moneys which brought in income. This came, for the most part, originally from voluntary donations. Further, no bonus was given or allowed. His Lordship then dealt with the cases about the Institute of Civil Engineers, reported in 5 Q.B.D., 48; 19 Q.B.D., 610; 20 Q.B.D., 621; and 15 App. Ca., 334. The latter of these authorities, in fact, overruled the first. In this case the fees were paid by persons able to afford them; there was remission of fees in certain cases where people could not. Any moneys received, however, were applied to the purposes of the college. It might be that the scholars might afterwards become teachers of music. The more that was done the more the knowledge of good music would be spread abroad. That, however, was only an incidental advantage. Under these circumstances, there was nothing in the facts to take the college out of the exemption. There must be judgment for the appellants.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred.

CITY OF LONDON BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED) AND COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Higher or lower scale—Deed to secure Debenture Stock—Substituted security.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. On May 21, 1897, an instrument was presented on behalf of the City of London Brewery Company to the Commissioners for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. By section 83 (1) of the Stamp Act, 54 and 55 Vic. c. 39, it is provided "that a security for the payment or repayment of money to be lent, advanced, or paid, or which may become due upon an account current either with or without money previously due, is to be charged when the total amount secured or to be secured or ultimately recoverable is in any way limited with the same duty as a security for the amount so limited." The instrument is a trust deed for securing debenture stock. It is dated May 6, 1897, and is made between the appellants and certain trustees. After reciting that there was then outstanding £500,000 debenture stock of the appellants constituted and secured by a trust deed dated February 20, 1892, between the same parties, and reciting the determination of the appellants to issue further debenture stock, to be called irredeemable 8½ per cent. debenture stock, ranking after the former debenture stock, and to be constituted and secured in manner thereafter provided, it was witnessed as follows:—By clause 7 the stock is limited in the first instance to £300,000, but the company is to be at liberty to issue further irredeemable $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock, entitled pari passu to the benefit hereof, subject to the following provisions, that is to say—“(a) Such further irredeemable $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock shall not exceed £540,000 in amount, making, with £300,000 stock above mentioned, a total of £840,000. (b) Such further stock shall only be issued for the purpose of redeeming or paying off the 4 per cent. debenture stock of £500,000. (c) Whenever it is proposed to issue any of the said further irredeemable $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock the company must notify in writing to the trustees or trustee the amount of the proposed further issue, and must satisfy the trustees or trustee that, by arrangement with the holders of a corresponding amount of the 4 per cent. debenture stock, or by reason of notice of redemption having been given, the company is in a position to pay off or redeem a corresponding amount of the 4 per cent. debenture stock, and must provide to the satisfaction of the trustees for the application of such further debenture stock . . . in such redemption . . . for the transfer of the 4 per cent. debenture stock to be redeemed . . . to the trustees . . . and the corresponding amount aforesaid is to be calculated on the basis that not more than £108 of the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock is to be issued in respect of every £100 of the 4 per cent. stock. (d) The company must, before any of the said further debenture stock is issued or offered for subscription, execute and deliver to the trustees an acknowledgment of indebtedness for the amount of the further proposed issue, duly stamped and framed in accordance with clause 2 hereof, and until such acknowledgment is so executed, stamped, and delivered, no part of such further stock is to be entitled to the benefit hereof.” No such acknowledgment of indebtedness had been executed. The Commissioners were of opinion that the sum of £840,000 mentioned was the limit of the total amount secured by, or to be ultimately recoverable under, the trust deed, within the meaning of section 88 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891. They therefore charged the instrument with the duty chargeable under the head “Mortgage, &c.,” in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, by reference to section 88 (1) of that Act, and they assessed such duty at £1,050, being 2s. 6d. for every £100 of the amount secured. The questions for the Court were—(1) Whether the instrument is chargeable with the duty of £1,050; (2) if not, with what duty it was chargeable.

Mr. BOSANQUET, Q.C. (The Hon. M. M. Macnaghten with him), for the appellants, contended that the deed was not taxable for anything more than the £300,000 issued, and, secondly, if in any sense any tax was to be put on it for the £540,000, either now or hereafter, it would be at the rate of only 6d. in the pound. This was a security for £300,000, but it could not be said that this was a security for anything more. It was necessary to reserve the right of the company to execute a further deed to create debentures which should rank pari passu with the others, or they could not have done so. He cited “Wale v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue” (4 Ex. D., 270).

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Mr. Danckwerts with him), for the Crown, contended that the Commissioners were quite right under sections 86 (1) and 88. This was a trust deed for the full amount. The acknowledgment of indebtedness proposed would not be in any sense a mortgage when made. When the £540,000 should be raised it would be only on the security of this deed. It did not matter that only £300,000 had been raised. The words of the section “to be thereafter lent or paid” meant sums which might hereafter have to be raised. This instrument was not a substituted security or a transfer, which would be taxed on a lower scale; it was a new loan, with different interest, and under different conditions from the old.

The Court held that with respect to £500,000 there was a substituted security, and that, therefore, the duty of 6d., instead of 2s. 6d., was payable, and the Crown should repay the difference.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said this instrument set out in the case was not a transfer, but, in his opinion, it was a substituted security as far as regarded the £500,000. The deed was a deed to secure an irredeemable $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. debenture stock in lieu of the old 4 per cent. debenture stock. The system was that the new stock was not to issue till there was an acknowledgment of indebtedness delivered to the trustees. The deed itself was for £840,000, and the question arose, what duty was payable in respect of it. Was it to be a 2s. 6d. duty or a 6d. duty? As far as regarded the £300,000, it was admitted that the higher scale was due. With regard to the £500,000, that would be substituted for the old 4 per cent., and therefore duty should only be paid as for a substituted security.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL was of the same opinion. He thought that a security was not the less a security for money because something else had to be done before the money could be raised. In this case the delivery of the acknowledgment of indebtedness was the preliminary required. But, on the whole, he agreed with Mr. Justice Grantham that this instrument, so far as the sum of £500,000 was concerned, was a substituted security, which was chargeable with the smaller duty. The property was the same in both cases, and the creditors were the same practically. The lower rate was chargeable. Section 87 (3), within which, however, the matter did not come, indicated that a full rate was not to be charged in a case such as this.

WARREN V. MOORE.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Deposit—Sale of public-house—Vendor's inability to complete—Action to recover deposit.

In this case the plaintiff claimed for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff. The amount paid to the defendant's agent was £500, which was paid as deposit under a contract dated October 26, 1896, which contract had since been rescinded on December 18. The defendant denied that the plaintiff was entitled to rescind the contract.

Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. H. A. Forman appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. R. A. Germaine for the defendant.

On October 26, 1896, the defendant had an underlease with 40 years to run of the Prince Albert publichouse at Peckham. That underlease was granted by the Wenlock Brewery Company, and the house was a tied house. At that time the Wenlock Brewery Company had a lease of over 65 years to run, which was a perfectly free lease. On October 26 Mr. Beard, the agent for Moore, who was also the agent for the Wenlock Brewery Company, agreed, on behalf of Moore, his disclosed principal, for the sale of the lease of the house, the lease to be at least for 65 years; not being a brewer's lease, £500 deposit was paid. The day for completion was originally November 30 but was extended to December 17. Before this Mr. Alderman Bell, one of the directors of the Wenlock Brewery Company, had told Mr. Moore that he might sell the interests of the brewery as well as his own, and had also told Mr. Beard that Mr. Moore had authority to dispose of the company's interest as well as his own. On November 11 an abstract of title was sent to the plaintiff. On November 12 the plaintiff's solicitors wrote pointing out that the underlease of Mr. Moore was for 40 years only and that it was a tied lease, and asked if these defects could be remedied. The defendant's solicitors wrote the next day to say that the defects should be remedied as the Wenlock Company had agreed to free the lease and to join in the assignment. Correspondence passed between the parties, but on December 18 the defendant not having shown a good title to a free house for 65 years in himself, the plaintiff rescinded the contract and now claimed the £500 he had paid as deposit.

Mr. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., contended that the plaintiff was not bound to wait for the vendor to join with someone else in making a good title. The time for the completion of the contract was the time to be considered. It was not sufficient if the defect was cured before action. "Forrer v. Nash" (35 Beav., 167); "Dobell v. Hutchinson" (3 Ad. & E., 355); "Weston v. Savage" (10 Ch. D., 736); "Brewer v. Broadwood" (22 Ch. D., 105); "In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract" (44 Ch. D., 218); "Bellamy v. Debenham" (1891, 1 Ch., 412). In contracts for the sale of a publichouse time was of the essence of the contract. "Day v. Lubke" (L.R. 5, Eq., 336), "Cowles v. Gale" (L.R. 7, Ch., 12). The plaintiff was entitled to rescind on the ground that up to the date for completion it was never in the power of the defendant to convey the lease as specified in the agreement, nor had he then any power to compel the Wenlock Brewery Company to join in the assignment.

Mr. MCCALL, Q.C., contended that at the time the plaintiff contracted to sell, and at the time for the completion, the Wenlock Company were willing to join in the conveyance. The Wenlock Company were in this case principals to this contract and were always able and willing to convey. There was no necessity to go through the form of the Wenlock Company conveying to the vendor, and the vendor conveying to the purchaser. "In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract" (44 Ch. D., at p. 221), "In re Head's Trustees and Macdonald" (45 Ch. D., per Fry, L.J., at p. 317). At the conclusion of the arguments judgment was reserved.

Mr. JUSTICE HAWKINS, in giving judgment, said that in this action the question arose whether the plaintiff, who had agreed to purchase the lease of a publichouse, could recover the deposit made on the signing of the contract. The question really was whether or not on the day appointed for the completion the vendor was in a position to convey the property to the plaintiff. The contract was entered into on October 26, 1896, and was an agreement for the sale of a free house. The Wenlock Brewery Company were the lessors to the defendant, and the lease granted by them bound him to buy his beer from the company. The house was, therefore, a tied and not a free house, and this was shown by the abstract of title when it was sent to the vendee's solicitors. The brewery company's solicitors wrote saying that they would free the house and join in the assignment of the lease. But the company were never under any legal obligation to do so, nor did they ever do so in fact. December 17 was finally fixed as the day for completion. On that day there was no contract between the brewery and the defendant, and therefore on that day he was not in a position to fulfil the engagement into which he had entered. The day for completion was a day certain. The case of "Cowles v. Gale" (L.R. 7, Ch. App. 12), showed that on the sale of a publichouse as a going concern, time was of the essence of the completion of the contract. It was hardly necessary for him to refer to the case of "Forrer v. Nash" (35 Beav., 167). That case laid down the law generally, but here there were circumstances that made a difference. If, when the day of completion arrived, those who sold were not in a position to give to the purchaser that which he bought, he could not be bound to complete his contract that day, and there was nothing to bind him to complete it later. On December 17 the defendant was not ready (though willing) to complete, and the plaintiff was not bound to pay the balance of the purchase-money but was entitled to get his deposit back. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff for £500 and on the counterclaim, with costs.

V. GRIFFIN.*

Contract—Breach—Damages, measure of—Contract to subscribe for debentures.

In this action the plaintiff company sought to recover damages from the defendant for his breach of contract to subscribe for debentures of the plaintiff company. The defence was that the defendant, in applying for the debentures did so only as agent for a Mrs. Drinkwater, whom the defendant brought into this case by a third party notice; alternatively the defendant pleaded that the company had suffered no damages by his or Mrs. Drinkwater's failure to subscribe for the debentures. The defendant, who was a director of the company, counterclaimed for his director's fees, which had not been paid.

Mr. Hume Williams appeared for the plaintiff company; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Arnold Jolly for the defendant; Mr. Cooper Wyld for the third party.

It appeared that in December, 1891, the defendant applied for and was allotted £1,000 £5 per cent. mortgage debentures in the plaintiff company. The debentures were payable by instalments, and were redeemable by drawings spread over 20 years. The defendant paid £100 on application, and a further £100 in September, 1895. Between December, 1895, and June, 1897, calls, amounting to £500, were made upon the defendant in respect of his debentures, but no part of this amount was paid. Evidence was given that, after the defendant's default, attempts were made on behalf of the company to get further debentures subscribed for by the public but, owing to the fact that the company was not then earning anything, no further debentures were applied for. With regard to the counterclaim for director's fees the chairman of the company said that he had proposed to the directors that they should forgo their fees until the financial position of the company improved, and the defendant did not dissent from this suggestion; but the chairman admitted that no agreement to this effect had been entered into with the company. No evidence was called for the defence, and the question as to the liability of the third party was not gone into.

Mr. UPJOHN, Q.C., for the defendant, contended that the company were at the most only entitled to nominal damages. He cited "South African Territories v. Wallington" (13 The Times L.R., 361 and [1897] 1 Q.B., 692).

Mr. HUME WILLIAMS, for the plaintiff company argued that if a lender made default in a loan, and the borrower, owing to want of credit, could not get an advance in the market, then the lender was liable in damages to the extent to which he had made default. In "South African Territories v. Wallington" Lord Justice Chitty said:—"If the intended borrower, being a man of good credit, can readily obtain the loan from another person on the same terms, the damages would be nominal. If he cannot obtain the money except at a higher rate of interest, or for a shorter term of years, or upon other more onerous terms, the damages would be greater and might be very substantial." The present case came within the principle there laid down, and there was no foundation for the suggestion that if the borrower was not a person of credit he had no remedy. In such a case his loss was all the greater.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that at the time the original debentures were issued the company had fairly good credit, and, out of an issue of £50,000 debentures £35,000 was taken up, on which about £23,000 had been paid. The defendant applied for, and was allotted, debentures to the extent of £1,000, on which he had paid £200. He then made default in paying calls to the amount of £500, and this action was brought to recover damages for his breach of contract. The case of "South African Territories v. Wallington" showed what was the measure of damages in such a case. It was not the amount of money which the defendant had promised to lend. It was only the difference between the rate of interest which the company had offered for the money and the rate which the company would have to pay in order to put it in the same position as if the defendant had performed his contract. But, in measuring the damages, it must be assumed that when the company applied elsewhere for an advance it still remained a company with ordinary credit. If, by reason of circumstances, the company had fallen into disrepute and had financial odour, the defendant was not responsible for that. His Lordship was satisfied that the company did lose its credit after the defendant's breach of contract, and the company's difficulty in getting the money at the rate which the defendant had undertaken to pay was not due to the defendant but was the fault of the company for falling into that position. The claim of the company in this action therefore failed. With regard to the counterclaim for director's fees, the defendant was entitled to recover the amount due at the date of the writ—that was, £100. His Lordship gave judgment for the defendant on the claim and on the counterclaim for £100, with costs. By consent the defendant's claim against the third party was withdrawn, no order being made as to costs between the defendant and the third party.

BEARDSLEY V. LACEY AND OTHERS.*

Probate—Revocation—Will—Codicil—Will destroyed by fire—Will and codicil admitted to probate.

This case was argued before the Court on December 10 and 13, 1897. In the course of the case the jury were discharged. The plaintiff, Mary Elizabeth Beardsley, sought probate of the contents of a will and also probate of a codicil thereto of the late Mr. Solomon Beardsley, who died on February 15, 1897. The defendants denied that the contents of the will were contained in the draft set up by the plaintiff, and further alleged that the will had been revoked by being burnt with the intention of thereby revoking such portion of the codicil as purported to confirm the provisions of the will.

Mr. R. H. Pritchard appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. H. Stevenson for the defendants.

MR. PRITCHARD, in opening the case, said that the will, the contents of which it was desired to prove, was dated December 30, 1891, and the codicil June 19, 1895. It appeared that on the day of the execution of the codicil, and after its execution, the testator destroyed his will under the belief that it was no longer necessary for the purpose of carrying out his wishes, but without any intention of revoking the same in any other way. The learned counsel's contention, therefore, was that in law the will was valid and subsisting. In the case of "Gardiner v. Courthope" (12 P.D., 14) the sole testamentary papers forthcoming at the death of the testatrix were a duly executed codicil and two drafts of wills, as to the execution or revocation of which there was no evidence. It was there held that though the codicil by its language was dependent on the will to which it belonged, and could not be construed without it, it ought to be admitted to probate, not having been revoked in any of the methods prescribed by the Wills Act.

THE PRESIDENT.—That is a very strong judgment of Mr. Justice Butt's.

MR. PRITCHARD.—Yes, my Lord. And I say in this case that the codicil is not dependent upon the provisions of the will. If the codicil is operative we do not care if the will is admitted to probate or not. As to what the codicil means, that is a matter for a Court of construction. Assume for the sake of argument that that Court says that the codicil does not dispose of all the property, then it will be necessary for us to come back to this Court. The testator having destroyed his will under a mistake of law, the doctrine of dependent relative revocation will be applicable. The case of "Perrott v. Perrott" (14 East, 440) is authority for that.

THE PRESIDENT.—I am not sure that the doctrine of dependent relative revocation does really apply. True, the testator destroyed the document, but surely there was no animus revocandi here.

MR. PRITCHARD.—That is the principle on which I say this case should be decided. I think, however, that the doctrine of dependent relative revocation goes further than your Lordship holds. "Clarkson v. Clarkson" (31 L.J., P. and M., 143, and 2 S. and T., 497) and "James v. Shrimpton" (1 P.D., 431) clearly go to show what amounts to an animus revocandi. In the latter case, the testator having duly executed a will, subsequently married. On the day of and after the marriage ceremony he executed a codicil, by which he made a provision for his wife, and in all other respects revived, ratified, and confirmed his will. His wife predeceased him, and on his death the codicil, which had been in his possession, could not be found. Declarations of the testator of a desire to adhere to his will were proved extending up to the latest period of his life. It was there held that the testator could not have intended, by the destruction of the codicil, to render his will inoperative, and the Court therefore granted probate of the will and of the codicil as contained in a draft from which the original was prepared for execution. It is no matter whether the destruction is under a mistake of fact or mistake of law.

MR. STEVENSON.—The true question that we have to decide is, Did the testator intend to revoke? If we look at the words in the codicil we find an express confirmation of the words in the will.

THE PRESIDENT.—It is clear the testator intended

*Reported by J. H. MURPHY, Esq., and G. HALL, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

the effect of the will to stand although he burnt the will itself, for the codicil assumes throughout the existence of the will.

Mr. STEVENSON.—Yes, My Lord, but it was in existence at the time the codicil was executed.

The PRESIDENT.—Ah, that is true. Still, I do not see how the codicil can stand by itself, for you will not be able to look at the will unless it is admitted to probate.

Mr. STEVENSON.—The will was revealed within the meaning of the Wills Act is my contention. A man is bound by the words he uses in his will, and the question of mistake does not apply to the Wills Act. It is not permissible to admit oral evidence in explanation. With regard to the case of "Perrott v. Perrott" (14 East, 440), it is not applicable because it was decided prior to the Wills Act.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that he was much obliged to the learned counsel who had argued the case for their assistance. The evidence showed that the will had been destroyed after the codicil had been made and read over, and it was then burnt, as the testator regarded it as needless, saying, as he did it, that it was no good. It was not necessary for this Court to decide what was the effect of the codicil. He quite agreed that the case of "Perrott v. Perrott" cited by counsel was very important, but of course it must be borne in mind that it was before the Wills Act. That statute, however, did but express the law as it stood before that Act was passed. The cases of "Clarkson v. Clarkson" (31 L.J., P. and M., 143) and "James v. Shrimpton" (1 P.D., 431) carried out this view, and he had therefore come to the conclusion that the contents of the will together with the codicil should be admitted to probate.

Privy Council Appeals—Victoria—Company—
Winding-up—Scheme of arrangement.

The Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 104), does not extend to the colonies.

This was an appeal from orders of the Supreme Court of Victoria of September 1, 1896.

Mr. Arthur Cohen, Q.C., Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Tyrrell T. Paine were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Lorence Ryland for the respondent.

LORD DAVEY, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said on January 23, 1893, the respondent in Victoria placed £3,700 on deposit with the appellant company. That company was incorporated in England under the English Companies Acts, with its head office in England, but carried on business in New Zealand and the Australian colonies, including Victoria. On July 12, 1893, a creditor's petition was presented to the Court in Victoria for winding-up the company. A provisional liquidator was appointed, but no order was ever made on that petition, and there had been no winding-up of the company in Victoria. On the same day (July 12) the company itself presented a petition to the High Court in England, and on the 21st an order was made by that Court for the compulsory winding-up of the company. Subsequently a scheme of arrangement was prepared and submitted to meetings of the creditors and contributories of the company and accepted by the requisite statutory majorities of creditors and contributories in compliance with the provisions of the English Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. By an order of April 13, 1894, the High Court in England sanctioned the scheme of arrangement, and declared it to be binding on all the creditors and contributories of the company and also on the official receiver and liquidator thereof. By that scheme it was provided that a new company should be formed with the same name to acquire the undertaking and property of the old company (i.e., the present appellants) and to assume and provide for its liabilities in manner thereafter mentioned, and that the new company should pay to each unsecured creditor of the old company £12 10s. per cent. on the amount of his claim in cash, with interest capitalized to June 30, 1894, and for the remaining £87 10s. per cent. should issue to such creditor debenture stock. And it was further provided that forthwith after the scheme should have become finally binding on all parties each creditor of the old company should, subject to the carrying out of the scheme, hold his claim in trust for the new company, and release or deal with the same as the new company should direct. The new company was formed and was carrying on business in Victoria, and had acquired or had title to all the property of the appellant company. The respondent had due notice of the scheme and of the meetings of creditors to consider the same. On January 4, 1895, the respondent commenced an action in Victoria against the appellant company to recover her deposit of £3,700 and interest. By their defence the company stated the winding-up petition in Victoria, the winding-up order in England, the proceedings under the Arrangement Act, 1870, and the material provisions of the scheme, and submitted that the respondent was bound by the scheme as by a new contract, and that she had no longer any beneficial interest in or right to receive the money claimed by her. In her reply the respondent objected that the Joint Stock Arrangement Act had no force or effect in Victoria, and that the acceptance of the scheme by the three-fourths majority of creditors would not make it binding on her or be an answer to the action. Mr. Justice Hodges, after hearing the arguments on the points of law thus raised, adjudged that those paragraphs of the defence afforded no answer to the claim, and at the trial of the action before the Chief Justice judgment was given for the respondent. Both orders were affirmed on appeal by the full Court. The present appeal was against those orders. It was contended before their Lordships that the Arrangement Act, 1870, extended to all the colonies as well as the United Kingdom, and that the colonial Courts were therefore bound to take notice of the proceedings under that Act and give judicial effect to them. It was the intention of the Act (it was said) to bind all the creditors of the company, and the Act should be construed so as to give effect to that intention so far as possible, and as the Parliament of the United Kingdom could bind the colonies it must be assumed to have done so. The analogy of bankruptcy was referred to, and reliance was placed on a decision of the Court of Common Pleas in "Ellis v. M'Henry" (L.R., 6 C.P., 228). Their Lordships did not think that the Arrangement Act of 1870, when read by itself and detached from the other Companies Acts, did, either by express words or by necessary implication, extend to the colonies. That Act, however, could not be regarded by itself, but was only one of a collection of Acts together containing the statutory law relating to joint stock companies in the United Kingdom which were compendiously referred to as "the Companies Acts" and ordered to be read together. It was impossible to contend that the Companies Acts as a whole extended to the colonies or were intended to bind the colonial Courts. The colonies possessed and had exercised the power of legislating on those subjects for themselves, and there was every reason why legislation of the United Kingdom should not unnecessarily be held to extend to the colonies and thereby overrule, qualify, or add to their own legislation on the same subject. It was quite true that the provisions of the Arrangement Act were expressed to extend to all creditors, and so they did to foreign as well as colonial creditors, but only when their rights were in question in the Courts of the United Kingdom. Their Lordships adopted what was said by Mr. Justice Holroyd on that point:—"I am quite willing to admit—indeed, I entertain no doubt—that the compromise spoken of in section 2 is one between a company and all its creditors or all of a particular class, that all are to be summoned to any meeting which the Court may order, and that the votes of all who attend either in person or by proxy are to be counted. 'All' means 'all,' wherever the creditors may be found, whether in the United Kingdom, or in the colonies, or in foreign countries; and within the jurisdiction of the English Courts, all, wherever domiciled, will be bound by the result. But we are asked to say, looking at this one section only, that the same clause has a different import according as it is applied to foreign countries or to the colonies; that with respect to the former its operation is confined to the jurisdiction of the English Courts, while upon the latter it imposes a new law, and one in derogation of the legislative powers possessed by those colonies which enjoy self-government. It seems hardly probable that, if such was the purpose of the Imperial Parliament, it should have been expressed in a manner so ambiguous." Nor did their Lordships think that any assistance was to be derived from what had been held with regard to the application of the Bankruptcy Acts to the colonies. It had been decided that by the express words of the Bankruptcy Acts all the property, real and personal, of an English bankrupt in the colonies as well as in the United Kingdom was vested in his assignees or trustees. Their title must therefore receive recognition in the colonial Courts, from which it had been considered to follow that the bankrupt being denuded of his property by the English law was also entitled to plead the discharge given him by the same law. But how did that assist the appellants? They had to deal with the winding-up of a company, not with bankruptcy, and there was a material distinction between the effect of bankruptcy and that of winding-up. In the former case the whole property of the bankrupt was taken out of him, whilst in the latter the property remained vested in title and in fact in the company, subject only to its being administered for the purposes of the winding-up under the direction of the English Courts. Their Lordships were not called upon to criticize the decision in Ellis v. M'Henry, which, in their opinion, did not apply to the present case. If, as their Lordships held, the Arrangement Act, 1870, did not extend to the colonies, the proceedings in the English Court were for that purpose proceedings in a foreign Court, and could not be pleaded in Victoria as a defence to an action by a Victorian creditor, as was decided in England with reference to a French winding up in Gibbs v. Société des Métaux (25 Q.B.D., 399). One other argument was used which should be noticed. It was said that everybody who dealt with a corporation had notice of its origin and constitution, and contracted with it, subject to all the incidents which, according to the law of its constitution, might affect its liability upon its contracts. That argument was specious, but, when examined, was found to beg the question, or rather to be the same point over again. The incident of the constitution of this company which was relied on was that it might be discharged from its liabilities by the order of an English Court. But it should be added "so far as the jurisdiction of that Court extends," and that brought them back to the same point. Their Lordships would, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellants would pay the costs of it.

PARSONS AND OTHERS V. GILLESPIE AND OTHERS.*

Trade Name—Imitation—Name of article—
"Flaked oatmeal"—Injunction refused.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of November 6, 1896.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian appeared for the appellants; Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter for the respondents.

LORD HOBHOUSE, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the question raised in the suit was whether a trade-mark or a trade name, which the plaintiffs (now appellants) claimed as their own, had been wrongly used by the defendants, who were respondents in the appeal. Until within the last few years the only method used in the colony of preparing oats for making porridge was by grinding them into fine meal or powder: but shortly before 1890 new processes were introduced, by which the oats were not ground into powder, but were crushed or flattened between rollers. In March, 1890, the plaintiffs perfected one of these processes, and called the product "Flaked Oatmeal." In June, 1890, they obtained registration of a trade-mark, which in the registrar's certificate was thus described:—"A lion rampant against a sheaf of corn, the background being filled with a landscape and a pair of balance scales. Below the lion is a scroll, upon which are the Latin words, Iustus Esto Et Non Metus. The trade-mark is surrounded with a double line in the form of a circle. Above the circle are the words 'Use Parsons', and below the circle are the words 'Finest Flaked Oatmeal.'" That trade-mark had ever since been used by the plaintiffs, and the commodity so marked had met with a large sale. From 1890 to 1896 several preparations of crushed or flattened oats, more or less resembling that of the plaintiffs, were put upon the market. Most of them were called "rolled oats," either simply or with some addition indicative of the maker. One was called "Oat Flakes," one "Wafer Oatmeal." None was called by the precise name of "Flaked Oatmeal." In 1894, the defendants produced a preparation of rolled or crushed oats, which they called "Rolled Oatmeal." That process was not satisfactory to them, and very soon they adopted another, by which the oats were first ground small and then the meal so obtained was steamed and passed through rollers to be flattened or flaked. The right of the defendants to use that or any other process as against the plaintiffs was not questioned, and the nature of the process was only important in its bearing on their use of the name "Flaked Oatmeal," which was questioned. In December, 1894, the defendants applied to register a trade mark for their then manufacture. The device they chose was something entirely different from that of the plaintiffs; but they inscribed it with the words "Gillespie's Flaked Oatmeal"; the two latter words standing by themselves below the device. The plaintiffs raised objection to that, and the Registrar-General informed the defendants that they could not use the term "Flaked Oatmeal" as a prominent feature in their trade-mark, and that the plaintiffs, by their registration in 1890, had acquired the right to use these words. The defendants did not press for registration any further, but they put their goods on the market labelled with the same device and inscription or some slight imitation of it. In May, 1896, the plaintiffs instituted this suit against the defendants for an injunction and an account of profits and damages. They rested their case, not on the possession of the trade-mark, but on the right to exclusive use of the term "flaked oatmeal." They prayed "that the defendants, their servants and agents, may be restrained by the order and injunction of this Court from applying to any preparation, not being of the plaintiffs' manufacture, the term 'flaked oatmeal,' or from selling as 'flaked oatmeal' any preparation not being of the plaintiffs' manufacture." An interlocutory injunction was granted on these terms, but at the hearing the Chief Judge in Equity dismissed the suit with costs and directed an inquiry as to the damages sustained by the defendants by reason of the injunction. That was the decree from which the appeal was brought. There was nothing in the decree to prejudice the plaintiffs' right to their trade-mark. Neither in their statements nor in their prayer did the plaintiffs rest their case on the trade-mark, and the mere dismissal of their suit did not deny their right. But in his judgment the Judge went beyond the dismissal of the suit. He said that the suit was instituted to try the right of the plaintiffs to the trade-mark, and he expressed an opinion that the words "flaked oatmeal" ought not to have formed part of that mark. The appellants pointed out that the register was conclusive until altered in the way prescribed by the statute—i.e., by a suit framed for the purpose. Their Lordships were not in a position to know what might have taken place in Court to give to the litigation a character which the pleadings did not give to it. They confined themselves to the decree appealed from, and they expressed no opinion on the question whether the plaintiffs might or might not use the term "flaked oatmeal" as part of their trade-mark in conjunction with a number of other matters. With those remarks their Lordships passed by the subject of trade-mark. The plaintiffs had no case, indeed they did not put forward a case, for complaint against the defendants on the score of the trade-mark, unless by virtue of the registration they had acquired an exclusive right to that portion of it which consisted of the term "flaked oatmeal." The defendants' trade-mark bore no resemblance to that of the plaintiffs as a whole. The question whether the defendants could use the term "flaked oatmeal" did not depend upon the trade-mark, but was part of the wider question whether the plaintiffs had by user identified the term with their goods so intimately that the use of it by another person had the effect of passing off his goods as the goods of the plaintiffs. That was the substantial ground on which the case of the plaintiffs had been argued at the bar. It would be convenient to state the principles of law by which the contention of the plaintiffs must be tested, and that could not be done better than was done by the learned Judge below in quoting the language used by Lord Herschell in "Reddaway v. Banham" (App. Cases [1896], p. 199). Lord Herschell there said:—"The name of a person or words forming part of the common stock of language may become so far associated with the goods of a particular maker that it is capable of proof that the use of them by themselves without explanation or qualification by another manufacturer would deceive the purchaser into the belief that he was getting the goods of A when he was really getting the goods of B. In a case of this description the mere proof by the plaintiff that the defendant was using a name, word, or device which he had adopted to distinguish his goods would not entitle him to any relief. He could only obtain it by proving further that the defendant was using it under such circumstances and in such manner as to put off his goods as the goods of the plaintiff." The plaintiffs then must show either that the term "flaked oatmeal" was not part of the common stock of language in the sense that it was not a term of description, but was of an arbitrary or fanciful nature invented by the plaintiffs, which the inventor might claim to have appropriated, or they must show that the term being originally a description of the article itself had come in practice to denote goods made by the plaintiffs. To both these points the plaintiffs had carefully addressed themselves. They maintained that the expression "flaked oatmeal" did not properly describe their own goods or those of the defendants, but was an artificial expression, fit for appropriation by any one who had hit upon it. Now, nobody could look at the plaintiffs' exhibit of their oatmeal without seeing that the word "flaked" was a correct description. The oats had been only partially reduced to powder and were presented in small, flattened morsels like flakes of snow. The term was one in common use for food-grains or other vegetable substances so treated by rolling or crushing—such as "flaked rice," "flaked barley," "flaked tapioca," "flaked cocoa," and so forth. But then it was said that the article was not "meal" because it was not ground to powder. Whether the word "meal" would by etymology or in the very strictest use of language be applicable to that which had passed through the mill but was only partially reduced to powder was a point as to which their Lordships thought that no nice inquiry need be made. It was a natural and obvious term to use for oats so treated; one which everybody would accept at once as appropriate enough; and probably everybody who breakfasted off porridge made from such a material would think and say that he was eating oatmeal porridge. Then it was contended that the product of the defendants was not oatmeal, and that their adoption of an inappropriate name showed an intention of trading on the reputation acquired by the plaintiffs. It seemed to their Lordships that the name as applied to the defendants' product was strictly appropriate, for they reduced the oats to powder, which was afterwards steamed, rolled, and so flaked. The plaintiffs had been reduced to contend on that point that because the defendants took away some 5 per cent. of the finest powder the rest was not oatmeal, and, further, that to roll or flake oatmeal was impossible. To support those two contentions they brought several witnesses in the Court below; but the Court rightly gave no weight to the evidence, which had been little insisted on there. Then had there been any such secondary use of the term as to identify it with the plaintiffs' manufacture? To prove that there had been the plaintiffs called a number of grocers who said that when customers asked for "flaked oatmeal" they supplied the plaintiffs' goods. That was a matter of course during the five or six years for which nobody except the plaintiffs purported to sell goods under that name. One witness, a miller, said in terms that between 1892 and the beginning of 1896 the words "flaked oatmeal" had got to mean the plaintiffs' manufacture. That seemed to their Lordships somewhat slender evidence to prove such a general association of the name of the product with the producer as to entitle the plaintiffs to say that the use of the name by another was an encroachment on their rights. But supposing the evidence sufficient on that point, it fell far short of showing that the proceedings of the defendants were such as to cause confusion between their goods and those of the plaintiffs. There was no evidence that any buyer had got the defendants' goods when he desired those of the plaintiffs; nor that any seller had made confusion between the two. As for external resemblance of the packages or labels it had been shown before with reference to the trade-mark that there was nothing of the kind except in the use of the two disputed words. In fact the defendants could hardly have done more to show that the articles came from different makers. The result was that in their Lordships' judgment the defendants had done no more than they had a right to do in taking appropriate words of ordinary description to indicate the article which they made and sold, and that their action was not calculated to pass off their manufacture as that of the plaintiffs and was not proved in point of fact to have done so. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs.

IN RE COOPERS (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding-up—Voluntary winding-up —Liquidator—Discretion as to employment of solicitor.

This was an appeal against an order made by Mr. Justice Wright in Chambers. On August 25 last the shareholders of this company passed an extraordinary resolution for the voluntary winding-up of the company. The resolution appointed Mr. Edwin Barron Lumb to be voluntary liquidator, and it was also resolved "that Mr. G. J. Liddle continue to act as solicitor for the company and to act as solicitor for the liquidator in the winding-up." After Mr. Lumb's appointment he found that on August 16 (the day before that on which notice was given of the meeting of August 25) three assignments of debts due to the company were made to three creditors of the company as security for debts due to them by the company. One of these assignments was made to Mr. Liddle himself. Mr. Lumb consulted Messrs. Foss and Ledsam, other solicitors, as to the validity of these assignments, and was advised by them that they were all void, as being "fraudulent preferences." Mr. Lumb accordingly instructed Messrs. Foss and Ledsam to take proceedings for setting aside the assignments. He said that he did this because, as Mr. Liddle was party to one of the implicated assignments, it would be impossible for him to do adequate justice to proceedings to set them aside. Mr. Liddle claimed as a matter of right to be entitled by virtue of the resolution of the shareholders to act as solicitor in all matters in the liquidation. Mr. Liddle ultimately relinquished his own assignment. A summons was taken out by William Cooper, one of the contributories, asking for an order to remove Mr. Lumb from the office of liquidator and to restrain him from employing any other solicitor than Liddle in the winding-up of the company. Upon the hearing of this summons the learned Judge ordered Lumb as liquidator to convene a meeting of the company, under section 139 of the Companies Act, 1862, for the purpose of considering the question of the employment of Liddle to act as solicitor to Lumb as liquidator. And it was ordered that the summons should stand over generally, with liberty to either party to restore, to enable Lumb to convene the meeting. The learned Judge expressed an opinion that there was no ground for removing the liquidator, but that the shareholders ought to be consulted about the employment of a solicitor. The meeting directed by the Judge was held on December 9, and the shareholders then passed the following resolution:—"The shareholders are of opinion that, as no extraordinary general meeting has been called since August 25 to discuss the question of changing solicitors, Mr. G. J. Liddle, who was appointed to act as solicitor to the liquidator of the company on that date ought to continue to act in the appointed capacity, and that the liquidator ought not to have employed any other solicitor. At the same time, the shareholders wish to express their satisfaction at the manner in which all other matters in relation to the winding-up by the liquidator have been carried out." Mr. Lumb appealed against the order of November 24.

Mr. LEVETT, Q.C., and Mr. AUSTEN CARTMELL, for the appellant, argued that under the Companies Acts the shareholders had no power to fetter the liquidator as to the employment of a solicitor, and that, no ground having been shown for the removal of the liquidator, the summons ought to have been at once dismissed with costs.

Mr. BUCKLEY, Q.C., and Mr. T. RIBTON, for Mr. Cooper, urged that the appeal was premature. There was nothing to appeal against now, the learned Judge not having made any order, but only having adjourned the hearing for the purpose of consulting the shareholders.

In answer to a question put by the COURT, Mr. LEVETT stated that Mr. Lumb intended to employ Mr. Liddle as his solicitor in the liquidation in all matters not connected with the assignments in question.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that this was one of those unfortunate disputes which brought discredit on voluntary winding-up. All that the learned Judge had done was to adjourn the hearing of the summons, and the COURT could not entertain the appeal unless they were satisfied that the learned Judge ought to have dismissed the summons with costs. The COURT thought that this was so. His Lordship did not intend to throw any doubt upon the power of the Judge to consult the shareholders with regard to matters in which they were interested, but, looking at the evidence in the present case, it was clear that the question was rather a creditor's than a shareholder's question. It was clear from the evidence that the company were insolvent, and there was no use in consulting the shareholders as to this question. The company resolved on a voluntary winding-up, and appointed Lumb liquidator on certain terms. His Lordship could see no evidence that he had attempted to repudiate the conditions on which he was appointed. He thought it undesirable that the business connected with the setting aside the three assignments should remain in Mr. Liddle's hands, and no one could say that Lumb was not justified in taking that view. Mr. Liddle was annoyed at this, and this summons was issued. Mr. Justice Wright thought there was no reason for removing Lumb, but he thought it desirable to consult the shareholders about the employment of a solicitor. If the company had been solvent there would have been good reason for consulting the shareholders. But in the actual circumstances this reason did not exist. The COURT was not saying anything to derogate from the power of the Judge to consult the shareholders, except with regard to a case in which the summons ought to have been at once dismissed. There were cases in which it would be wrong to adjourn the hearing of a summons, but it ought to be at once dismissed, and all further costs stopped. In his Lordship's opinion the present case was one of that kind, and the appeal ought to be allowed and the summons dismissed, so as at once to put an end to the incurring of further costs.

Each of the other learned JUDGES expressed his concurrence.

FOXWELL V. VAN GRUTTEN.*

Practice—Trial—Place of trial—Application to change—Assizes—Discretion.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Day refusing to change the venue of the action from Cornwall to London. The Court had given the defendant leave to appeal on Monday last, as reported in The Times of yesterday. The action was brought to recover possession of an estate in Cornwall.

MR. HALDANE, Q.C., and MR. T. H. CARSON, for the defendant, now argued that the balance of convenience was in favour of the action being tried in London rather than at Bodmin. The principal questions in the action were questions of law, and if there was any issue of fact to be tried all the witnesses were persons who could attend more conveniently in London than at Bodmin.

MR. FOOTE, Q.C., and MR. DUKE, for the plaintiff, pointed out that the Assizes at Bodmin would be at the end of January, and that the action could be tried there without the delay which would certainly be occasioned if it were removed to London.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that prima facie the plaintiff was entitled to put the venue where he liked, and in an action of ejectment with regard to land in Cornwall prima facie Cornwall was the right place in which to try it. If it could be shown that there was a great balance of convenience in favour of trying the case elsewhere, that would be a ground for asking for an order for a change of venue. But, in his opinion, the defendant had altogether failed to show any such balance of convenience in this case. And, further than that, if the action were removed to London it certainly would not be tried for some months.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY said he was of the same opinion, and he thought that the Court of Appeal ought always to require an overwhelmingly strong case before they interfered with the discretion of a Judge at Chambers as to the place where an action should be tried.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred, and only desired to add that, in his opinion, circuit cases should be tried on circuit.

THE WEST LONDON SYNDICATE (LIMITED), APPELLANTS, V. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, RE-SPONDENTS.†

Revenue—Stamp duty—Ad valorem duty—
Amount payable—Contract for conveyance—
Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 59 (1).

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., cap. 80). On January 4, 1897, an instrument was presented on behalf of the West London Syndicate (Limited) to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The instrument is dated March 19, 1895, and is an agreement under seal for the sale by Percy Thorne to the syndicate of, first, the goodwill of the business of an hotel proprietor and licensed victualler carried on by the vendor at Fischer's Hotel, 11, Clifford-street, New Bond-street, and the benefit of the licences and contracts and privileges of the vendor; secondly, the lease of the hotel, subject to the yearly rent of £964; thirdly, the household furniture, fixtures, and fittings; fourthly, the stock-in-trade and also cash in hand and book-debts. The consideration for the sale was the payment by the syndicate of the business debts of the vendor, and the sum of £4,250, of which sum £1,462 16s. 3d. was for furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. Clause 6 of the agreement was this:—"The leasehold premises hereby agreed to be sold being only assignable with the consent of the landlords from whom the same are held, the vendor shall use his best endeavours to obtain the requisite consent for the assignment thereof to the syndicate or their assigns, and in the event of such consent not being obtained the vendor shall at the option of the syndicate execute a declaration of trust of the said leasehold premises in its favour." The Commissioners were informed by the solicitor to the syndicate that the debts were £1,335 8s. 4d., and that, therefore, the purchase consideration was £5,585 8s. 4d., including for lease and goodwill £4,085 8s. 4d., and that it was quite impossible to sever the goodwill from the lease itself because the goodwill was considered to be of no value, as it could not exist apart from the lease, but that without a covenant restricting the vendor from carrying on business the lease would be of less value by £400. The Commissioners called for the production of any assignment of the leasehold premises which might have been executed, and a declaration of trust bearing date March 21, 1895, by which the equitable interest in the leasehold premises became vested in the syndicate, was produced. The Commissioners invited the solicitor for the syndicate to present the declaration of trust for adjudication, so that the question of the proper stamp duty payable upon that deed might be considered and assessed by them in conjunction with any assessment to be made upon the instrument, but he declined to accede to this invitation, and stated that the amount of duty to be paid upon the declaration of trust was not then in question. The Commissioners, having regard to the provisions in sections 5 and 15 of the Stamp Act, 1891, were of opinion that, inasmuch as neither the sum of £4,085 8s. 4d. nor any other part of the consideration had been expressed by the declaration of trust to be apportioned to the leasehold premises so as to make that instrument chargeable according to its terms with ad valorem duty as a conveyance on sale, the whole consideration except the sum of £1,462 16s. 3d. apportioned by clause 2 of the agreement as the consideration for the furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash was to be regarded as applicable to the other property sold under the agreement. The Commissioners were, therefore, of opinion that the agreement was chargeable under section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, with ad valorem conveyance duty on the said sum of £5,585 8s. 4d., less the sum of £1,462 16s. 3d. apportioned as aforesaid, making the net sum of £4,122 12s. 1d. The Commissioners accordingly assessed the ad valorem stamp duty of £20 15s. upon the agreement, being the ad valorem duty of 5s. for every £50 of the sum of £4,122 12s. 1d., payable under the head "Conveyance or transfer on sale" in the 1st schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and they also assessed the fixed duty of 10s. in respect of the agreement for the sale of the said leasehold premises, furniture, stock-in-trade, and cash. The instrument has since been stamped in accordance with the assessment. The syndicate being dissatisfied with the assessment so far as it relates to the amount of the ad valorem duty have, in pursuance of the 13th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, required the Commissioners to state and sign a case setting forth the questions on which their opinion was required, and the assessment made by them. The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—(1) Whether the instrument was chargeable with the ad valorem duty of £20 15s., in accordance with the assessment of the Commissioners; (2) if not, with what amount of ad valorem duty the instrument was chargeable. By section 59 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, "Any contract or agreement made in England or Ireland under seal or under hand only . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, or for the sale of any estate or interest in any property, excepting lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, or property . . . locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares, merchandise, or stock or marketable securities, or any ship or vessel . . . shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty to be paid by the purchaser as if it were an actual conveyance or sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold."

Mr. A. T. Lawrence (Mr. Spearman with him) appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Mr. Danckwerts with him) for the respondents.

The Court held that ad valorem duty was payable upon the amount of the book debts only.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that the instrument was not the real conveyance on sale, but merely an agreement setting out what the parties intended to do in future. The stamp duty was payable upon the instrument which conveyed the goodwill, and not upon the bargain.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. The instrument was a contract for conveyance, but not a conveyance. Nor could it be said that it was an agreement for the sale of an equitable interest within section 59 of the Act, although the possible sale of an equitable interest was contemplated. The purchaser was at liberty to take, but was not bound to take, an equitable interest. As the instrument did not bind the purchaser, it was not a contract for the sale of an equitable interest. Nor was it a contract for the sale of any estate or interest in any property other than lands or goods within the meaning of section 59. The goodwill of a publichouse could not be severed from the enjoyment of the land. Nor had the parties treated it as separate from the land, although they had dealt with it in the instrument apart from the lease.

REG. V. WIMBLEDON URBAN COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Burial Board—District Council—Right of ratepayer to inspect accounts—Application not made bona fide refused.

This was the argument of a rule directed to the Wimbledon Urban District Council, as the burial board for the district, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to permit Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, and Co., the solicitors to Richard Ernest Hatton, a ratepayer of the said urban district, to inspect, as his agents, the minute and account books kept by the council, as the burial board, and take copies and extracts from them.

Mr. G. Humphreys appeared to show cause against the rule, which had been obtained by Mr. Safford.

The affidavits on which the rule was granted showed that Mr. Hatton, a solicitors' managing clerk, was a ratepayer of the Wimbledon urban district. The council, who are the burial board for the district, propose to place an infectious diseases hospital on a piece of vacant land in their possession as burial board. In October last the council applied to the Local Government Board under section 233 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for leave to borrow £10,000 for the purpose. An inquiry was held, and the leave was granted on condition that the council obtained the leave of the Home Secretary for the utilization of the land for the purpose. Mr. Hatton stated that he was desirous of ascertaining, with other ratepayers, the circumstances under which the land was acquired, and whether it could be lawfully diverted for the purpose of the proposed hospital. He thereupon instructed Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, and Co., as his solicitors, to make an application to inspect the said books and documents. Their application was refused on the ground that it must be made by the ratepayer alone. Messrs. Ashurst and Co. had appeared at the inquiry as solicitors on behalf of the Land Securities Company and Mr. Hatton and other ratepayers, and opposed the proposal of the council. The affidavit in opposition to the rule stated that the board thought the application was not made in good faith, but indirectly for the purpose of obtaining inspection of the books by Messrs. Ashurst and Co. on behalf of the Land Securities Company. No imputation was made upon the honour of Messrs. Ashurst and Co. The Metropolitan Burials Act, 1852, section 16, provides that entries of all proceedings of the board shall be entered in books, and true and regular accounts of all sums of money received shall be entered in other books. Section 17 provides that all such books shall at all reasonable times be open to the examination of every member of such board, churchwarden, overseer, and ratepayer without fee or reward, and they respectively may take copies of or extracts from such books.

The Court discharged the rule, holding that the Court ought not, as a matter of discretion, to grant the inspection asked for. There was no want of actual and real bona fides, but in a legal sense there was a want of bona fides, as the application was made for an indirect purpose. It was not for the benefit of Mr. Hatton, but for that of some other person.

Rule discharged.

DICKINSON V. BOWER.*

Bill of Exchange—Promissory note—Stamp—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 33.

"In consideration of your advancing to M. and H. £250 on their joint and several promissory note, I undertake to pay £250 on demand, should their note not be met at maturity."

Held, that this did not constitute a promissory note within the meaning of sec. 33 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of £250

*Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

under a contract contained in a document signed by the defendant in the following terms:—

"Dear Dickinson,—In consideration of your advancing to my friends, M'Kean and Holford, the sum of £250 on their joint and several promissory note, I undertake to pay such £250 on demand, should such promissory note not be met at maturity."

The facts were shortly as follows:—The plaintiff was a solicitor; the defendant was his client. The defendant several times asked the plaintiff to cash a promissory note for £250 for two friends of his, M'Kean and Holford. The plaintiff, to oblige the defendant, after some time consented to do so. The defendant assured him that his friends were perfectly safe, and agreed to guarantee the payment of the note. The document above set out was accordingly drawn up by the plaintiff and signed by the defendant at the same time as the £250 was handed over to the defendant. The promissory note for £250 was not met at maturity. The only defence raised was that the document sued on was a promissory note within the meaning of section 33 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was insufficiently stamped. It was admitted that if it was a promissory note it was insufficiently stamped, and that the plaintiff would be precluded from suing on it. Section 33 of the Stamp Act, 1891, is in the following terms:—"(1) For the purposes of this Act the expression 'promissory note' includes any document or writing (except a banknote) containing a promise to pay any sum of money. (2) A note promising the payment of any sum of money out of any particular fund which may or may not be available, or upon any condition or contingency which may or may not be performed or happen, is to be deemed a promissory note for that sum of money."

Mr. BOWER appeared for the plaintiff and contended that the document in question was not a promissory note within the meaning of the Act. He referred to the following cases:—"British India Steam Navigation Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" (7 Q.B.D., 165), and "Yeo v. Daw" (53 L.T., 125).

Mr. DALDY appeared for the defendant. He referred to the case of the "Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" (21 Q.B.D., 352, per Bowen, L.J., at p. 358).

The learned JUDGE, in giving judgment, said that he was sorry that the defendant had not thought fit to submit to judgment. He owed the money. He had no defence whatever on the merits, but had raised what he called a legal defence. In the opinion of the learned Judge that defence was bad; the document was not a promissory note, nor was it intended to be so by either party. It was a promise to indemnify the plaintiff in the event of his not getting the money which he had lent from the two persons who signed the note, and was only meant to apply so as to enable the plaintiff to get his money to the extent to which he might not be able to recover it from them. The document did not provide for the payment of a fixed sum, but for the payment of any sum that might turn out to be unpaid at the time the promissory note came to be met. The document was, therefore, not a promissory note either in intention or in fact, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

computed—Bankruptcy Act, 1890, sec. 11 (2)
—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, R. 90.

Rule 90 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, does not apply to the service of a notice under sec. 11 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

This was an appeal by the claimant from an order of Mr. Justice Day at Chambers upon an interpleader summons, and raised a point as to the computation of time under the Bankruptcy Acts. On September 6, 1897, execution was levied for £62 4s. in respect of a judgment recovered by the plaintiffs against the defendant. On September 18 the defendant paid out the sheriff. On October 2 a receiving order was made against the defendant upon his own petition, and on the same day the Official Receiver sent a telegram to the sheriff stating that a receiving order had been made that day against the defendant, and that he claimed all moneys in the sheriff's hands paid by the defendant in respect of any execution. This telegram was received by the sheriff at 3 40 on the afternoon of October 2, which was a Saturday. The question was whether the telegram was not received too late, and whether, therefore, the 14 days during which the sheriff was to hold the money under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, had not expired. Subsection 2 of that section provides that, "where under an execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding £20 the goods of a debtor are sold or money is paid in order to avoid sale, the sheriff shall . . . retain the balance for 14 days, and if within that time notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor, and a receiving order is made against the debtor thereon or on any other petition of which the sheriff has notice, the sheriff shall pay the balance to the Official Receiver . . . who shall be entitled to retain the same as against the execution creditor." By Rule 90 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, "services of notices, orders, or other proceedings shall be effected before the hour of 6 in the afternoon, except on Saturdays, when it shall be effected before the hour of 2 in the afternoon. Service effected after 6 in the afternoon on any week-day except Saturday shall for the purpose of computing any period of time subsequent to such service be deemed to have been effected on the following day. Service effected after 2 in the afternoon on Saturday shall for the like purpose be deemed to have been effected on the following Monday." It was admitted that by section 141 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the 14 days were to be computed exclusive of September 18. The Official Receiver contended that, as the 14 days did not expire until midnight of October 2, the notice was given in time, and that the sheriff was bound to hand over to him the proceeds of the execution, and that Rule 90 only applied to notices of procedure, and not to notices such as this. The execution creditors claimed the proceeds, contending that by Rule 90 the notice of the receiving order must be deemed to have been served on Monday, October 4, when the 14 days had expired. The sheriff interpleaded, and Mr. Justice Day ordered the sheriff to pay over the moneys in his hands to the execution creditors. The claimant appealed, and referred to "Curtis v. Wainbrook Iron Company" (Cab. and Ell., 351).

Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. H. J. Turrell appeared for the claimant; Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the execution creditors; Mr. R. Coventry appeared for the sheriff.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether the 14 days during which the sheriff had to hold the proceeds of the sale were cut down by Rule 90. The 14 days commenced to run on September 19.

LOLE AND ANOTHER V. BETTERIDGE—MALLAM, CLAIMANT.*

Bankruptcy—Sheriff—Proceeds of sale—Notice of bankruptcy petition—"Fourteen days," how and, prima facie, did not expire until midnight of October 2. If section 11, subsection 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, were taken by itself, it was obvious that the notice of the petition was given within the 14 days, because at 3 40 p.m. on October 2 the sheriff received the telegram. Was that section cut down by Rule 90? In his opinion the rule only applied to notices of procedure, and did not apply to such notices as this. This part of the rules was headed, "Service and execution of process." All the rules in this part, including Rule 90, applied to procedure notices, and to nothing else. Therefore Rule 90 did not apply, and he agreed with the decision of Mr. Justice Grove in "Curtis v. Wainbrook Iron Company" (Cab. and Ell., 351), which, no doubt, had been acted upon ever since. There was another ground upon which this case might be decided. There was nothing in Rule 90 which said that a notice served after 2 p.m. on Saturday was a bad notice for that day. The rule merely limited an hour of the day for the purpose of computing the date from which the other party had to do an act or take a step. The rule treated the service of a notice in certain cases as postponed for a particular purpose. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

LEWIS V. BURRELL.*

County Court—Practice—Pleading a statutory defence—Action on solicitor's bill of costs—6 and 7 Vict., c. 37, sec. 73.

This was an appeal from a judgment for the defendant by the Liverpool County Court Judge. The question raised was whether it was necessary for a defendant to plead as a statutory defence in an action on a solicitor's bill of costs in the County Court that the bill was not drawn up in the form required by the Solicitors Act, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 37, s. 73. At the action for the recovery of the bill of costs by Messrs. Herbert Lewis and Davies, solicitors, the point was taken that no proper signed bill of costs with details set out had been sent in, but no notice had been given of this defence.

Mr. BRYN ROBERTS appeared for the plaintiff. He referred to Order X., Rule 10, and 1 s. (a) of the County Court Rules. He said there was no case relating to this point under the Solicitors Act. There were, however, cases in respect to other Acts of Parliament which decided that notice must be given. He cited "Conroy v. Peacock" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 6), a case under the Employers' Liability Act where notice had not been given.

Mr. CRAWFORD appeared for the defendant, and urged that the solicitor was not prejudiced, because he had come supplied with authorities to show that the bill was sufficiently drawn out. The County Court Judge might, under section 87 of the County Court Act of 1888, have given leave to amend. It was very clear that the bill was not right. It only claimed a lump sum. The action was therefore wrong in its inception, as a solicitor was prohibited by the Solicitors Act, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 37, s. 73, from commencing the action unless the bill was drawn up in accordance with the Act. He admitted he could not plead the ground of defence without mentioning the statute.

The COURT held that a statutory defence ought to have been pleaded, and therefore granted the application of the plaintiff for a new trial.

FANCETT V. BIERMAN.*

Pawnbroker—Pawning without authority—Right of pawnbroker to prosecute—Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, sec. 33.

This was a special case stated by a metropolitan magistrate raising a question as to the right of pawnbrokers to prosecute a person pawning goods with them without authority. At the Marlborough-street Police-court a complaint was preferred by Thomas Fancett against Ann Bierman under section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, for pawning with the appellants, J. B. Harrison and J. H. Cawdell, pawnbrokers, a certain coat, the property of one J. Lawrence, without his authority. The magistrate dismissed the summons. The facts were these. Fancett was manager to the pawnbrokers. On November 30 the respondent pledged a coat with them for £1 1s., which coat had been given to the respondent's husband to repair. She had no authority to pledge it. On a summons taken out by Joseph Lawrence, the owner of the coat, against the pawnbrokers, under section 40 of the Pawnbrokers Act, they were ordered to hand over the coat to him. This they had done. The complaint in question was then made against the respondent. The magistrate found that she had committed the offence, but he dismissed the summons on the ground that it was an attempt to apply section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act to a state of things to which it was never meant to apply, the appellants having no right to give or withhold authority to the respondent to pledge the coat and not being injured by such pledging to which they were actually party. The magistrate thought that it was the party whose property was pledged who was the "party injured," and held that the appellants could not prosecute. The question was whether he was right in dismissing the summons. The section out of which the case arose was as follows:—"(33) If a person knowingly . . . pawns with a pawnbroker anything being the property of another person, the pawnbroker not being employed or authorized by the owner thereof to pawn the same, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable on conviction to forfeit any sum not exceeding £5, and in addition thereto any sum not exceeding the full value of the pledge. The forfeitures when recovered shall be applied towards making satisfaction thereout to the party injured."

Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., Mr. C. L. Attenborough with him, appeared for the appellants. No one appeared on the other side.

Mr. BUCKNILL argued that the magistrate was wrong. The person injured by the unlawful pawning was the pawnbroker. The owner of the coat could not be said to be the injured party for he had had it back.

The COURT adopted this view, and stated their opinion that the respondent ought to be convicted, and that the forfeiture imposed should be enough to make good the guinea lent by the pawnbrokers.

LEWIS V. CLAY.*

Bill of Exchange—Promissory note—Signature obtained by fraud—"Holder in due course"—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 20, 21, 29, 30, 38, 83, 84, 88, 89.

The facts of the case appear sufficiently in his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Pollard were counsel for the plaintiff; and Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Carson, Q.C., Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson, and Mr. W. E. Hume Williams represented the defendant.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said,—This is an action brought by the plaintiff as payee against the defendant to recover from him, as one of two makers, the amount of two joint and several promissory notes dated respectively June 15, 1896, one for £3,113 15s., payable three months after date, and the other for £8,000, payable six months after date. The name of the other joint and several maker on each promissory note is that of Lord William Nevill. It is admitted that the genuine signature of the defendant appears as maker on each of the promissory notes, which had been prepared in the plaintiff's office, and also that his genuine signature appears on two letters, one dated June 15 referring to the note of smaller amount, and one dated June 21, 1896, referring to the note of larger amount, authorizing the plaintiff to pay the proceeds to Lord William Nevill. The latter brought the promissory notes and letters to the plaintiff, who, it is admitted, gave value for them, and who is found by the jury to have taken them in good faith. The defendant contended that he was not liable on the ground that he had never been asked, and that he never intended to put his name on any bill or promissory note, or to take upon himself any contractual obligation or legal liability of any kind. He explained that he had just come of age in June, 1896; that he had known Lord William Nevill intimately for some years; that he and Lord William Nevill were members of the same Ascot party in that month; and that on Sunday, June 21, Lord William Nevill had come to his bed-room and asked him to witness some deed or document; that he produced a roll of papers covered up by blotting or other paper, in which there were four openings; that upon the defendant asking what the document was about, Lord William Nevill said he would show it if the defendant insisted, but he would rather not, for that it was a private matter, that he wanted a power of attorney, and that it had to do with his sister, Lady Cowley's marriage settlement, and to certain divorce proceedings then pending; that he (the defendant) did not insist on seeing the document, trusting to Lord William Nevill; that upon this the defendant signed his name, he believed four times, and he thought Lord William Nevill signed twice in the openings. He said he had signed his name with the single intention of witnessing the signature of Lord William Nevill. He added that up to that time he had had no reason to doubt the honour of Lord William Nevill, and that, so far as he knew, no one who knew Lord William had. The following questions were put to the jury, who gave the answer appended to each:—(1) Did the plaintiff take the promissory notes in good faith? [It is admitted he took them for value.] Answer.—Yes. (2) Is the defendant's account of the circumstances under which he signed his name substantially true? Answer.—Yes. (3) Was the defendant, in signing his name as he did, recklessly careless, and did he thereby enable

Lord William Nevill to perpetrate the fraud? Answer.—No; not under the circumstances. (4) Were the signatures to the documents given by the defendant in misplaced confidence in the statements of Lord William Nevill as to their nature? Answer.—Yes. (5) Did the defendant sign his name to be used by Lord William Nevill for any purpose he chose? Answer.—No. (6) Did the defendant attach his signature to the documents without due care? Answer.—No, not under the circumstances. I have now to consider in the light of these findings which of the parties is entitled to judgment. It is clear that the proof of the signature of the defendant to the promissory notes, coupled with proof of their delivery to the plaintiff under the apparent authority of the defendant, makes out a prima facie case for the plaintiff. Is it a conclusive case? Here two questions arise—(1) Is the defendant precluded or estopped from setting up the true circumstances under which his name came to appear on the documents in question? (2) If not, do those true circumstances afford an answer in point of law to the plaintiff's claim? As to the first question the defendant is not, in my judgment, estopped or precluded from setting up the actual facts upon any principle of law. Apart from statute such preclusion or estoppel can only arise (in circumstances like the present) where the defendant had so conducted himself that it would be contrary to natural justice to permit him to assume a position inconsistent with that which he had ostensibly occupied, or which he led others to believe he occupied, and upon which others had, misled by his conduct, been suffered to act. In the present case the suggestion on the part of the plaintiff is that the defendant had not used due care in signing his name, and that he had signed in misplaced confidence in Lord William Nevill. The jury have found that there was, in fact, no want of due care in the circumstances in signing his name as he did; but it was urged that the finding as to misplaced confidence was sufficient, and the authority of a distinguished American Judge in the case of "Putnam v. Sullivan" (4 Mass. Repts., p. 45, 1808) was cited. What does misplaced confidence mean? It may mean confidence placed where you know or ought to know it is not safe, or confidence placed where you have every right to believe it is safe, but where it is afterwards betrayed. The former, I think, is the case the learned Judge had in his mind, and the facts there may afford evidence of want of due care; but that clearly is not here the meaning attributed by the jury to misplaced confidence, for they have found that there was in the circumstances no want of due care on the part of the defendant. Taking the findings together they amount to this—that the defendant was in the circumstances guilty of no want of due care in placing confidence in the statement made by Lord William Nevill, and accordingly in signing his name as he did; and I decline to hold that the placing of confidence as here shown, which is afterwards betrayed, where it is not recklessly or negligently so placed, in any way precludes the defendant from setting up the true facts as a defence. I conclude, therefore, the defendant is not, upon any principle of law, estopped or precluded from setting up the true facts. How, then, is the plaintiff's case put? It was argued that whatever was the law before or apart from the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the facts here did not under that Act afford a defence as against a "holder in due course," which, it was said, the plaintiff was within section 29, and that the question must be determined by reference to that Act alone. I think this argument involves a misconception both of the plaintiff's position and of the scope and effect of the Act of 1882. It will be apparent from a consideration of the facts of the case that the plaintiff was not a "holder in due course" at all, but that he was, in fact, simply the named payee of two promissory notes. Further, an examination of sections 20, 21, 29, 30, and 38 relating expressly to bills, and sections 83, 84, 88, and 89 relating to promissory notes, will make it quite clear that "a holder in due course" is a person to whom, after its completion by and as between the immediate parties, the bill or note has been negotiated. In the present case the plaintiff is named as payee on the face of the promissory note, and therefore is one of the immediate parties. The promissory notes have, in fact, never been negotiated within the meaning of the Act. I desire to say here that, even if the plaintiff were "holder in due course," it would, in my judgment, make no difference in the result. But is the contention right that the Act of 1882 must alone be looked to? I think not. That Act was intended to be mainly a codification of the existing law, but it is not merely a codification Act, for some alterations of the law are clearly effected by it and it does not purport to be exhaustive, for by section 97 the rules of the Common Law (including the Law Merchant), save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, continue to apply. But I agree that in determining questions of liability on bills or notes it is proper to examine the Act before turning to the cases declaratory of the Common Law decided before that Act. It is unnecessary to set out the provisions of the Act and to comment in detail upon them. It is enough to say that there is nothing in the Act which prevents the defendant from setting up the defence that he never made the promissory note in question—which is the real defence here. It would, indeed, be strange if it did. For the purposes of the present case the question is precisely the same as if any other contract than one by promissory note had been written on the documents, to which the defendant was induced to sign his name—for instance, if it had been a contract of guarantee or suretyship. Then the question would have been—Did the defendant make the contract of guarantee or suretyship? Here it is—Did he make the promissory notes sued upon? The question, then, is, on the facts as they are now found to be—Did the defendant make the promissory notes in question? If he did not, then the finding of the jury that the defendant was not guilty of any want of due care establishes that he is not precluded from saying so. That there is a prima facie case on the plaintiff's evidence that he did, I have already said; but is that prima facie case rebutted and displaced by the defendant's evidence? According to that evidence it must, after the findings of the jury, be taken to be the fact that he thought he was witnessing a deed or document; that he was so told; that he had no idea of signing and was not asked to sign any bill or promissory note, or to undertake any contractual obligation of any kind. A promissory note is a contract by the maker to pay the payee. Can it be said that in this case the defendant contracted to pay the plaintiff? His mind never went with such a transaction; for all that appears, he had never heard of the plaintiff, and his mind was fraudulently directed into a different channel by the statement that he was merely witnessing a deed or other document. He had no contracting mind and his signature obtained, by untrue statements fraudulently made, to a document of the existence of which he had no knowledge cannot bind him. It is as if he had written his name for an autograph collector, or in an album. The case differs in no material respect from one in which a genuine signature is deftly transferred by delicate contrivance from one document to another, and so skilfully as to escape notice under ordinary examination. Or, again, if the body of the promissory notes had been fraudulently written above, and after his signature had been made, it would have been forgery, and in such case it is clear no recourse could be had upon it. Can it make any difference as to resulting contractual obligation that the body of the note was without his knowledge filled up before he was fraudulently induced to put his name in the belief that it was something wholly different? I think not. In plain reason it must be said that the use to which the defendant's signature was applied was in substance and effect forgery, whether or not it amounted to the criminal offence of forgery. I think it well to point out that cases like the present differ widely from those in which the party sought to be charged has agreed and intended to enter into contractual obligation by bill or note but has been defrauded into agreeing, or been defrauded in the manner in which the bill or note has been dealt with. In such cases he is liable, on principle and authority, to any one who has dealt with the bill or note in good faith and for value. It was in argument admitted that the case of "Foster v. Mackinnon" (4 L.R., C.P., 704) is in point, and is an authority binding on me if the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 has not altered the law as there declared. I find that the law has not been so altered. I see nothing in the Act to warrant the suggestion that it has been altered, and it is noteworthy that all the text-writers dealing with the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (including, indeed, the draftsman of the Act), treat that case as an existing authority. The facts in "Foster v. Mackinnon" were that an old man of feeble sight was induced—without, as the jury found, any negligence on his part—to sign his name on the back of a bill by the fraudulent statement that it was a guarantee which, in fact, he had undertaken to sign. The Court of Common Pleas (consisting of Chief Justice Bovill and Justices Byles, Keating, and Montagu Smith) held that he was not liable, and this in an action by what was then called a bona fide holder for value and without notice, of which "holder in due course" is now the legal equivalent. In these islands, cases in litigation of frauds such as that here practised are of rare occurrence, partly because of the existence and character of our stamp laws, but in the United States of America, where no such laws exist, there are many authorities dealing with points similar to that in the present case—"Douglas v. Matting" (4 Amer. Rep., 238, 1870); "Taylor v. Atchison" (5 Amer. Rep., 118, 1870); "Whitney v. Snyder" (2 Lans., 477, 1870); "Walker v. Egbert" (9 Amer. Rep., 548, 1871); and "Griffiths v. Kellogg" (20 Amer. Rep., 48, 1876). The great weight of United States authorities supports the view of the common law expressed by the English Judges. I have thought it right to say so much, but in truth these authorities are not necessary for the purposes of this case. They are all cases where the bills or notes had been negotiated to persons now called "holders in due course." It follows, if such a holder cannot in a case like the present recover, a fortiori that the plaintiff—who, as named payee, is one of the immediate parties—cannot recover. In the result, therefore, my judgment must be for the defendant, and the plaintiff must be enjoined from in any way dealing with the notes, and the same must be cancelled so far as they purport to be the notes of the defendant.

A stay of execution as to costs was granted, in view of an appeal.

HUTTLEY V. SIMMONS AND OTHERS.*

Trade Union—Inducing persons not to employ plaintiff—Conspiracy—“Allen v. Flood” (ante, p. 125) considered.

*Reported by J. E. ALDOUN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This case was tried on November 11 last. The plaintiff, a cabdriver, sued the defendant Simmons, who was the president of a strike committee of a trade union, and others, who were members of the same trade union, for damages sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the defendants having induced a cab proprietor named Young to refuse to engage the plaintiff to drive a cab for him, or to let a cab to the plaintiff to be so driven. The statement of claim alleged that the defendants acted maliciously in this respect, and also that they conspired together and with others to induce Young not to employ the plaintiff nor permit him to hire or drive a cab. The learned Judge directed the jury that there was no evidence against any of the defendants except Simmons; that there was no evidence of a contract between plaintiff and Young or any other person to employ plaintiff to drive a cab or to let a cab on hire to plaintiff; that there was no evidence that the defendant Simmons did anything to prevent any other person than Young from employing plaintiff. In answer to questions left to them by his Lordship the jury found as follows:—(1) Did the defendant Simmons induce Young not to engage plaintiff to drive a cab for him or to let on hire to plaintiff a cab to be so driven? Answer.—Yes. (2) If so, did the defendant Simmons do this maliciously in this sense? Did he induce Young to refuse to employ plaintiff or to let a cab on hire to him for either of the following reasons:—(a) In order to injure plaintiff? Answer.—Yes. (b) Or to procure some indirect advantage for himself, the defendant? Answer.—No. (c) Or to procure such advantage for others for whom defendant was acting? Answer.—Yes. (3) Did the defendant Simmons conspire with others—with other members of the Cabdrivers' Union, for example—to induce Young not to employ the plaintiff nor to permit him to hire and drive a cab? Answer.—Yes; and the jury assessed the damages at £5. Upon these findings the learned Judge entered judgment for the defendants other than Simmons. With regard to the defendant Simmons, his Lordship reserved judgment, having regard to the fact that this case must depend, except as to the finding on the question of conspiracy, upon the decision of the House of Lords in the case of “Allen v. Flood,” which was then awaiting judgment on appeal to the House of Lords from the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

Mr. W. M. Thompson and Mr. Lambert Bond appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Carson, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING delivered judgment this morning. Having stated the facts above set out, his Lordship proceeded:—I reserved judgment in order to save the parties the expense of an appeal from my judgment had I followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in “Allen v. Flood,” as I should have been bound at that time to do. The House of Lords gave judgment on the 14th of this month in favour of the appellant in “Allen v. Flood,” and that judgment binds me, as I understand it, to enter judgment in this case for the defendant Simmons upon every finding of the jury except that regarding conspiracy by the defendant. Nothing in this case which was done by the defendant would have amounted to an actionable wrong, except it were done maliciously in the sense defined by the Court of Appeal and found by the jury in this case, and I take the House of Lords to have now decided that the existence of a bad motive in the case of an act which is not of itself illegal will not convert that act into a civil wrong for which reparation may be due. This case, however, although in a great measure governed by the decision of the House of Lords in “Allen v. Flood,” is not concluded by that judgment. For in this case the jury have found that the defendant conspired with others to induce a person not to employ the plaintiff nor to permit him to hire and drive a cab. Upon the question thus raised, the judgment in “Allen v. Flood” is, I humbly conceive, of no authority, although Lord Shand in his judgment makes the following observations in this connexion:—“The case was not presented by the learned Judge to the jury as one of conspiracy, and does not raise any question of that kind. Combination of different persons in pursuit of a legitimate trade object occurred in the case of the Mogul Steamship Company, and was there held to be lawful. Combinations for no such object, but in pursuit really of a malicious purpose to ruin or injure another, would, I should say, be clearly unlawful; but this case raises no such question.” With every respect for this expression of his lordship's opinion on this matter, I am bound to observe that, by his own confession, this is merely obiter dictum; and therefore I must look elsewhere for authority. Now I take it to have been established by the judgment of the House of Lords in “Allen v. Flood” that (conspiracy apart) nothing proved to have been done by the defendant in this case amounted to an actionable wrong. Does, then, his having conspired with others to do those things render such otherwise innocent acts illegal and wrongful, so as to give plaintiff a right of action against him? I think I am bound by authority to come to a contrary conclusion. In the case of “The Queen v. Warburton” (L.R. 1, C.C.R., 274), Cockburn, C.J., delivering the judgment of the Court, says:—“It is sufficient to constitute a conspiracy if two or more persons combine by fraud and false pretences to injure another. It is not necessary, in order to constitute a conspiracy, that the acts agreed to be done should be acts which if done would be criminal. It is enough if the acts agreed to be done, although not criminal, are wrongful—i.e., amount to a civil wrong.” From the statement of the Court that it is enough if these acts do amount to a civil wrong, it is to be inferred that there would be no illegal conspiracy did those acts not amount to a civil wrong at the least. Now it is true that the judgment there was pronounced in a criminal case; but in the well-known case “The Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor,” Lord Coleridge, C.J., speaks thus:—“It cannot be, nor indeed was it denied, that in order to found this action there must be an element of unlawfulness in the combination on which it is founded, and that this element of unlawfulness must exist alike, whether the combination is the subject of an indictment or the subject of an action” (21 Q.B.D., at p. 549). This question is, moreover, to my mind, concluded by the very learned and admirable judgment of Pales, C.B., in “Kearney v. Lloyd” (L.R., Ireland, 27 Q.B., and Ex. Div., 268), which is to the effect that conspiracy to do certain acts gives a right of action only where the acts agreed to be done, and in fact done, would, had they been without preconcert, have involved a civil injury to the plaintiff. In this case it appears to me that I am bound by the decision of the House of Lords to hold that none of the acts done or agreed to be done gave the plaintiff any right of action for injury in law to any legal right of his, and, therefore, my judgment must be for the defendant.

ELLIS V. POND AND ANOTHER.*

Stockbroker—Agreement to carry over—Sale in breach of agreement—Loss by broker of right to indemnity.

Judgment of Mathew, J., varied.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew upon further consideration after the trial of the action with a special jury. There was also an application by the defendants for a new trial in respect of the counterclaim. The action was brought by Mr. Welbore Stuart Ellis, a stockbroker, to recover £8,551 losses alleged to have been incurred by him in respect of purchases and sales of stocks for and on behalf of the defendants, and for commission. The losses occurred owing to the sale of a large quantity of Metropolitan District Railway stock by the plaintiff to a dealer or jobber, at the price of 25, the stock having been bought at an average price of about 30. The sale took place on November 19, 1896, and the defendants contended that the sale on that day was unauthorized by them, and that the plaintiff in accordance with the understanding between him and them ought not to have sold the stock till November 26, the next settling day. It appeared that the defendants, having formed an intention to carry out a scheme for the construction of a deep level electric railway under the line of the Metropolitan District Railway Company, determined to buy large blocks of the stock of that company. The defendant Pond accordingly approached the plaintiff, informed him of the scheme, and instructed him to make purchases of District Railway stock on the Stock Exchange. The plaintiff made large purchases of that stock, and Mr. Pond paid him certain sums of money as cover, the stock being carried over from time to time. On November 19 the plaintiff, being then liable to dealers on the Stock Exchange for a large amount of stock, and thinking that he had not received as much cover as he was entitled to, closed the account by effecting a sale of the stock as above stated, having on the previous day given Mr. Pond notice of his intention to do so. The defendants, by way of counterclaim, claimed damages for breach of duty on the part of the plaintiff. The learned Judge left certain questions to the jury, which with their answers were as follows:—(1) Did the plaintiff agree not to sell the stock before November 26?—He did. (2) Did the defendants, when they employed the plaintiff as their broker, or at any other time, agree to give cover to any and what amount?—There was no agreement at first, but the defendants afterwards admitted the plaintiff's right to cover. (3) Did the plaintiff agree to give the defendants notice before he closed the account, and was the notice he gave reasonable?—There is no evidence of any agreement to give the defendants notice, but we consider the notice was unreasonably short. (4) Did the plaintiff in selling the stock act in good faith and with proper care and skill? He did not. (It was admitted that this merely meant that the sale was a wrongful one, there being no suggestion of bad faith, fraud, or collusion.) (5) If the stock had not been disposed of to Mr. Smith (that is on November 19) for what amount could the plaintiff have sold it?—£28. (6) Did the plaintiff, as broker for the defendants, agree with the defendants to assist them in carrying out the scheme of the Electric Railway?—Yes. (7) Did he fail to do so?—No. The learned Judge, after hearing argument, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £4,151, such sum representing the amount which would have been due to the plaintiff if he had sold the stock at 28. He also gave judgment for the plaintiff on the counterclaim.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the defendants.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. C. C. Scott (Mr. Whately with them) appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day, varying the judgment of the Court below, Lord Justice Rigby dissenting. The Court also dismissed the application for a new trial.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The first question raised upon this appeal is whether a stockbroker who in the ordinary course of business upon the Stock Exchange has rendered himself personally liable to a jobber upon the purchase of stocks on behalf of a principal, and who has contracted for good consideration with that principal that the stocks shall be carried over and not sold before the then next settling day, loses his right of indemnity against his principal if before that day he in breach of his contract sells the stocks against his principal. The broker does not dispute that he is liable to his principal for the damages the latter may sustain by reason of his breach of contract, but he insists that, although he has broken his contract with his principal, he is still entitled to be indemnified by him from the liability he is under to the jobber. Taking the findings of the jury which are not impeached, and the other proved or admitted facts of this case, they may be stated as follows:—The plaintiff is a stockbroker upon the London Stock Exchange and the defendant Pond (I omit the syndicate) was his client. It is unnecessary to go into the purposes for which the stocks were purchased; it is sufficient to say that prior to November 10, 1896, the plaintiff, as broker, had purchased heavy amounts of stock for the defendant, and upon that day, which was a settling day, the position of matters was this. The plaintiff then held a large amount of the stock so purchased for the defendant, which had been closed by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, and paid for by the plaintiff by his own or borrowed money. There was also at this date stock of the value of £35,000 nominal still open which the plaintiff as broker had previously purchased for the defendant. There was also stock amounting to £14,000 nominal which the plaintiff purchased upon that day, November 10, 1896, for the defendant at his request, but not paid for. This £35,000 of stock the defendant was desirous of having carried over at the then current price of the day—viz., 29½, till the next settling day, and this was the price at which the £14,000 stock had been purchased by the plaintiff for the defendant on that day. In these circumstances the plaintiff for good consideration agreed with the defendant that the £35,000 of stock should be carried over until the next settling day, and he further agreed that none of the stocks above mentioned should be sold before the next settling day, which was November 26, 1896. Upon November 19, 1896, however, the plaintiff for his own purposes sold the stocks at 25, and in so doing did not, as the jury have found, act in good faith and with proper care and skill. The learned counsel on either side agree that the not acting in good faith as found by the jury meant that the sale was not in the honest exercise of a right, in other words, that it was a wrongful sale against the defendant. If these stocks had not been sold until November 26, 1896, as had been agreed, they would have realized 28. Upon November 24, 1896, which it will be seen was two days before the next settling day, the plaintiff issued his writ in this action against the defendant, and the endorsement thereon claimed to recover £8,551—balance of moneys due in respect of stocks and shares bought and sold by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request, and he took proceedings thereon under Order XIV. for summary judgment, which, however, were not successful. As regards the stocks which the plaintiff purchased for the defendant and closed at request of the defendant by paying for them with his own or borrowed money, in my judgment he is entitled to sue the defendant for money paid by the plaintiff at his request, and as to these stocks the plaintiff is entitled to recover the difference between what he paid for them and what they would have realized upon November 26, 1896. The case of "Duncan v. Hill" (L.R., 8 Ex., 242) in the Exchequer Chamber shows that this is so. See the point as to the £1,688 in that case. But, although this is so, the defendant is entitled to the damages he has sustained by reason of the plaintiff selling these stocks before November 26, 1896, in breach of his contract with the defendant—"Lacey v. Hill, Seringgeour's Claim" (L.R., 8 Ch., 921). I now come to the claim of the plaintiff against the defendant to be indemnified by him against the difference between the price at which the £35,000 of stock was carried over—viz., 29½—and the price it would have realized upon November 26, 1896, and also for indemnity against the difference between the price at which the unpaid-for stock of £14,000 was purchased and the price it would have realized upon that day. That the broker (the plaintiff) made himself personally liable to the jobber in respect of these stocks is undoubted, his obligation being that if upon the settling day he did not pass to the jobber the name of a purchaser willing to take the stocks at the contract price he (the broker) would indemnify the jobber against any difference or loss the jobber might sustain thereby. It cannot be denied that down to November 19, 1896, the defendant was under liability to the plaintiff to indemnify him against the claims of the jobber should he (the defendant) break his contract with the plaintiff, and what this contract was I will state in a moment. I do not doubt that if the plaintiff had upon November 19, 1896, rightfully sold against the defendant, although it was before the settling day of November 26, 1896, he would have been entitled to be indemnified by the defendant for the difference between what he then sold at and what, if anything, he had to pay the jobber, for the defendant would upon this hypothesis have renounced the further performance of his contract with the plaintiff, and the plaintiff would then, upon the authority of such cases as "Hochster v. De la Tour" (2 E. and B., 678) and "Frost v. Knight" (L.R., 7 Ex., 111), have been entitled to treat the contract as at an end and to sell against the defendant, and be indemnified by him against any difference there might be between the then selling price and the price contracted to be paid to the jobber. But this, upon the findings of the jury, is not what the plaintiff has done. He has before the next settling day wrongfully sold against the defendant, and he now asks the defendant to indemnify him against the consequences, not of his rightful, but of his wrongful, sale. When this case is understood it will, I think, be found to be the case of an agent asking his principal to indemnify him against the consequences of his own wrong. If the old money count of money paid at the defendant's request had been resorted to by the plaintiff to recover the difference, the answer of the defendant would have been, "You never paid these differences to the jobber at my request, for what you are suing me for are differences arising out of your having acted directly contrary to my request," and thus this count could not be supported by proof. I now assume a claim founded upon a contract to indemnify, which is the only other claim the plaintiff has as regards the £35,000 and £14,000 of stock. First of all, what is the contract of a buying principal with the broker? In my judgment his contract is that if the broker will purchase shares for him he (the principal) will upon the settling day take up and pay for the stock so purchased by the broker, and that if he does not he (the principal) will indemnify the broker from the claim of the jobber. This, in my opinion, is the contract between a buying principal and the broker. In an action for indemnity by the broker he must aver and prove a promise by the defendant to indemnify him against loss occasioned to him by reason of his (the defendant) not performing his contract with the plaintiff, that is, as before stated, not taking up and paying for the stock upon the settling day; and secondly, he must aver and prove by way of breach that the defendant refused or neglected to perform his contract in that behalf, whereby the plaintiff has been damaged. If the plaintiff does not establish that the defendant has refused or neglected to perform his contract with him, in my judgment he clearly fails in his action for indemnity, for it is only upon proof of such refusal or neglect that the right to indemnity arises. Now, how can the plaintiff prove that in this case the defendant has refused or neglected to take up and pay for the stock upon the settling day, when he has not done so? Upon November 19, 1896, that is, seven days before the settling day, upon which the defendant first came under obligation to the plaintiff to take up and pay for the stock, the plaintiff, in bad faith and without proper care and skill, had sold against him to a person named Smith, and upon November 24, 1896, two days before the settling day, he had brought the present action for the £8,551, showing unequivocally that, as far as he was concerned and was able to bring it about, the transaction between him and the defendant was at an end, and that when November 26, 1896, came, no stock whatever would be tendered to the defendant, as in fact it was not. It was not before the settling day that the broker had to pass a name of a purchaser of the stock to the jobber, and it was perfectly open to the broker upon that day to pass the name of Smith. By selling to Smith stock of similar amount to that in respect of which the plaintiff had contracted with the jobber to pass to him the name of a purchaser upon the settling day, the broker (the plaintiff) by passing Smith's name performed his contract with the jobber, subject of course to his liability to make good to the jobber any difference there might be between the contract price and that agreed to be paid by Smith. That the contract with the jobber was thus fulfilled appears to me clear, and he had no claim or remedy whatever against the defendant, the original principal. The real truth is, when the broker (the plaintiff) sold against the defendant upon November 19, he substituted Smith as purchaser in the defendant's place, and by passing Smith's name to the jobber, the broker's contract with him was performed. It appears to me that the plaintiff altogether fails to show that the defendant refused or neglected to perform his contract with the plaintiff, for by the plaintiff's own wrongful act the defendant has been prevented from performing it, and consequently an action for an indemnity in this case cannot be supported. The case of "Duncan v. Hill" is a direct authority that there is no implied promise by a buying principal to his broker that he will indemnify him from the consequences of his own wrong. If I had come to a contrary conclusion I should not have thought anything of this point, under the peculiar circumstances existing as to the £8,000 being brought into Court by the defendant, that there could only have been a declaration for an indemnity and not judgment for the amount of the deficiency. For the reasons above, in my judgment the defendant is entitled to have judgment entered for him upon the plaintiff's claim for indemnity, and as regards the stocks which were open and not paid for upon November 10, 1896. As to the second question, the application for a new trial raised upon the defendant's counterclaim for £25,000 against the plaintiff—viz., for not assisting the defendant in carrying out the scheme of the electric railway, I am of opinion that it should be refused. The jury had to consider, first, whether such a promise was made; secondly, what was the meaning of it, if made; and thirdly, whether the plaintiff had done all that he had promised to do under the vague term "to assist." They have found that he promised to assist, and that he did so. Upon the evidence read to the Court, I can see that the jury were well warranted in this last finding—viz., that the plaintiff had performed his promise. Down to a certain period, the plaintiff manifestly did assist the defendant; and it may well be that the jury thought by what he had done in the circumstances which existed that he had amply fulfilled his promise. The result is that the appeal as to entering judgment for the defendant for that part of the claim above mentioned must be allowed, and the appeal as to the new trial must be refused.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read a judgment to the effect that the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment to the same effect as that of Lord Justice A. L. Smith.

UNITED GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY (LIMITED) V. WELCH AND CO.*

Practice—Order XIV.—Leave to defend—Matter of defence or counter-claim.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Day, giving the plaintiffs leave to sign final judgment under Order XIV. The defendant, who was an electrical engineer, bought goods under a contract of sale from the plaintiffs, who were a company carrying on business in Scotland, out of the jurisdiction of the High Court, and were in liquidation. One of the terms of the contract was that the plaintiffs should deliver the goods to the defendant properly packed with a view to their being sent abroad. The plaintiffs having brought this action to recover the price of the goods, the defendant alleged that the goods had not been delivered properly packed, and claimed to deduct the sum which he had spent in having them properly packed. Mr. Justice Day, on the hearing of the plaintiffs' application for summary judgment under Order XIV., said that the defendant's complaint was a matter of counter-claim, and not of defence, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment in this action, leaving the defendant at liberty, if he thought fit, to bring another action against the plaintiffs for breach of contract. It was now argued on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiffs' breach of duty with regard to a matter which was part of the contract was, on the authorities, a matter of defence, and that the defendant ought not to be obliged to prove in the liquidation of a company out of the jurisdiction.

Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the defendant; Mr. Addleshaw for the plaintiffs.

The COURT held that the plaintiffs ought not to have been allowed to sign summary judgment, and that the defendant ought to be allowed to defend the action.

IN THE MATTER OF THE MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) ACT, 1884—IN THE MATTER OF THE ELECTION FOR THE SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (WESTMINSTER DIVISION), EX PARTE KYD AND OTHERS.*

Election Law—School Board—Application for relief—Rule as to costs of opponents to successful application.

On November 23 last an application was made to the Court on behalf of David Hope Kyd and certain other persons, candidates for the election for the School Board for London, for relief under section 20 of the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., c. 70). The relief was prayed in respect of the holding by the applicants of a meeting for the purpose of procuring their election upon premises known as St. George's Institute, Little Grosvenor-street, on part of which intoxicating liquors were supplied to a workmen's club. The application was made upon the ground of inadvertence and was granted. A full report of the proceedings appeared in The Times of November 24. Mr. Spokes, who opposed the application on behalf of one of the other candidates, applied for costs against the applicant. That question was reserved by their Lordships.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in granting costs against the applicant, said that the Court had reserved the question of costs in order to see if there were any general rule on the subject. Cases had been brought to their notice, but no general rule had been shown. Where the illegal practice was not serious, it did not seem to them that the opponents of the application for relief ought to have their costs. But where the illegality was serious, it was to the interest of the public not to prevent such matters from being brought forward. The illegality was serious in this case, and costs would therefore be allowed.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY concurred. He said that whenever a case was a serious one the freest inquiry ought to be encouraged to see that the Act had been observed.

Mr. S. H. Day appeared for the applicant.

NEALE V. MITCHELL AND CO.†

Settlement—Marriage with deceased husband's brother—Failure of trusts.

"Chapman v. Bradley" (4 D., J., and S., 71) and "Pawson v. Brown" (13 Ch.D., 202) distinguished.

This was an action which had been referred from Birmingham by his Lordship for further consideration, to enforce an equity of redemption of a mortgage of some licensed premises known as the Queen's Head, Smethwick, Staffordshire.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., with Mr. Leslie, appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. A. R. Jelf, Q.C., with him Mr. Montague Lush and Mr. Hugo Young, for the defendants; Mr. Cracroft held a watching brief.

This case arose under the following peculiar circumstances. In 1852 the mother of the plaintiff, whose first husband had died intestate, mortgaged the premises to one Bailey, of whose mortgage the defendants are transferees. In 1852 the mother, before going through the form of marriage with her deceased husband's brother, executed what purported to be a settlement of her property, subject to the said mortgage, by which it was reserved to herself and her heirs until the "solemnization of the then intended marriage," with limitations thereafter to herself for life and then to her two younger sons; but it gave no life interest for the intended husband nor any provision for the children of the union in prospect. In 1852 she went through a form of marriage with her deceased husband's brother, and died in 1894. The plaintiff, her eldest son, now said that he had been kept in ignorance of the contents of this settlement until her death, and brought this action to enforce his rights as his mother's heir-at-law.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
†Reported by A. E. RIPLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. LAWRENCE asserted that the plaintiff was heir-at-law of his mother, and claimed as such an equity of redemption of the mortgaged premises. He did this relying on the first provisions of the settlement of 1852, inasmuch as no legal marriage had taken or could ever have taken place. The plaintiff, having had no notice of the contents of the settlement, could not be accused of standing by in any way. He had taken the first opportunity offered him of asserting his rights. In support of his contentions the learned counsel quoted "Ramsden v. Dyson" (1 L.R., Eng. and Ir. App., p. 129); "Willmott v. Barber" (L.R., 15 Ch. Div., p. 96); "Pawson v. Brown" (L.R., 13 Ch. Div., p. 202); and "Chapman v. Bradley" (4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, p. 71).

Mr. JELF, for the defendants, contended that the settlement was a good deed in so far as it operated as a voluntary conveyance; that in the case of "Chapman v. Bradley" (supra) the Judges had looked into the intention of the parties; that in this case the intention of the parties to secure the property to the children of the first marriage, free from the influence of the second husband, was manifest; and that the dependence of the deed on the fulfilment of the unlawful condition, deliberately contemplated and arranged for, was not material.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, following, maintained that the words "intended marriage" in the deed, not being "intended legal marriage," were the pivot on which the case turned; that the total absence of any provision for the husband or children of the second union prevented the deed being regarded as in any sense an ordinary marriage settlement. He distinguished the cases of "Chapman v. Bradley" and "Pawson v. Brown" (cited above) from the present one, as in those the intention was that legal marriages should be completed, and provisions for their results were made. This could not possibly have been contemplated in the present case. It remained, therefore, that the condition referred to was inoperative, and the deed a voluntary settlement.

Mr. LAWRENCE having replied,

His LORDSHIP drew the attention of the learned counsel to the judgments of Lords Cairns and Hatherley in the case of "Dorin v. Dorin" (L.R., 7 Eng. and Ir. App., p. 568), saying that they seemed to provide him a precedent for looking at the facts of the case, and admitting evidence, if any, that the parties in the present case could not have contemplated marriage.

Mr. LAWRENCE pointed out that the impossibility of the intention was very much greater in "Dorin v. Dorin" than in the present case, that further it was a case of a will, and would therefore be construed more widely in favour of the intention of the testator.

His LORDSHIP, in delivering a considered judgment, said that Mr. Lawrence, on behalf of the plaintiff, claimed the reconveyance of the property, subject to the mortgage, as the heir-at-law of his mother. He had therefore only to deal with the construction of the deed which purported to be a marriage settlement, and there was no rule of law or public policy which prevented his giving to the document what he believed to be the meaning contemplated by the parties. In the cases where the word "children" was used in such documents it was necessary as a rule to understand that legitimate children were meant, but in the case of "Dorin v. Dorin" (supra), where the prospect of legitimate offspring was not possible, the construction was different. With this ruling in his mind and believing that the widow intended to marry her deceased husband's brother, and that she was perfectly aware that it would not be a legal marriage, he came to the conclusion that both parties knew what they were doing when they executed this deed. This enabled him to distinguish the cases of "Chapman v. Bradley" and "Pawson v. Brown," as in each of them one of the parties believed in the validity of the settlement, and therefore exact effect had to be given to the actual wording; but here he would give effect to what in his opinion was the intention of the parties, and to which, moreover, he believed the plaintiff was an assenting party, by giving judgment for the defendant with costs.

RISHTON V. MAYOR OF HASLINGDEN.*

Local Government—Streets—Apportionment of expenses of sewerage—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vic., c. 57)—"Street"—"Repairable by the public at large."

This was a special case stated by magistrates of the borough of Haslingden upon the hearing of objections to a provisional apportionment of the expenses proposed to be incurred in sewerage a street in the borough under the Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vic., c. 57).

Mr. Lochnis appeared for the objector, the appellant; Mr. Temple Franks for the authority.

The case was argued on December 10 and 11, and the Court took time to consider their judgment. The objections raised before the justices were that the street did not form part of a street within the meaning of section 5 of the Act; secondly, that it was not repairable by the inhabitants at large; and, lastly, that the street had already been sewered to the satisfaction of the sanitary authority. The magistrates had decided in favour of the authority that the street was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. They did this on the following amongst other grounds—namely, that the surface of the street was the only original soil and the width only 8ft. 6in. They considered also from the position of the street, which ran parallel to a street called Pleasant-street, that it was a mere passage or back street used by the tenants of the houses in Pleasant-street. They were further of opinion that the sewer laid down was faulty, and the houses were not properly drained by it. The other material facts of the case sufficiently appear in the judgment of the Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Channell and Mr. Justice Hawkins, which was this morning delivered by Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL to the following effect:—This was a case stated by magistrates. The appellant Rishton had duly objected to being charged with a proportion of the expenses of sewerage a street called Back Pleasant-street in Haslingden. The magistrates decided against him subject to the case. The objections were—(1) that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; (2) that it had already been sewered to the satisfaction of the authority. The case stated that Back Pleasant-street was formed between 1806 and 1816, and was then and has remained always open at both ends into old highways, and that the streets and buildings have existed in their present condition and position for 70 years at least, and there was an express admission that, since its formation, Back Pleasant-street had been used by foot passengers without interruption. The case then set out the evidence and the magistrates stated certain reasons for coming to the conclusion that it was not a highway repairable by the public, and they submitted two questions for the Court:—(1) Were we right in overruling the objection taken on behalf of the appellant that the onus probandi was upon the respondents to show that Back Pleasant-street was a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and that they had failed to do so; (2) were we justified upon the evidence in holding that Back Pleasant-street is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large? The first question was not very important. The onus probandi clearly was on the respondent, but as evidence on both sides was now before the Court it was not necessary to consider what would have been the effect of the respondent's evidence if it had stood alone. In the second question the magistrates asked whether they were justified in finding as they did. That meant was there any evidence on which they could so find. If the matter had been open to the Court they would probably have found that Back Pleasant-street had been a highway not only for foot passengers but also for carts and carriages. It was a very strong fact that it was from the first a thoroughfare open at the ends to old highways. The fact that no repairs had been done by the public was a matter of small weight having regard to the nature of the place, and the suggested repairs at private expense were only clearing of refuse away and other small matters. If it was a highway before 1835 it would be repairable by the inhabitants at large without any formalities being gone through to take it over. But that whole question was not open to the Court, and as there was evidence of one case of a horse and cart being stopped, and as upon the question of carriage-way the fact that the public had not repaired was a much stronger piece of evidence than it was in reference to a footway, the Court could not hold that there was no evidence upon which the magistrates could find that this was not a public carriage-way. Upon the question whether it was a public footway the admissions were conclusive, and there was nothing in the evidence inconsistent with that. The points alleged to justify the finding of the magistrates that there was no public footway before 1835—namely, the absence of proof of public repairs, the suggested proof of private repairs, and the original construction of the passage in question really favoured the view that the street was a public footway. The private repairs were not proved even in the view of the magistrates, and the absence of public repairs was accounted for by the nature of the place. The case must, therefore, be dealt with on the footing that prior to 1835 it was a public footway. That being so, and there having been no addition to the old footway, the Court were of opinion that the place in question was not a street within the definition in the Act. It was not like a case where, there being an old footway, a new street had been formed by throwing into it more land. On that ground, therefore, the appeal must be allowed, and it became unnecessary to decide the other questions, whether the urban authority could declare themselves not satisfied with the sewerage of Back Pleasant-street, or whether the case came within the doctrine of "Bonella v. Twickenham Board" (20 Q.B.D., 63). It seemed to the Court that it was, in fact, sewerage, although imperfectly, and that as there had been no change in it for 70 years and the authority had been satisfied with it ever since they became an authority they could not say they were now dissatisfied. The case of "Handsworth Local Board v. Taylor" ([1897] 2 Ch., 442, note) only seemed to apply to a growing street. Thus in the present case if there had been new buildings fronting this street the authority might have said they had never been satisfied with the sewerage of the street which it had become. The necessity for the sewer now proposed had not arisen from any change of things in the street, but from a new general system of sewerage of the district having been recently adopted. If this view were correct the appeal should be allowed on this ground also, but the Court had not very fully considered it, and the judgment was based upon the ground that the place in question was not a street within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, being a footway repairable by the public at large.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS had added a note at the end of the judgment saying he entirely concurred in it.

ST. PAUL, CAMDEN-SQUARE.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Ritual—Lighted candles on the re-table (see ante, p. 85)—Supplementary judgment.

In this case, in which the Chancellor recently granted the Rev. George Tiley, the vicar of St. Paul's, Camden-square, a faculty for placing two lights on the re-table at early celebrations only in that church,

The CHANCELLOR now delivered the following supplementary judgment.—Subsequent to the delivery of my judgment in this case, Mr. Meakin, the respondent, made an application for the insertion in the faculty authorizing two lights to be placed on the re-table of a proviso that they should be removed from the re-table after each early celebration and not replaced there during the later services except when required for the purpose of giving light. I directed the application to be made formally in Court. As it was held in the case of "Westerton v. Liddell" (Moore's Spec. Reports, 187, Lond., 1857) that candlesticks with candles in them were lawful ornaments for a Holy Table, the insertion of such a provision would be on this as well as on the ground of inconvenience objectionable. My order will be that a faculty issue to the petitioners to place two candlesticks with candles in them on the re-table; and being satisfied on the evidence that it was the wish of many of those who attended the early celebrations and was objected to by none, that the candles should be lighted at such services when not required to give light, I, in the exercise of my discretion, decline to order a proviso to be inserted in the faculty prohibiting their being lighted at such celebrations when not required to give light. But being satisfied on the evidence that their being lighted at the later services in the church, when not required to give light, would give great offence to many members of the congregation attending such services, I order a proviso to be inserted in the faculty that they shall be only lighted at the later celebrations and the later services in the church when required to give light. My reason for making the order in these terms is as follows:—

*Reported by W. J. SCULSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In "Martin v. Mackonochie" (see L. R., 2 A. and E. 116) Sir Robert Phillimore in the Archies held that two lighted candles, though not required to give light, if not used ceremoniously, might be lawfully placed, as church ornaments, on the Holy Table during the service at the time of the Holy Communion for the signification "that Christ is the very true light of the world." The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, on appeal, held that two lighted candles, when not required for light, were unlawful as ornaments upon a Holy Table. Archbishop Benson in the Bishop of Lincoln's case ([1891] P., 9) held that it was open to this Court to reconsider this question on new materials brought before it and in particular the decisions of two common law Judges in 1628 and 1629 at the Durham Assizes, who both held on an indictment of Mr. Cosins (afterwards Bishop Cosins) that the burning of lighted candles on the Holy Table when not required to give light was no breach of the Act of Uniformity. The Judicial Committee on appeal (in reference to his Grace's decision on this point) said "it was matter for grave consideration how far the Archbishop's elaborate exposition of the history of the question, and in particular the decision of the two learned Judges, had afforded new materials for consideration since the decision of the Board in 'Martin v. Mackonochie,' but that the charge against the Bishop of Lincoln—there being no evidence that he was a party to placing the lights there or that he had used them ceremoniously, and they not being under his personal control—did not raise the same question, and that it was therefore unnecessary for the Board then to decide it. There being a conflict between the judgments of the two Archiepiscopal Courts and the Judicial Committee on this question, I consider it to be my duty, as a Judge in a Court of first instance, not to discuss and determine which of the three superior Courts have arrived at a correct solution of the question, but to make an order in such terms as will enable either of the parties to this suit to bring the question before the Judicial Committee for its final determination. If it shall be ultimately determined by the final Court of Appeal that lighted candles on a Holy Table when not required to give light, though not used ceremoniously, are not lawful Church ornaments, then I ought in my order to have inscribed a proviso prohibiting their being lighted on such occasions. But if the decisions of Sir Robert Phillimore and Archbishop Benson are upheld, then my order in its entirety should be upheld. For Church ornaments, the use of which is not prescribed by the rubrics or canons, or which are not of necessity subsidiary to the performance of Divine service, ought not by law to be introduced into a church for the purpose of decoration without the sanction of a faculty, and the Ecclesiastical Judge in giving or withholding his sanction to the faculty is bound to exercise a judicial discretion. In my judgment it would be an unwise exercise of his discretion to sanction the introduction of any such ornament that would give offence to parishioners and might in result induce them to withdraw from the services in their parish church. It is for this reason that I insert the proviso in the second part of my order, prohibiting the candles being lighted when not required to give light at any service in this church subsequent to the early celebrations, and I give no decision on the question whether the lighting of the candles when not required for light at the early celebrations is legal or not legal. I make no order as to costs.

The CHANCELLOR added:—I leave the question of light undecided. I do not give them leave to light and I do not prohibit them.

Mr. MEAKIN intimated that he should appeal.

LEEDS AND HANLEY THEATRE OF VARIETIES (LIMITED).
V. BROADBENT.*

Contract—Mortgage deed—Construction—Payment of interest—"Punctually," meaning of. Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 117), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, dated December 10 last, and reported in The Times of the following day; also ante, p. 117. The defendants were the owners of a theatre. In February, 1897, they sold the theatre to the plaintiffs for £10,500, out of which sum it was agreed that £7,000 should remain on mortgage. A mortgage to secure payment of that amount, with interest payable half-yearly, was accordingly executed by the plaintiffs in favour of the defendants. The deed contained a proviso that payment of the principal money thereby secured should not be required by the mortgagees until the expiration of three years, computed from the date of the deed, if in the meantime every half-yearly payment of interest should be "punctually" paid. The deed contained no express power of sale, and accordingly the provisions as to a sale contained in section 20 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 41), were applicable. The first half-year's interest on the £7,000 became due on August 15, 1897, and on August 16 one of the defendants, Broadbent, by whom the matter was transacted, not having received a cheque, wrote to the secretary of the company asking for immediate payment. In reply, the secretary stated that the letter should be submitted to the directors at their meeting on the Friday following. Mr. Broadbent, being dissatisfied with this reply, gave notice calling in the mortgage at the end of three months. The letter was acknowledged, but no cheque sent, and on August 24 Mr. Broadbent wired threatening to issue a writ unless the interest was remitted that day, and the result was that a cheque was then sent, not by the company, but by a gentleman who had an interest in the company's property. The defendants having expressed their intention of holding by the notice and requiring payment accordingly, the plaintiffs brought this action and now moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling or advertising for sale the premises comprised in the mortgage and from otherwise in any manner enforcing the same. The main question argued was whether the payment of interest nine days after it became due—viz., on August 24 instead of on the 15th—was a "punctual" payment within the meaning of the proviso, or whether "punctually" ought to be construed literally. It was decided by Mr. Justice Kekewich that the delay of nine days not being unreasonable there had been no default in punctual payment, and consequently that the notice given by the defendants was bad and there must be an injunction to restrain them from acting on it.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. A. J. ALLEN (Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., with him), for the appellants, relied on "Hicks v. Gardner" (1 Jurist, p. 541); Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Church were for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS were unanimously of opinion that the appeal must be allowed. They considered that the parties must be taken to have meant what they said—namely, that if the half-year's payment of interest was paid on the day upon which it became due the principal money should not be called in; and that, as the interest was not paid until nine days later, the notice calling in the mortgage debt was validly given. The injunction granted by the learned Judge in the Court below was accordingly dissolved.

THE CANNON BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED) V. NASH.*
Landlord and Tenant—Tenancy, length of—Agreement—Construction.

This was an appeal by the defendant from an order of Mr. Justice Day at Chambers. The defendant became tenant to the plaintiffs of a publichouse on January 15, 1897, under an agreement of that date, which provided that the term should be for one year certain and so on from year to year unless or until the tenancy thereby created should be determined by either party giving to the other 28 days' notice in writing, such notice to expire at any period of the year without any reference in respect of such notice to the time of entry, the date of the agreement, or the commencement of the tenancy. On October 13, 1897, the plaintiffs gave the defendant 28 days' notice to quit, and at the expiration of the 28 days they brought this action to recover possession of the premises. Upon an application for judgment under Order 14 Mr. Justice Day gave the plaintiffs leave to sign final judgment. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Woodfin appeared for the defendant; Mr. A. H. Spokes appeared for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that this was a simple question of construction. The tenancy was for one year certain. The contention of the plaintiffs would make that one year uncertain. The words as to giving notice were not applicable to the first year, but only to the period after the expiration of that year. This view was in accordance with the decision in "Doe v. Green" (9 A. and E., 658). The order must therefore be discharged.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. The agreement provided for two things—first, a tenancy for a year certain, and, next, an uncertain term after the first year. [Solicitors—Boulton, Sons, and Sandeman, for the plaintiffs; S. E. Lambert, for the defendant.]

KAYE V. CROYDON TRAMWAYS COMPANY.†
Company—Ultra vires Act—General meeting—Sale of undertaking to new company—Remuneration to directors—Compensation—Dissident shareholders.

This action was brought by a shareholder in the above-named company on behalf of himself and other shareholders, claiming an injunction to restrain the company and the directors from carrying out an agreement for the sale of the company's undertaking to the British Electric Traction Company (Limited). By the agreement it was provided that in addition to the purchase money of £30,543 the traction company should pay a sum of £3,230 to the officers of the tramways company, viz.—£1,230 to the chairman, £500 to the secretary, and £500 to each of the directors—as compensation for the loss of five years' remuneration for their services. The purchase money was calculated so as to pay off the preference shareholders in full, and to repay 60 per cent. of the capital to the ordinary shareholders, the traction company taking over the debenture debt and the contracts, engagements, and liabilities of the tramways company. It was contended that the purchase money was inadequate, but the main ground of complaint was the provision for the payment of a lump sum to the officers of the tramways company. On behalf of the defendants it was said that the time was approaching when, under the provisions of the Tramways Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 78), the Corporation of Croydon, as the local authority, would be entitled to purchase the undertaking of the tramways company, and that the corporation would exercise their power of purchase and refuse to grant a lease unless the line were relaid and electric traction provided, and that the price which the tramways company would receive on the basis of the decision of the House of Lords in the "Edinburgh Street Tramways Company's case" (L.R. [1894], A.C. 456) was very considerably less than the sum which the traction company was prepared to pay, and would probably leave no return whatever to the ordinary shareholders. A resolution confirming the agreement was, notwithstanding the opposition of the plaintiff, passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the company duly convened. It was, however, alleged that the notice convening the meeting did not sufficiently call attention to the terms of the purchase, and to the fact that under the agreement the shareholders in the tramways company would be liable to defray the costs of their liquidation.

Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Bradford appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Rowden for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said that if this agreement were binding on the dissident shareholder it must be on the ground that the extraordinary general meeting of the company had adopted it so as to be binding on him; and for that purpose it was necessary that the Court should be satisfied not only that the matter was one which could properly be brought before the meeting, but that it was, by advertisement or otherwise, duly brought to the attention of the shareholders. His Lordship referred to section 71 of the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1843, which merely requires that the notice of meeting should specify the "purpose" for which it is called. Though the section expressly said that only the purpose was to be specified, regard must be had to all the circumstances, and what would be a sufficient notification of the purpose in one case might not be so in another. In the present case the notice appeared to be wanting in precision and erroneous. The notice stated that the price to be paid would pay off the preference shareholders and return 60 per cent. to the ordinary shareholders. But from the sum which was calculated at the rate of 60 per cent. there would have to be deducted certain costs and expenses, and there was no guarantee in the agreement that the 60 per cent. should be returned intact. Again, the terms of the notice as to the taking over of liabilities by the purchasing company did not show whether the selling company would or would not remain in any way liable or whether there would be a complete novation. The notice also stated that as the directors of the purchasing company were desirous of having the management in their own hands the directors and secretary had agreed to retire on being paid a lump sum for their loss of office. As a matter of fact, they were to receive a very large sum, which was, in truth, a considerable percentage on the sum which was to be paid to the ordinary shareholders, but the notice did not give any information as to the amount. It was said that the agreement was read and explained at the meeting, but his Lordship was not satisfied upon the evidence that this was so, or, at all events, that the shareholders had any reason to suppose that so large an amount was to be paid. Assuming that it was intra vires of the meeting to pass such a resolution, yet as the proper notice to enable that to be done was not given, it seemed to his Lordship that there was sufficient reason for holding that the resolution was not binding on the dissentient shareholder. It did not, however, seem to be right to dispose of the case solely on that ground, or without advertent to the question which had been raised whether the lump sum could properly, by any means or after any notice, be voted, not as remuneration for services actually rendered in the past, but as compensation for loss of office in the future. His Lordship proceeded to deal with the law on this subject, and, after referring to the case of "Hutton v. West Cork Railway Company" (L.R., 23 Ch.D., 654), came to the conclusion that, under circumstances such as existed in the present case, it would have been beyond the powers of the company, as against a dissentient shareholder, to pass a valid resolution voting to their officers remuneration which was not required for the benefit of the company, and that therefore it was impossible for the directors and secretary to make such provision for their own benefit. His Lordship therefore granted an injunction.

EX PARTE THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY—IN RE A SOLICITOR.*

Solicitor—Misconduct—Striking off rolls.

The Court refused to strike a solicitor off the rolls merely on the production of an order of the Court at the Cape of Good Hope striking him off the rolls.

This was an application by Mr. Hollams on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society to strike off the rolls a solicitor whose name had been struck off the rolls by the Court at the Cape of Good Hope on February 29, 1896. It was stated that the solicitor was admitted as a solicitor in this country in 1880, and in July, 1884, had been suspended from practice for two years for appending a commissioner's name to an affidavit. The Court at the Cape had struck him off the rolls because it appeared in an action brought against him that he had misappropriated funds of a certain club. The solicitor had come to England and had had notice of this motion, but did not appear.

Mr. HOLLAMS said there was a certain amount of novelty about the application to strike a solicitor off the rolls in England simply by means of the production of the order of the Court at the Cape, but he submitted that it was sufficient on the analogy of the old practice when there were the three Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. Then each Court acted on the mere production of an order made by one of the other Courts striking a solicitor off the rolls. He cited the case of "Re John Collins" (18 C.B., 272), and pointed out the great inconvenience it would be if it should be necessary to prove all the facts which had taken place in a distant colony before the Incorporated Law Society in this country.

The COURT, however, refused the application.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said no one could complain of the Incorporated Law Society making the present application, but the Court could not grant it. There was no precedent for it. The comity existing between the old Courts of co-equal jurisdiction—each accepting the order of the others as sufficient grounds for striking off the rolls—was not an analogy which governed this case. This application went far beyond that. How could this Court, for instance, define what description of Court was to be considered of importance enough to have their orders acted on in this way? In foreign Courts and in small colonies it could not be said what rules prevailed. In the present case the facts on which the order was made by the Court at the Cape were not at first hand before the Court. The affidavit of the president of the Incorporated Law Society at the Cape afforded hearsay evidence only as to what happened in the action. Further, the Court here could not say whether the punishment awarded was the punishment which a Court in this country would inflict. The fact simply that a colonial Court had inflicted it was not sufficient. If the Court here had the facts properly brought before them they might act.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. The analogy set up was no analogy. The three Courts sitting all at Westminster Hall, acting on the same well-known principles and dealing with the same solicitors for the most part, could very properly act on the production of the order of one of the others. But it would be quite a different thing for this Court to act on the order of a distant colonial Court. If the facts on which the order was made were brought before them the Court would with great deference consider the action of the colonial Court and exercise their discretion.

MILSON V. BECHSTEIN.*

Damages—General damages—Breach of contract —Amount of damages reduced by Court of Appeal.

This was an application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Lawrence and a special jury; reported in The Times of October 23. The plaintiff, a pianoforte and music seller carrying on business in Bath, claimed damages against the defendant, a pianoforte manufacturer carrying on business in Berlin and London, for breach of an agreement; he also claimed an injunction. The defendant pleaded that there was no breach of the agreement and counterclaimed for damages for an alleged breach of the agreement by the plaintiff. The agreement in question, dated April 27, 1885, gave the plaintiff the sole agency for the sale of Bechstein pianos in Dorset, Somerset, and Wilts, and in Bristol and in the district of Clifton. This was subsequently modified by the omission of Dorset. Clause 2 of the agreement was as follows:—"The said Carl Bechstein will not, either by himself or his representatives in England, appoint any other agent for the sale of the Bechstein pianofortes in the said districts." Clause 3:—"In case any pianofortes shall be sold by Carl Bechstein from his London depot to any person residing in the said districts, or to professors of music or other persons intending to send the same to the said districts, then the account of the said Francis Henry Milson with the said Carl Bechstein shall be credited with the same amount of profit or difference between wholesale and cash prices as would have accrued to the said Francis Henry Milsom if such pianofortes had been sold through him direct." Clause 4:—"The said Francis Henry Milsom agrees on his part to use his best endeavours to sell the Bechstein pianofortes and also to advertise the same throughout the said districts to such extent and in such way as shall in his discretion seem to him most advantageous for effecting the sale thereof." It appeared that between January and March, 1897, the defendant supplied 19 pianos to Messrs. Duck, Son, and Pinker, who were pianoforte dealers in Bath and Bristol, telling them that they could not be agents as there was an agency running, but that he would supply them with pianos. The plaintiff wrote to say that if Messrs. Duck were supplied as customers and not as agents he would not object if he incurred no liability and received 10 per cent. on each piano as his commission. The defendant wrote to say 10 per cent. was too much. In August of this year the plaintiff was given six months' notice to terminate the agency. The plaintiff's case was that Messrs. Duck were in reality made agents for the defendant, and it was a breach of the agreement to supply trade rivals of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff had spent large sums in advertising these pianos; and that he was entitled to £164 4s. 6d. as his commission on the pianos sent to Messrs. Duck and further substantial damages for breach of the agreement. For the defendant it was contended that clause 3 of the agreement applied to a case like this, that there was no breach of the agreement in supplying Messrs. Duck, and that even if it was a breach the damages could not be more than 10 per cent. commission on these 19 pianos. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £614 4s. 6d., and the learned Judge granted an injunction.

Mr. T. W. Chitty (Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., with him) appeared for the defendant; Mr. R. M. Bray, Q.C. (Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., with him), appeared for the plaintiff.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said he was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from the defendant for breach of contract. With regard to the construction of the agreement he concurred in the view which had been set before the Court by counsel for the plaintiff, and which had been adopted by the learned Judge at the trial. The only question which now arose was as to the amount of damages. The jury, over and above the amount which the plaintiff was shown to have lost in consequence of the particular sales of pianos which had been proved at the trial, gave the plaintiff £450 as general damages. He was puzzled to know in respect of what that sum of damages was given. This was not like those cases of slander in which it had been held that general damages might be awarded, on the ground that it was impossible for the plaintiff to give evidence as to what particular customers had been prevented from coming to deal with him. The rule which had been there followed did not seem to him to be applicable to this case. In his opinion there was no evidence which justified the jury in drawing the inference that the plaintiff had suffered any damage beyond that which had been specially proved. He thought, therefore, that the plaintiff was not entitled to the £450 damages, and that they must reduce the damages to £164. There would be no costs on either side.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said he agreed with the Lord Chancellor on the question of the construction of the agreement, and he also thought that the £164 damages covered all profits which would have accrued to the plaintiff from customers who had been intercepted.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.
Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } Jan. 14.

JAMIESON AND CO. V. JAMIESON.*

Trade Name—Similarity of name of trader—Injunction refused.

The Court will not restrain a man from trading in his own name except where he uses his name in such a way as to pass off his goods as the goods of another.

This was an appeal of George Jamieson, the defendant in the action, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Byrne restraining him from using certain labels for harness composition on the ground that they were calculated to induce the public to believe that his composition was the composition of the plaintiffs, who traded under the name of Jamieson and Co. It appeared that Aberdeen was an important centre of the harness composition trade, and that all manufacturers there sent it to England for sale, and further that there were, and had been for many years past, at least four firms in the trade using in one form or another the words "Jamieson" and "Aberdeen"—viz., the plaintiffs, Jamieson and Co., the defendant, George Jamieson, Peter Jamieson, who was the largest manufacturer in the trade in Aberdeen, and James Jamieson. The harness composition manufactured at Aberdeen and elsewhere was in a large number of instances sold in round white tins of a special size, surrounded by white labels with ordinary black letterpress. Some years ago Peter Jamieson arranged with the plaintiffs, Jamieson and Co., that they should add to their label by writing across the front their firm's name and placing at the back a representation of their trade mark of a horse, and thenceforward the plaintiffs had distinguished their goods in this way. Peter Jamieson also arranged with George Jamieson, the defendant, that the latter should print his name in full on the face of his label, and he had ever since done so. At the trial Mr. Justice Byrne found in favour of the plaintiffs and granted an injunction. He found that the rival labels were calculated to be mistaken for each other; but he also based his decision upon certain conduct of the defendant in his earlier business career. The defendant appealed from this decision.

Mr. ASTEBURY, Q.C., and Mr. WAGGETT, for the defendant George Jamieson, contended that the action was nothing less than an attempt to prevent him trading at Aberdeen under his own name; and, further, that the evidence did not warrant the findings of the Judge below either as to deception by the labels or misconduct on the part of their client.

Mr. EVE, Q.C., and Mr. DALDY, for the plaintiffs, argued in support of the judgment.

THE COURT allowed the appeal.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case was an extremely important one, not only to the parties themselves, but to business people in general. It was necessary not to lose sight of the exact point which arose for decision. In effect, the action was an attempt to restrain a man from carrying on business in his own name simply. His Lordship would not say that that could never be done. It had been done in "Holloway v. Holloway" (13 Beav., 209), and there were other cases in which a man having the same name as a well-known trader had been laid hold of by some one who wanted to appropriate to himself the business of such trader. That, of course, could be stopped. But the jurisdiction of the Court to restrain a man from trading in his own name ought to be exercised with great care, and a man ought not to be restrained merely because there were other people in the same trade of the same name who had acquired a reputation. Something more was requisite—viz., that he should have used his own name in such a way as to pass off his goods as the goods of another. That had been laid down as law by Lord Justice Turner in "Burgess v. Burgess" (3 D.M. and G., 896), and had been expressly adopted by Lord Halsbury in the recent case of "Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Company" (14 P.R., 720) (the Yorkshire Relish case). The Court, therefore, had to be satisfied that this defendant had been selling his goods as the goods of the plaintiffs. Of course, it was more difficult for a plaintiff to make out his case when a man was carrying on business in his own name. Here the plaintiffs had done up their goods in a particular form, but that form was common to the makers and sellers of harness composition, not only in Aberdeen, but everywhere else. It was generally sold in plain white tin boxes surrounded by white labels. That was not peculiar to the plaintiffs; but there was something peculiar to them. In consequence of the complaints of one Peter Jamieson, who was the first person named Jamieson to start the harness composition trade in Aberdeen, the plaintiffs assumed certain marks which distinguished their boxes from all other boxes. So far as the boxes and the wrappers themselves were concerned there was nothing to distinguish the plaintiffs' from Peter Jamieson's; but the plaintiffs put upon their boxes two distinguishing features—viz. (1) their signature written across the label and (2) the device of a horse. Therefore it was not true to say that the distinguishing feature of the plaintiffs' goods was the name "Jamieson" or "Jamieson of Aberdeen." That increased the difficulty of the plaintiffs' case. An examination of the get up of the defendant's goods showed that it was similar to the plaintiffs' in all those respects in which the plaintiffs' was similar to the get up of other persons in the trade, but so far as related to the distinguishing features of the plaintiffs' goods there was no similarity at all. It was said that the defendant was bound to take extra precautions because he happened to bear the same name as the plaintiffs, but there was no authority for restraining the use of a man's own name in his trade unless he has done something to pass off his goods as the goods of another. The evidence failed to show that the defendant had been trying unfairly to obtain the plaintiffs' trade, and there was no ground for the injunction. The learned Judge below had not given sufficient weight to the fact that the features in which the defendant's goods resembled the plaintiffs' were features common to the trade. The appeal should be allowed.

LORD JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS gave judgment to the like effect.

and Darling, JJ.) Jan. 14.

IN RE WILLIAM ROBERT DAVIES, A SOLICITOR—IN THE MATTER OF THE SOLICITORS ACT, 1888.*

Solicitor—Misconduct—Acquittal by Law Society —Conviction by the Court.

This was an application made on behalf of Mr. Merick Meredith Williams, of Dalbeattie, N.B., surgeon, to strike off the name of Mr. William Robert Davies, a solicitor, of Dolgelly, in the county of Merioneth. There had been an inquiry before the Statutory Committee, but they did not appear on this application, having found that though the conduct of the solicitor was extremely reprehensible they were able to receive his explanation and did not find him guilty of professional misconduct.

Mr. Foote, Q.C. (Mr. Carson, Q.C., with him), appeared for the complainant; Mr. Asquith, Q.C. (Mr. S. T. Evans with him), for the respondent.

The facts were of a very unusual description. There was a charge of conspiracy, but as a conspiracy that had been negatived by the committee, and the Court acted on the facts stated by the committee. The charge of conspiracy was that the respondent conspired with Robert Nanney Williams and Sarah Williams to suppress the will of Ann Hartley, which came into his hands in July, 1893, by which will the complainant was entitled to a moiety of certain estates of which Robert Nanney Williams and Sarah Williams were in possession, and that the respondent assisted them to deal with the estates as if they were solely entitled to them, from July, 1893, till March, 1896. The respondent was admitted in 1869. The material facts were these:—Robert Nanney Hartley, a large landowner near Dolgelly, died intestate in April, 1860, and one-half of his estates went to his daughter, Ann Hartley, and the other to the heir of his second daughter—namely, Thomas Humphrey Williams, the eldest brother of the complainant. Ann Hartley died on February 24, 1886, as it was supposed intestate. Mr. T. H. Williams then entered into possession of her moiety as heir-at-law. He died without issue in March, 1891, having by his will left one part of the above-mentioned estates to his wife, Sarah Williams, and the other part called the Llwyn estate to his second brother, Robert Nanney Williams. Each took possession of their respective estate. On March 28, 1896, the complainant was summoned to the death-bed of his brother, Robert Nanney Williams, by a telegram from Mr. Davies, the solicitor. He came, and was then informed by Mrs. Nanney Williams, his sister-in-law, that a will made by Ann Hartley had been discovered. Next day the complainant called on Mr. Davies about the matter, who told him that he could not act for him, as he was acting for the other side, and advised that there should be a settlement. Robert Nanney Williams died on April 2, 1896. On April 9, at an interview between the complainant and his solicitor, Mr. Davies, Ann Hartley's will was produced, by which it appeared that the complainant was entitled to a legacy of £1,000 and to her estate after the life interest of her eldest brother, Thomas Humphrey Williams, who had died in 1891 and who was named executor. The will was prepared by Mr. Griffith Jones Williams, a solicitor, of Dolgelly, and was dated November 19, 1868. The will was proved in solemn form after a defence had been put in and withdrawn, and the complainant then entered into possession under the will of the undivided moiety of the estate. The defence that was attempted to be raised was that Ann Hartley was of unsound mind. Mr. Davies, the solicitor, had known of the existence of Ann Hartley's will since 1893. The circumstances under which he had obtained it were these:—A Mr. Charles Millard, who had succeeded to the practice of Mr. Griffith Jones Williams, acted as solicitor for some years to Robert Nanney Williams and his wife. He died in January, 1892. Mr. Davies then acted for his widow in winding up his affairs and bought his practice. The will of Ann Hartley was contained in a sealed packet. Mr. Millard had told his wife this. Shortly after Mr. Millard's death Mr. Robert Nanney Williams told the widow that he did not wish this parcel of papers to be given to any local solicitor, and Mrs. Millard retained them. In July, 1893, she had occasion to open the packet for another purpose, and found the will. Mrs. Millard went to see the respondent and told him she had been advised by her solicitor to open the will and give it to the executor, whoever he might be; whereupon the respondent asked to see it, and said that as he acted for Mrs. Sarah Williams, who was the executrix to the executor named in the will, he was the proper person to take it. Accordingly she gave it to him. On July 27 Mr. Davies replied to a friend of Mrs. Millard's who had written to him that she ought not to have taken away the documents belonging to her late husband's clients, and on no account ought she to have made herself acquainted with their contents, but that she need not be afraid of any criminal proceedings against her for concealing the will. He added, "She may, however, work much mischief by improperly disclosing the contents of these documents"; and on the same day he wrote to Mrs. Millard to the same effect, saying, "It would be a serious wrong for you to divulge to anybody except to such as Mr. L. and myself, who know our duty, anything you know of their nature or effect." The document was kept in Mr. Davies's safe from that time until 1896. Mr. Davies stated before the committee that he showed the will to Mr. Robert Nanney Williams, and explained its effect, urging him to communicate the matter to the complainant and his sisters, who were all beneficiaries under it. He also showed it to Mrs. Williams, who said she was very ill, and she objected to having any communication with the complainant, that Ann Hartley was not in a condition to make a will, and that he was to do nothing at present. Mr. Davies also mentioned the will to the trustees of the will of Mr. Thomas Humphrey Williams, who said they would do what Mr. Robert Nanney Williams advised. Among the arrangements which had taken place with regard to dealing with the property was one where a sale had been arranged for a piece of land for a school to the school trustees. A clause was inserted in the proposed contract that the title should commence with the will of Thomas Humphrey Williams, dated 1874, and the purchaser should assume that at the date of his will and of his death he was seised with fee simple of the property sold. The trustees, however, refused to accept this. It was said on behalf of Mr. Davies that the clause was put in by him in order that the trustees might refuse to accept, and that he urged Mr. Williams to allow him to draw out an abstract of title and so make known the existence of the will. Mr. Williams, however, would not consent. A further matter was this. In 1894 a summons was issued by a creditor in the Chancery Division to administer the estate of Mr. Thomas Humphrey Williams. The defendants were Mrs. Sarah Williams, the executrix, and the trustees of the will. Mr. Davies acted as their solicitor, and an order was made on Mrs. Williams to file an affidavit of the real and personal estate. In it she swore "I have set forth in the third schedule hereto the particulars of all the real estate which the said testator was seised or entitled to at the time of his death." That schedule comprised the whole of the estates, including those in which, under Ann Hartley's will, Thomas Humphrey Williams had only a life estate. Mr. Davies pointed out that this was wrong, but Mr. Williams said the affidavit must say that he died possessed of all. Mr. Davies's case was that he had no right to disclose the existence or nature of the will without his client's consent, and he consulted counsel. The opinion from him was that his proper course as a professional man was to inform his clients that they ought to make known the fact of the will, and unless they gave him authority to do so he should decline to act further for them in the matter. It was stated that after receiving the advice he did nothing further in respect of the property affected by the will.

Mr. FOOTES said that the letters showed that the respondent intended to keep the will secret; not perhaps for ever, but for an indefinite period. At the time he received the will he might have thought, very reasonably, that he was entitled to the custody of it, being the solicitor to the executrix and the executor of Ann Hartley. As a matter of law, however, as one of them had failed to prove the will, the persons entitled to it were the beneficiaries, and one of them might procure administration with the will annexed. It should be noted that the will was not brought to him by one of his clients, but by a stranger, the widow of a former solicitor. No one could say that a solicitor should disclose anything that his client might have told him as to the past. But he ought not to agree to go on acting for him when a fraud was being carried out. Further positive concealment of a document was evident here.

Mr. ASQUITH (for Mr. Davies) referred to "In re a Solicitor" (1894 1 Q.B., 254), to show that the decision of the statutory committee ought not to be disturbed. The solicitor honestly believed that his client was entitled to the document. If he had been right in that he was not entitled to disclose the contents without the leave of his clients. He had told his clients and the trustees, but could induce them to do nothing. It was not unreasonable that he should write to Mrs. Millard to keep the matter secret, at any rate before he had received the instructions of his client. As to the affidavit in the action to administer estate of T. Humphrey Williams where Mrs. Sarah Williams was the defendant, the proceedings were originated at the suit of a creditor. She was to disclose the whole of the estate, against which the creditor had a claim. Mrs. Williams then made an affidavit of all the property, which she, as executrix, was seised of or entitled to at the time of the testator's death. Thomas Humphrey Williams was really owner in fee of half, and if the missing will was right was life tenant of the rest. The statement would not prejudice the interest of the creditor. Both clients were very old and ill. The solicitor went to counsel for advice. The opinion was given on October 23, 1895, that if the clients would not give him leave to disclose the will the solicitor should cease to act for his client. It should be noted that the solicitor had not taken any action in the matter after the date of this opinion. Lastly, the solicitor had not obtained any profit out of the transaction. He tried to induce his clients to disclose the will.

The COURT directed that Mr. Davies should be suspended from practice for two years.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT referred to the case of "In re Crowdy" (11 The Times L.R., 406 [1895]) as showing that the Court had jurisdiction to deal with the case even though the committee had not convicted the respondent. The learned Judge could understand well the view of the committee. The solicitor was a man possessed of an honourable record hitherto, but he had fallen into a false position which became worse as time went on. He thought that no personal interest induced the solicitor to follow the line of conduct which was detailed in the report, but the fact of a man doing wrong without a bad motive did not justify him. It would be a slur on an honourable profession to allow it to be thought that a solicitor would advise and assist his client to commit perjury. A solicitor could not tell a client to omit a material document in his affidavit of documents. It was the solicitor who settled what documents were to be mentioned. A solicitor could not shelter himself behind his client. The other point did not appear to the learned Judge so strong. The effect of the solicitor's conduct in locking up the will in the safe and concealing it was that for three years the complainant was kept out of an income of perhaps £1,000 a year. The sentence would be that he must be suspended from practice for two years and pay the costs of the inquiry and the motion.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING was of the same opinion. The Court could not possibly take a more lenient view than they had taken. The responsible and respectable position of Mr. Davies was rather an aggravation of the matter. His own clients might be encouraged in their dishonest course by the fact that it was not at once denounced by a person in the position that he was. Mr. Davies not only concealed the fact that there was a flaw in his client's title, which might perhaps be excusable in a solicitor, but he was content to take active steps which would enable them to dispose of the property. His client did it to defraud another. Mr. Davies not only did not tell what he knew, but he was from day to day doing things which should enable the matter to be more effectively concealed. He prepared, also, what he knew would be a perjured affidavit. He pointed out that it was false, but when the lady insisted he did not refuse to act. His conduct the committee described as reprehensible. The learned Judge went further, and thought it deserved punishment at the hands of the Court, which had to see that their officers did not enable persons to commit crimes. For a period of two years Mr. Davies had concealed the will. He then took the opinion of counsel. A person holding the position of Mr. Davies should have known at once what to do. The moment he found the will and any intention to conceal it he should have refused to be a party to it at all. Further, when they were going to sell a piece of the estate he put in a clause calling on the purchaser to assume a thing which he (Mr. Davies) knew to be false. It was said this was done to prevent his client from committing a fraud. That was a very Machiavellian form of policy. A solicitor, under these circumstances, should have acted more simply and straightforwardly.

On the application of Mr. EVANS the order was made to run from the 1st of March.

DAVIES V. EVANS.*

Licence—Death of holder of licence—Power to grant licence to tenant of house so left unoccupied—9 Geo. IV., c. 61, sec. 14.

This was an appeal, by case stated, from the Court of Quarter Sessions for Cardiganshire.

MR. S. T. EVANS appeared for the appellant; the respondent was not represented.

The appellant applied at the special licensing sessions for Cardiganshire, under 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, s. 14, for a licence in respect of the Maesglas Arms, Dihewid. 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, s. 14, provides:—That if any person duly licensed under the Act shall die, and in certain other contingencies whereby the licensed premises become unoccupied, the justices shall have power to grant a licence to the heirs or administrators of the person so dying, or to the tenant or occupier of a house having become so unoccupied. In August, 1896, a licence was granted in respect of the house in question to Mary Evans. On November 14 Mary Evans died, leaving no personal representatives or heir-at-law. The landlord took possession of the premises and put the appellant in as tenant. Mary Evans owed money to a beer merchant, who upon her death entered the premises and took possession of and sold her effects, applying the proceeds in liquidation of his debt. He handed over the licence to the appellant. The appellant's application was refused by the justices, who were of opinion that they were entitled to treat the application as an application for a new licence, and that they, consequently, had an absolute discretion. On appeal the Quarter Sessions held that they had no jurisdiction to grant the licence because the case did not come within 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, s. 14.

MR. S. T. EVANS contended that the appellant was a tenant of a house which came within the provisions of 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, s. 14. He cited "Baldwin v. the Justices of Dover" [1892] 2 Q.B., 421.

Their LORDSHIPS allowed the appeal.

IN RE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD ELECTION PETITION (CHELSEA DIVISION)—LORD MONKSWELL AND OTHERS (PETITIONERS) V. THOMPSON (RESPONDENT).*

Election Law—School Board—Claim for a recount—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, sec. 87—Practice.

This was a petition brought under section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, questioning the recent election for the School Board for London, Chelsea Division. The petition was presented against the return of Mr. William Whittaker Thompson, on the ground that he was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes. The petition alleged (inter alia) that certain votes counted for the respondent were erroneously received by the returning officer as good votes, and that certain votes given in favour of Mr. Leslie Morton Johnson were erroneously rejected or counted for the respondent or some other candidate by the returning officer, and that these votes ought to be added to Johnson's votes; and the petition claimed a recount of the votes recorded in favour of the respondent and Johnson respectively, and that it might be declared that the respondent was not duly elected and that Johnson was duly elected. Mr. Justice Kennedy at Chambers made an order under section 93, subsection 7, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, that the case raised by the petition should be stated as a special case, and that the votes recorded in favour of Johnson and of the respondent respectively be recounted, and that the result of the recount be stated in the special case. From that order this appeal was brought by the respondent Thompson, it being contended on his behalf that the votes for all the candidates should be recounted, as it might appear upon a full recount that the respondent was still elected even though he should have received a smaller number of votes than Johnson. It appeared that there were five vacancies and eight candidates in the Chelsea Division, and that in the return made by the returning officer the name of the respondent, Thompson, stood fifth in the list with 13,221 votes, and that the next name in the list was that of Johnson, with 13,218 votes. The fourth name in the list was that of Viscount Morpeth, with 13,292 votes. A preliminary objection was taken last Wednesday, when the appeal first came on for hearing, that no appeal lay, but the Court overruled this objection (see The Times of Thursday last). When the appeal came on to-day, LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that he was a voter in the Chelsea Division, and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that he was also a voter in that division.

*Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Counsel on both sides, however, waived any objection to the constitution of the Court upon that ground.

Mr. YARBOROUGH ANDERSON, for the respondent Thompson, in support of the appeal, contended that the petitioners had to prove, first, that the respondent was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes; and, secondly, that Johnson was duly elected. In other words, the petitioners undertook to prove that the respondent was not among the first five candidates. To recount the votes as between the respondent and Johnson for the purpose of showing that Johnson received more votes than the respondent would not show that the respondent was not duly elected, because the petitioners contended that they were entitled to fake votes which had been counted for one or more of the first four candidates in the list, and add them to Johnson's votes, if they ought properly to have been counted for Johnson. The result might be that the respondent would get more votes than some of the first four candidates on the list, and therefore it did not follow that upon this recount he would not be entitled to be elected, even though Johnson should receive more votes than he did. The recount as ordered would be nugatory, and so there ought to be a recount of the votes given for all the candidates. He was willing, in order to save expense, to have a recount of the votes as between the candidates placed fourth, fifth, and sixth on the list.

Mr. S. H. DAY (Mr. Willoughby Williams with him), for the petitioners, contended that the position of the respondent and Johnson alone could be affected by this recount. There was no petition against the other candidates elected and their election could not be questioned. The petitioners had limited their petition to a claim for a recount of the votes as between the respondent and Johnson, and they took the risk of the recount turning out to be nugatory. The proper course for the respondent was to take the point upon the special case after the recount. It was a question of law for the Divisional Court upon the special case, and that was the proper tribunal to decide it, and not this Court upon an interlocutory application.

Mr. YARBOROUGH ANDERSON, in reply, said that it would be very inconvenient to have a recount that probably would turn out to be quite useless and a mere waste of time. [LORD JUSTICE COLLINS.—If upon the recount the respondent has a majority over Johnson, he wins. If, on the other hand, Johnson has a majority over the respondent, then, if your contention is right, the respondent wins, because it has not been shown that he is not among the first five candidates on the poll. If, therefore, you are right upon this last point, you do not want what you now ask for, as it is "heads you win, tails Johnson loses."]

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that the petitioners, who claimed a recount, alleged that Johnson, who was sixth on the list of candidates, was duly elected, and that the respondent was not duly elected, and they claimed the respondent's seat. A recount of the votes recorded in favour of the respondent and Johnson had been asked for and directed. The petition for the recount had been advisedly framed in that way, and the petitioners by their counsel objected to having its scope extended so as to embrace the votes given for the first four candidates. Counsel for the petitioners said that the first four candidates were not affected by the petition, that their seats were safe, and that the only question raised by the petition was as to the votes given for the respondent and Johnson, and he insisted upon the order as it stood. That being so, the order ought to be affirmed for these reasons. The Court would leave open the question of law raised by the respondent—namely, whether, even, supposing the result of the recount to show that Johnson received more votes than the respondent, that would displace the respondent without recounting the votes given for the other candidates so as to see whether those other candidates got more votes than the respondent. The Court would leave open every question of law, but they held the petitioners to their limited inquiry, so as to preclude them from asking in the Divisional Court for any wider inquiry than that now directed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that he was of the same opinion, and he thought it better not to add anything, because he desired to leave every question of law open.

PECK AND CO. V. HINDES (LIMITED).*

Patent—Action for infringement—Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jac. I., c. 3.

In this action, which was reported in The Times of the 14th inst., the jury found for the defendants on the questions of fact left to them by his Lordship, and a point of law arising under the Monopolies Act, 21 Jac. I., cap. 3, was reserved for argument on Friday last, and at the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship reserved his judgment until to-day.

Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., and Mr. W. Neill appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. J. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Lewis Edmunds, Q.C., and Mr. T. M. Stevens for the defendants.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that this was an action to recover damages for proceedings against the plaintiffs, alleged to have been taken in bad faith by the defendants, Hindes (Limited), for infringement of their patent rights. The patents were for a small article of domestic use, hair curlers. There were two patents, one originally granted to a person named Careless, and one to a person named Ainsworth. The action brought by Hindes (Limited) against Messrs. Peck and Co. failed, because the patent granted to Ainsworth, which was the foundation of that action, contained two claims, one of which was bad and the other good, and the patent being bad in part they could not succeed. It was alleged by Peck and Co. that the defendants knew when they brought that action they could not win it, and other points were raised to show that it was not honest litigation. The question as to Ainsworth's patent had previously arisen in an action for infringement against a person named Singleton. That action had failed and had been compromised, because it was found out that there was this flaw in Ainsworth's patent. It was quite clear that the flaw could be removed. It was alleged that Messrs. Hindes had given orders for the necessary steps to be taken for accomplishing this object. Owing to a mistake no formal disclaimer had been filed, but Messrs. Hindes proceeded with the action against the plaintiffs under the impression that the instructions given to their solicitors had been acted upon. They were wrong, and the action failed, and Messrs. Peck and Co. brought the present action. The jury had heard the case fully discussed, and had come to the conclusion that there was no bad faith on the part of Messrs. Hindes. There was another point behind—a point which, his Lordship said, was being raised for the first time in a Court of law. It was this; there was an ancient statute passed in the reign of James I., the Statute of Monopolies, and the plaintiffs contended that the defendants were within the terms of that statute and were subject to the penalties imposed by it. The point surprised him because prima facie it was wholly inconsistent with a fundamental axiom of the common law that an action may be brought without fear of penal consequences and only subject to the liability of having to pay the costs. It was said that with regard to letters patent for a new invention a new rule of law was supplied by this statute. On behalf of Messrs. Hindes it was argued that the statute had no operation as to new inventions, but dealt only with letters patent and other documents had on the face of them and bad at common law. His Majesty King James I. in 1610 had submitted to the pressure applied by his subjects and had issued a Royal declaration that in future there should be no more monopolies or grants which should interfere with the fair course of trade. The Statute of Monopolies was passed in the 21st year of James I., and it reminded the King of his declaration. The first section [declared monopolies and similar grants to be contrary to the laws of the realm and void. The second section declared that all monopolies should be examined, heard, tried, and determined according to the laws of the realm. The Act intended to force patentees and monopolists to come before a Court of law to have the question determined as to whether their patents or monopolies were good. Section 4, on which the plaintiffs based their case, enacted that if any person should be hindered, grieved, disturbed, or disquieted by occasion or pretext of any monopoly or letters patent he should be able to recover three times the damage he had suffered and double costs. It was said that this was the position in which Messrs. Hindes were placed, because they had hindered, grieved, and disquieted the plaintiffs. By section 6 letters patent for a new manufacture granted to the first and true inventor were excepted from the operation of the statute. It had been ingeniously argued for the plaintiffs that the letters patent referred to in section 6 must be taken to be valid letters patent, and that, as Ainsworth's patent was not a valid patent because of the flaw in it, therefore the proviso did not apply to it. Section 6 did not say anything about valid letters patent. Having regard to the object of the Act it was unnecessary to insert such a provision. His Lordship was clearly of opinion that the Act could not be construed in that way; it referred to invalid and improper exercises of the prerogative. On behalf of Messrs. Hindes it was said that, even if the statute meant valid letters patent, their letters patent were valid. It was clear that this was so. There was a flaw in their patent and it was in consequence in a state of suspended animation, but by disclaimer of the bad part it could be put right. Subsection 9 of section 18 of the Patents, &c., Act of 1883 said that on a patent being amended by disclaimer the amendment should for all purposes be deemed to form part of the specification. Therefore, the patent in question was a valid patent—that is, it was capable of being set right, and gave to Messrs. Hindes their rights as if it had been without blot or flaw. Messrs. Hindes therefore succeeded and the Monopolies Act did not apply. He therefore gave judgment on the whole case for the defendants, with costs.

GOWER V. COULDRIDGE AND OTHERS.*

Practice—Parties—Joinder of defendants—Separate causes of action—O. 16, r. 4—"Sadler v. Great Western Railway Company" ([1896] A. C., 450).

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Day's. The action was one for damages and was brought against three defendants, Coulldridge, Newman, and Maw, directors of a company called Richard Spurgeon (Limited). The plaintiff complained that he had been induced to take 500 shares in the company by untrue statements contained in a prospectus issued by the three defendants, and that such shares had turned out to be worthless. He also alleged that the defendants were liable by virtue of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. He also charged the two defendants Coulldridge and Newman with conspiracy. On the application of the defendant Maw an order was made by Master Butler directing that the part of the statement of claim which related to conspiracy should be struck out, or that the plaintiff should elect whether he would proceed with the causes of action which he alleged against all three defendants or with the cause of action which he alleged against Coulldridge and Newman only. On the appeal of the plaintiff Mr. Justice Day reversed the order of the Master. The defendant Maw appealed to the Court of Appeal.

The Hon. M. M. Macnaughten appeared for the defendant Maw; Mr. Arthur Pellow appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read the following judgment:—In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the loss he has sustained by taking shares in the company called "Richard Spurgeon, Limited." He does not claim any injunction. There are three defendants, all of whom are alleged to be directors of the company. In accordance with the modern system of pleading the plaintiff in his statement of claim sets forth facts from which it appears that he has three distinct causes of action. Stated shortly they are as follows. The first is a fraudulent conspiracy by two of the defendants, viz.:—Newman and Coulldridge, to promote and form the company to buy a worthless business and to induce the plaintiff to take and pay for the shares which he in fact took. Although there is a statement that the defendant Maw joined in the promotion of the company, it is clear that he is not charged with being party to the conspiracy. This was admitted by the plaintiff's counsel. The second is a statutory liability founded on the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, in respect of statements in the prospectus issued by all three of the defendants. The third is false and fraudulent representations in the prospectus, also charged against all the defendants. The action, then, is founded on three distinct torts or wrongs committed, as to the second and third, by the three defendants, and, as to the first, by two only. In these circumstances the defendant Maw, objecting to the joinder of the first cause of action with the other two, took out a summons, on which the Master made an order, in substance directing the plaintiff to elect whether he would proceed with the action on the first cause against the defendants Newman and Coulldridge only or on the second and third causes against the three defendants. On appeal the learned Judge in chambers reversed the Master's order, and allowed the action in its present form to proceed against all three defendants. The appeal is by Maw from the Judge's order. At the bar the plaintiff's counsel elected, if the Court considered that the Judge's order could not be sustained, to strike out from the statement of claim all the allegations relating to the fraudulent conspiracy, and to proceed with the action on the second and third causes only. In my opinion the Judge's order cannot be sustained. The case is entirely governed by the decision of the House of Lords in "Sadler v. Great Western Railway Company" ([1896] A. C., 450), where it was held that claims for damages against two or more defendants in respect of their several liability for separate torts cannot be combined in one action. The plaintiff's counsel endeavoured in vain to distinguish that case from the present. He referred to Orders 16 and 18 and various rules under those Orders, and suggested that the lords who took part in the decision did not deal with the rules. The suggestion is wholly inadmissible. The rules were necessarily before the House and present to the minds of those who advised the House. The decision lays down a principle applicable to the present system of procedure on the subject, and governing all the rules bearing on the question. It would be idle, therefore, for this Court to enter upon a discussion of the rules or of any of the authorities relating to them other than Sadler's case. In the case before us the cause of action founded on the fraudulent conspiracy is an entirely distinct and independent cause; it is wholly separate from the second and third causes. I hold then that the defendant Maw is entitled, as a matter of right, regard being had to plaintiff's election at the bar, to have all the allegations relating to the conspiracy struck out from the statement of claim, and the order will be to that effect. No question, therefore, arises as to the exercise of any discretion by the Court on the ground of embarrassment to the defendant Maw. Had that question arisen, I should have arrived at the same conclusion. The costs of the appeal and of the summons both before the Master and the Judge must be the costs of the defendant Maw in any event.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

GAYFORD V. CHOULER.*

Trespass—Damage, to grass—24 and 25 Vict.,
c. 97, sec. 52.

Mr. W. H. Stevenson appeared in this case, which was one stated by justices of Nottingham on an information under section 52 of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 97, against the appellant for unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously damaging certain grass to the amount of 6d. The question whether there was any criminal remedy under that section for trespass to grass was raised. The facts were that on July 12 the defendant and two other gentlemen went for a ramble in the parish of Chilwell along the bank of the river Trent, and there, walking three abreast, made a short cut across a pasture field where the grass was up to their knees and was good and very thick and deep. They passed two large notice boards with the words "No road" on them. The farmer in whose possession the field was saw them, went to them, and said to the defendant, "You have no right here." Defendant said, "We are doing no harm. I know the law of trespass as well as you. I shall not turn back. If you wait half-an-hour you will see me come back. I shall continue to come across as often as I like." They all three continued walking abreast across the field. The damage done by the defendant was to the amount of 6d. There were some cattle in the field and had been for some time. The defendant did not claim any right of way. It was, however, stated that a former tenant had not raised any objection to people walking over the field. It was contended before the magistrates that the alleged trespass of merely walking over grass was not such a wilful or malicious act of damage as was contemplated by section 52 upon which the information was founded, and also that no actual damage could have been or was done by the trespass and that the justices had no jurisdiction, and that the only remedy for such a trespass was a civil one and not a criminal one. The justices held that damage to the amount of 6d. had been occasioned by the defendant, and ordered him to pay 6d. for the damage. They also inflicted a fine of 6d., and directed him to pay 14s. for costs. Section 52 of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 97, provides for the punishment by imprisonment for two months or a £5 fine of any one who shall "wilfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil to or upon any real or personal property whatsoever, either of a public or private nature, for which no punishment is hereinbefore provided." Section 24 makes it an offence punishable with imprisonment for a month or fine of 20s. "to unlawfully and maliciously destroy or damage with intent to destroy any cultivated root or plant used for the food of man or beast."

Mr. STEVENSON contended that in order to constitute an offence under section 52 there must have been an intention to commit injury or damage. Here there was no such intention, as all that was wanted was to take a short cut. He cited "Gardner v. Mansbridge" (19 Q.B.D., 217) and "Eley v. Little" (50 J.P., 308), and urged that section 52 only applied to the real estate itself and not to a product growing on the land. The conviction was therefore bad, as injury to the grass was not injury to the real estate. It could not be contended that while a man could only be imprisoned under section 24 for one month for damaging cultivated plants, he was to be liable to two months under section 52 for damaging uncultivated products of real estate.

The COURT upheld the conviction.

Mr. JUSTICE DAY said the justices were right. It was a question of law on the facts found by them, which were that there was no claim of right of way along the line trespassed upon set up by the appellant; that there were notice boards at each side of that part of the field trespassed on; and also that the appellant persisted in going along after the respondent had told him he had no right to do so, the appellant also saying he should come back the same way and go on the field as often as he liked. The justices were satisfied upon the evidence given, as well as upon their own knowledge of what the effect of such a trespass must have been upon grass of that description. They found as a fact that the grass was long and thick, that it was trespassed on and trodden down for a length of 130 yards by the appellant, and that he must have done and did some actual damage to the grass, for which 6d. as sworn to by the respondent, was a reasonable compensation for the injury. There was, therefore, some damage done, and a man must be taken to have intended the natural consequence of his conduct. The appellant had therefore wilfully or maliciously committed an injury within the section. The justices were entitled to convict.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

THE QUEENSLAND NATIONAL BANK V. THE PENINSULAR

Ship—Bill of lading—Carriage of specie—Warranty that the specie room is reasonably fit to resist thieves.

Decision of Mathew, J. (13 The Times L.R., 500), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment by Mr. Justice Mathew, taking commercial cases (reported in 13 The

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Times Law Reports, 500; 2 Com. Cas., 228). The action was brought to recover £5,000 damages for the loss of 5,000 sovereigns which were being carried on board the defendants' steamship Oceana from Port Jackson to London. The plaintiffs, under a bill of lading, shipped ten boxes, each containing 5,000 sovereigns, on board the Oceana to be delivered at Lloyds Bank, London. The bill of lading contained exceptions (inter alia) of loss by robbers or thieves by sea or land, defects, latent or otherwise, in hull or its appurtenances, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, mariners or other servants, or of the agents of the company. The boxes in question were placed in the bullion room, and during the voyage the bullion room was broken open and one of the boxes was stolen. The plaintiffs in their statement of claim alleged that there was an implied warranty that the Oceana had such a bullion room as to make her a fit vessel for the carriage of bullion, and that the bullion room was so defective that the vessel was not fit for the carriage of bullion. It was ordered that, before the questions of fact were tried, the preliminary question of law should be determined whether there was any warranty by the defendants under the bill of lading that the room in which the bullion was stowed was so constructed as to be reasonably fit to resist thieves. There was nothing in the bill of lading referring to a bullion room, but it was admitted that the Oceana had a bullion room and that the plaintiffs knew it. For the purposes of this argument it was assumed that the bullion room was defective. Mr. Justice Mathew held that there was an implied warranty in the bill of lading that the bullion room was in a reasonably fit condition to resist thieves, and decided the preliminary question in favour of the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. R. M. Bray, Q.C., appeared for the defendants; Mr. Scrutton (Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. A. H. Chaytor with him) appeared for the plaintiffs.

The following cases were referred to:—"Maori King v. Hughes" ([1895], 2 Q.B., 550); "Tattersall v. National Steamship Company" (12 Q.B.D., 297); "Steel v. State Line Steamship Company" (3 App. Cas., 72); "Stanton v. Richardson" (L.R., 9 C.P., 390).

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that there were very large exceptions in the bill of lading, and, apart from an implied warranty, the defendants would in all probability have an answer to the claim by showing that the loss was caused by thieves. The question, however, was whether upon this bill of lading there was an implied warranty that the bullion room in which the gold was placed was reasonably fit to resist thieves. It seemed to him that the foundation of Mr. Justice Mathew's judgment was this, as stated by that learned Judge:—"I assume, for the purpose of my decision, that the vessel in question, the Oceana, like others of her class, was furnished with a receptacle for bullion and valuables, usually called a specie room; and that the contract in the bill of lading was entered into with the knowledge and upon the footing that this receptacle had been provided for the safe carriage of the gold mentioned in the bill of lading." That assumption, upon which the learned Judge based his judgment, brought the case within the decision in the "Maori King v. Hughes." In his (the Lord Justice's) opinion that assumption was fully borne out by the admissions made during the argument in the Court below. It was argued that there was no implied warranty that the bullion room was reasonably fit to resist thieves. The parties contracted on the footing that there was a bullion room. What was a bullion room for? Not to resist the waves or fire; it was for the purpose of securing the gold in it from thieves. It was said that gold could be carried in other parts of the ship. That was not the issue raised before Mr. Justice Mathew. The question was whether there was a warranty that the bullion room was, at the time when the ship started, reasonably fit to resist thieves. Upon the authorities which had been referred to, in his opinion there was such a warranty.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. The bullion room was in the contemplation of the parties at the time they made the contract, and the learned Judge was justified in making the assumption of fact which he did. What was a bullion room for? The peril from thieves was the great peril to which cargo of this class was exposed. In his opinion the proper question was whether the bullion room was reasonably fit to resist thieves. For instance, it must not be an old packing case. It must be reasonably fit for the special purpose for which a bullion room was used.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. When they introduced into this case the fact that both parties contemplated when they entered into the contract that the bullion should be carried in the bullion room, it led to this, that the bullion room should be a reasonable bullion room. In his opinion, that implied that the bullion room should be reasonably fit to resist thieves. A packing case was not enough, because it was not strong enough. The standard of strength was its reasonable capability of resisting thieves.

IN RE FETHERSTONHAUGH'S ESTATE.*

Settled Land Acts—Tenant for life—Heirlooms
--Application to sell refused.

This was an application by the tenant for life of Uppark-mansion, Sussex, for the sanction of the Court to the sale of heirlooms at the mansion-house under the Settled Land Act, 1882. The late owner of the estate, Miss Fetherstonhaugh, by will settled the Uppark estate and other property on persons who were strangers in blood to her. The applicant, Colonel Keith Turnour-Fetherstonhaugh, was the first tenant for life. His children took no interest, and on his death the property was limited to the Hon. Arthur Vesey Meade (the second son of the Earl of Clanwilliam) for life, with remainder to his children successively in tail male, with remainder to the other younger sons of the Earl of Clanwilliam and their children in a similar way. Miss Fetherstonhaugh bequeathed all the furniture, china, pictures, and other articles at Uppark as heirlooms, and expressed a desire and intention that every tenant for life should reside at the mansion. She died in 1896. The china, of which there was an extensive and valuable collection, four pictures, and the most valuable part of the furniture, which included a considerable quantity of articles of good periods, had been submitted to Mr. Woods, the well-known auctioneer, of the firm of Christie, Manson, and Woods, for valuation. He had valued the whole of these at about £18,000, and a selection of what he considered as the more valuable articles he estimated as likely to produce £15,000. The tenant for life now asked the sanction of the Court to the sale of the selected articles and the investment of the proceeds for the benefit of the inheritance. Evidence was adduced on his part to show that, owing to the heavy periodical succession duty payable over eight years, amounting to more than £600 a year, annuities charged on the estate, and the expenses imposed upon him in keeping a herd of deer and maintaining the place, even with the addition of some private income he would have only about £2,000 a year and would not at present be able to reside at the mansion. It was maintained on his behalf that, looking at the benefit of himself and the persons interested in remainder, it would be better that he should be put in the position of being able to reside than that the mansion should be either untenanted or let.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Ford were for the applicant; Mr. J. Cozens-Hardy, for trustees, supported the application; the Hon. Charles Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Bryan Farrer, for the next tenant for life, opposed.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH, referring to the well-known comments of Lord Esher in Lord Radnor's case (45 Ch. D., 415) on the power of a tenant for life with the consent of the Court to sell even heirlooms contrary to the intention of a settlor, that the tenant for life was not intended to act "capriciously, selfishly, or dishonestly," said that there was no imputation on the applicant that he was acting capriciously or dishonestly or selfishly in the sense that the application was not made under a bona fide belief that it would be for the benefit of the parties interested, taken as a whole, that the articles should be sold, and he should be able thereby to live at the mansion if the selected articles were sold and produced the estimated price. Probably only some four-fifths of that would be netted, or about £12,000. That when invested would not produce a very large income; but it might be that the addition would enable Colonel Fetherstonhaugh to reside at the mansion. Looking, however, at the interest of all these to come after as well as that of the applicant, his Lordship did not consider that it was right that these heirlooms should be sold, and he dismissed the application. He directed the trustees to pay the costs of all parties out of the estate.

AJELLO V. WORSLEY.*

Trader—Injurious advertisement—Advertising plaintiff's goods for sale at less than cost price—Injunction refused.

This case raised a somewhat interesting and important question, viz.—whether the plaintiffs, who were piano manufacturers, were entitled to restrain the defendant, a dealer in pianos, from advertising the plaintiffs' pianos for sale at less than cost price without in fact having any of such pianos in his possession. The plaintiffs carried on their business in London. They made and supplied to their customers pianos of various classes, among others being a class of piano which they called the "Britannia model," and sold to the trade at the price of 15 guineas; "Class 2," which they supplied to the trade at 17 guineas; and "Class 6a," which they described in their price lists as "upright grand, iron frame, check action, trichord" pianos, and sold to the trade at the price of £23 10s. The defendant was a furnishing contractor carrying on business in Manchester. In the early part of 1895 the plaintiffs supplied to the defendant the following pianos at trade prices:—Two pianos of Class 2, one of Class 6a, and two Britannia models, the last two forming part of an order for 12 pianos of that class, an order which the plaintiffs, in consequence of some dissatisfaction on their part with an advertisement issued by the defendant, refused to complete. On February 22, 1896, the defendant published in the Manchester Evening News—a newspaper having a large circulation in Manchester and the neighbourhood—an advertisement in the following form. It was headed "Great sale of pianos at Worsley's—hundreds of bargains on view—pianos by all the great makers." After some particulars of pianos, chiefly second-hand, the advertisement continued, "New instruments at Worsley's, a fine upright grand by Ajello, iron frame, check action, trichord, price 15 guineas, or 15s. per month." Similar advertisements were afterwards inserted in late issues of the same paper, and in other newspapers also. The object of this action was to restrain the continuance or repetition of such advertisements. The plaintiffs' contention was that the piano described in the defendant's advertisements corresponded with their pianos of Class 6a, which were sold to the trade at £23 10s., that the announcement that one of these pianos could be purchased at the retail price of 15 guineas was calculated to do them serious injury with their customers and in their trade generally, and that the publication of such an advertisement was an actionable wrong. The case was argued in March last, when his Lordship thought that the decision of the House of Lords in the then pending case of "Allen v. Flood" might have some bearing upon the question before him; he accordingly postponed his judgment until the decision in "Allen v. Flood" (reported ante p. 125) should have been made known.

Mr. Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Mr. John Cutler, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and the Hon. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, after stating the facts and referring to the nature of the advertisements, said that he thought that a number of the public on reading them would be led to believe that the defendant had in stock and for sale at the price of 15 guineas a new instrument made by the plaintiffs which might properly be described as an upright grand with iron frame and check action and trichord. The defendant, on cross-examination, had, in fact, admitted that the meaning of the advertisement was that he had the new instruments in stock. It was further admitted that at the dates of the several advertisements complained of the defendant had no piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture in stock; consequently the advertisements in the sense in which the public would, in his Lordship's opinion, naturally understand them were untrue. It was established by the evidence that the plaintiffs' had suffered damage by reason of the advertisements. It was proved that certain of their customers, who were retail dealers in pianos, declined to give them any further orders on the ground that, buying as they did the plaintiffs' lowest-priced pianos (Britannia model) at 15 guineas they could not sell new pianos of the plaintiffs' at the price advertised by the defendant; and that so long as these advertisements continued the public, believing that they could be supplied with the plaintiffs' pianos by the defendant at the price he advertised, would refuse to deal at higher prices. The defendant stated that it was his practice in business to advertise for sale articles in which he dealt, and in order to attract the public to select goods which had been for some time in stock and offer them at low prices yielding little or no profit while other goods were offered at prices which yielded considerable profits, that in the commencement of 1896 he began to advertise pianos in this way, and that he had in stock at that time a piano of the plaintiffs' of the Britannia model class, that he selected it among others to be offered at a low price, and that the advertisement was intended originally to refer to that particular piano. His Lordship then considered the evidence and said that it must be taken that the defendant began the publication of the advertisements complained of at a time when he had in stock a Britannia model piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture, but continued to advertise it for sale long after that piano had in fact been sold and had not been replaced by any other piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture. Under these circumstances, continued his Lordship, the plaintiffs at the trial asked for an injunction restraining the defendant from advertising for sale any of the plaintiffs' pianos unless he had in his possession a piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture and of the class advertised. By limiting their claim to an injunction so limited they virtually admitted that if the defendant had in his possession a piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture and of the class advertised he might offer it for sale at any price he chose. It was obvious that the owner of any property was entitled to sell or dispose of it for such consideration as he might see fit, and either at a profit or at a loss. His Lordship took it to be settled by "Allen v. Flood" (reported ante p. 125) that the motive of the owner for so acting could not be inquired into. He further thought that, as a general rule, any person might sell or offer for sale at any price whatsoever goods of which he was not the owner, but which he expected or hoped to acquire. It was expressly provided by section 5 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, that "the goods which form the subject matter of a contract for sale may be either existing goods owned or possessed by the seller or goods to be manufactured or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract for sale"; and these last mentioned goods were in the Act designated by the convenient term "future goods." If a seller might contract to sell future goods, he must be at liberty, as the first step to such a contract, to offer them for sale; and there was nothing to prevent him making the offer by advertisement or any other lawful way. Again, it seemed that he was entitled to make the offer at any price he chose, whether remunerative or not, and it might be worth a trader's while to sell some goods at a loss so long as he was able to sell other goods at a countervailing or more than countervailing profit. In all this his Lordship assumed that the seller was acting honestly; if what he did was tainted with fraud he might be guilty of an actionable wrong. An illustration was afforded by the case of "Richardson v. Sylvester" (L.R., 9 Q.B., 34). There the defendant advertised to let a farm of which he was not the owner and which he knew he had no power to let; the plaintiff saw the advertisement and visited and inspected the farm with a view of becoming the tenant. It was held that the plaintiff might maintain an action to recover the expenses to which he had been put and which were thrown away. In the present case the plaintiffs had in the autumn of 1895 refused to supply the defendant with any of their pianos, and they continued such refusal down to the commencement of the action. The defendant, therefore, could not get from the plaintiffs directly any of their new pianos; but he might by indirect means have acquired new pianos of theirs upon terms which would not, indeed, enable him to sell them at a profit, but which need not have involved a ruinous loss. If, then, the defendant had seen fit to advertise that he was prepared to supply new pianos of the plaintiffs' manufacture of the Britannia model type, he would have been within his legal rights. It was said, however, that the advertisement actually published contained two misrepresentations—first, that the pianos to which they related (being, according to the defendant's own statement, of the Britannia model type) were described "upright grand . . . iron frame, check action, trichord"; and, secondly, that such pianos were in the possession of the defendant at the several dates when the advertisement appeared. As regards the first, his Lordship had already said, in considering the evidence, the description was not inaccurate; and in argument the main stress was laid on the second. In his Lordship's judgment this misrepresentation did not make the advertisement fraudulent; and in order that a misrepresentation might be actionable it must not merely be untrue, but cause damage to the person who complained of it. The question then arose, Was the damage complained of by the plaintiffs attributable to the misrepresentations of fact contained in them? It appeared to his Lordship that this question must be answered in the negative, for an advertisement such as the defendant might legally have issued would have produced precisely the same consequences and been followed by the same damaging results. No decision in support of such an action as the present was cited in argument. What was mainly relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel was a passage from the judgment delivered by Lord Bowen in the Court of Appeal in "Mogul Steamship Company v. M'Gregor" (23 Q.B.D., 578). His Lordship did not think it necessary to inquire whether the law as laid down by the House of Lords in "Allen v. Flood" imposed any limitation or qualification on the view there expressed, and in his opinion the present case did not fall within those in which damage was caused by misrepresentation within the meaning of the Lord Justice. The class of cases which he probably had in his mind was that of which "Ratcliffe v. Evans" (L.R. [1892], 2 Q.B., 524) was an example—viz., where the defendant had intentionally published an untrue statement regarding the plaintiff's business, and thereby had in the ordinary course caused damage to the plaintiff. Here the untrue statement related to the defendant's own business; and, as might be pointed out, if it affected the plaintiffs' business at all, it did not affect it exclusively, for every music-dealer in the neighbourhood of Manchester who happened at the time to have had a piano of the plaintiffs' in his shop suffered damage as well as the plaintiffs. However, for the reasons already given, his Lordship thought the damage was not caused by the misrepresentation contained in the advertisement, and consequently the action failed and must be dismissed.

BRUCE V. LOWENFELD.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Privilege of advertising on all programmes "sold" within a theatre.

In this case the plaintiff, who is the owner of a long lease of the Prince of Wales Theatre, sought to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant, his under lessee, from interfering with him in the distribution among the visitors to the theatre of programmes containing advertisements. It appeared from the statement of counsel that the plaintiff had let the theatre for a term of years to the defendant at a rent of £500 a month, and that, by agreement between the parties, the defendant had let to the plaintiff what is known in theatrical parlance as the "front of the house"—that was to say, Mr. Bruce was to have the management of the refreshment-rooms, bars and cloak-rooms, the supply of programmes, the sale of books and music, and the right to take the customary fees in respect of these matters. The consideration for the granting of these privileges to the plaintiff was the payment by him of a sum of £25 a week and a moiety of the profits made under the agreement. By the terms of the agreement the plaintiff was to have the sole and exclusive privilege of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements "upon all the programmes sold within the theatre," but the defendant was to be at liberty to give seven days' notice to the plaintiff of his desire to discontinue the charging of fees to visitors for cloak-room accommodation or the supply of programmes, and upon the giving of such notice certain consequences were to follow. The defendant had in fact given such notice. Disputes had arisen between the parties, who took different views as to the true construction of the agreement, the contention of the defendant being that, as the plaintiff had no right, after the receipt of the notice to discontinue the charging of fees, to "sell" programmes at the theatre, and as the agreement by its terms only contemplated the issue of advertisements upon programmes "sold," therefore the plaintiff had no right to continue the practice of advertising upon the programmes. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had interfered with him in the distribution of programmes containing advertisements, and that, as he was bound by contracts to a considerable amount for the insertion of such advertisements in the programmes, he would be seriously injured if he were prevented from performing those contracts, and he accordingly asked for an injunction against the defendant. There were other questions in dispute under the agreement, but the principal point related to the supply of programmes. The plaintiff had obtained an interim injunction last week, and he now moved for a continuance of that order.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. G. Cave were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Sargent for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING came to the conclusion, for the purposes of the motion, that the defendant was not entitled to insist that the programmes supplied by the plaintiff should not contain advertisements. Having regard to the terms of the whole agreement, however, he thought there was a question for the trial, and upon the balance of convenience that there should be an injunction in accordance with the notice of motion. The plaintiff would give the usual undertaking in damages, and also an undertaking to keep an account until the trial of the moneys received by him in respect of the advertisements.

ASHWORTH V. WELLS.*

Damages—Measure of—Sale of orchid—Breach of Warranty.

This was an appeal from the Manchester County Court. The facts were these:—The plaintiff, an amateur orchid-grower on a large scale, had bought an orchid at a sale of the defendant's collection of orchids by Messrs. Protheroe and Morris on June 26 and 27, 1895. The orchid was warranted by the defendant to be a Cattleya Aeklandiae alba, a very great rarity, if not unique. It had never flowered while in possession of the defendant, and it turned out after two years' cultivation by the plaintiff to be not an alba or white Cattleya, but the ordinary purple one, which was only worth 7s. 6d. The plaintiff then brought an action for damages. The defendant admitted liability and paid into Court 20 guineas and two guineas for interest, which he said was sufficient. The County Court Judge thought that the sum paid in was enough, and gave judgment for the defendant. He also found that if the orchid had been really an alba it would have been worth more than £50 at the time of the sale.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C. (Mr. Tweedale with him), appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Montague Lush for the defendant.

MR. RUSSELL cited "Randall v. Raper" (E.B. and E., 84), "Peterson v. Ayre" (13 C.B., 353). He referred to section 53 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. He said the County Court Judge was wrong in thinking that enough had been paid into Court. He practically had only given back to the plaintiff the amount he had paid. He should have considered the value at which the orchid would have arrived by this time. The claim was reduced to £50 in order to give jurisdiction to the County Court to try the case.

MR. MONTAGUE LUSH said that as the sale of the orchid had taken place at a largely-attended auction the price given was the real market price. It was wrong to assume that if the orchid had been a white one it would have flowered by this time. It might never have flowered at all. On the question of measure of damages he cited "Clare v. Maynard" (6 A. and E., 519), "Williams v. Reynolds" (6 B. and S., 495). The claim by the plaintiff was speculative, as no one had ever seen a white orchid of this class.

The COURT held that the matter must go back to the County Court Judge.

MR. JUSTICE DAY had come to this conclusion with considerable reluctance. He thought that the plaintiff's real cause of complaint was that he had had to pay the costs of the County Court action. The defendant admitted that he was wrong in his warranty. The plaintiff had spent time and trouble and money in cultivating the Cattleya. The Judge of the County Court had apparently considered nothing but the original price of 20 guineas. It was very likely that if the orchid had been a white orchid it might have been worth more than £50, but it was only speculation, after all, because such a thing as a white orchid of this particular species was really unknown. The matter should go back to the County Court Judge.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE said he did not disagree with his learned brother in sending the case back, though he thought that the Court had sufficient material to decide the case themselves. The true measure of damages was not the difference between the contract price of the orchid and the price at which it would sell now, but, putting it generally, the measure was the difference in value of the thing sold with the defect warranted against and the value of the thing without the defect. Here the evidence was all one way. If the orchid had been what it was represented it would have been worth perhaps £100. If the County Court had jurisdiction to deal with that amount the plaintiff might recover the difference.

Licensing Acts—Licence—Removal of a licence—Licensing Act, 1872, sec. 50.

Decision of the Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 507) affirmed.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Cave and Mr. Justice Ridley) making absolute a rule for a writ of certiorari to quash an order made by the licensing justices for the Wandsworth division, reported 13 The Times Law Reports, 507. The order in question granted a licence to George Coulson Lacey in respect of 2, Abercrombie-street, Battersea, for the sale of beer, wines, and spirits, to be consumed off the premises. Lacey was, at the time of the order, licensee of the Five Ales public-house, which was next door to 2, Abercrombie-street. A beer off-licence had been granted in respect of the Five Ales before 1890. In 1890 a new off-licence was granted to the licensee of the Five Ales, who had arranged to take the cellar of 2, Abercrombie-street, in respect of this new cellaring. All access to the cellar from No. 2 was closed, and an entrance was made from the Five Ales. In 1897 Lacey gave notice of his intention to apply for a new licence for the whole of 2, Abercrombie-street, and at the hearing offered to give up the Five Ales licence if the new one was granted. The justices granted the licence on those terms. A rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to quash this order was obtained by Messrs. Lacom and Co., a firm of brewers, who were the reversioners of the lease of the Five Ales. The grounds on which the rule was obtained were that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order, because it was in effect an order of removal under section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and Lacey had not complied with the requirements of the section, and, further, that Lacey was not at the time of the general annual licensing meeting the real resident owner and occupier of the premises as required by law. Section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, provides that an application for the removal of a licence shall be made by the person desiring to be the holder of the licence when removed; that notice shall be given in the same manner as notice of an application for a new licence; that a copy of the notice shall be personally served on the owner of the premises from which the licence is to be removed; and that the justices shall not make an order unless they are satisfied that no objection to such removal is made by the owner of the premises to which the licence is attached, or by the holder of the licence, or by any other person whom the justices shall determine to have a right to object to the removal. The Divisional Court were of opinion that this was a case of removal, and made the rule absolute. Lacey appealed.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. J. C. Earle appeared for Lacey; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. Foote, Q.C., Mr. Bodkin, and Mr. Travers Humphreys for Lacom and Co.; Mr. Avory and Mr. Edwardes Jones for the justices.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this was in substance a removal of a licence, and therefore the provisions of section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, applied. As those provisions had not been complied with, the order was rightly quashed.

LORDS JUSTICES CHITTY and COLLINS concurred.

IN RE SWEETING, A SOLICITOR.*

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation by client.

On a taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs at the instance of a client there cannot be taken into account costs incurred during a period when the solicitor had no certificate.

This was a summons for a review of taxation, raising a short point under the Solicitors Act, 1874, which, curiously, has for all these years never called for an actual judicial decision. The question was whether in the taxation of a solicitor's bill, in consequence of the clients having obtained the common order for delivery of a bill of costs, taxation thereof and delivery up of documents in the hands of the solicitor, the solicitor could bring into the bill items in respect of business done during a period he had not taken out his certificate. The solicitor had delivered a bill which comprised charges in respect of business done for his clients during a period in which he had no certificate. The clients objected to having the costs in respect of that part of the business included in the bill. The taxing master, however, considered that he was bound by a decision of "In re Jones" (L.R., 9 Eq., 63) under the older Solicitors Act of 1843 to the effect that, though the solicitor's remedy by action for his costs (incurred during a period he had no certificate) was barred, the debt was not destroyed, and the solicitor on a taxation procured by his client was entitled to have these costs taken into account. The client took out this summons for a review of the taxation. The 26th section of the Act of 1843 provides,—"No person who is an attorney or a solicitor shall sue, prosecute, or defend any action or suit or any proceedings in any of the Courts aforesaid without having previously obtained a stamped certificate, which shall be then in force, shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement for or in respect of any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid whilst he shall have been without such certificate as last aforesaid"; while the latter part of the 12th section of the Act of 1874 (the statute now in force) enacts,—"No costs, fee, reward, or disbursement on account of or in relation to any act or proceeding done or taken by any person who acts as a solicitor, without being duly qualified so to act, shall be recoverable in any action, suit, or matter by any person or persons whomsoever."

Mr. A. Rowden was for the clients; Mr. T. B. Napier for the solicitor.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH held that the decision of "In re Jones" (L.R., 9 Eq., 63), on which the taxing master acted, had been superseded by the Act of 1874, the provisions of which in respect of an uncertificated solicitor were much more stringent than those of the earlier Acts. His Lordship referred to "Fowler v. Mommouthshire Railway and Canal Company" (4 Q.B.D., 334), a case on the present Act, where it was held that the successful party in litigation could not get from the defeated party in costs anything in respect of his solicitor's costs incurred during a period the solicitor had not a certificate, contrary to a decision under the old law. His Lordship said it would be a strange thing if the client could not recover from his opponent costs he might be forced to pay if the solicitor insisted on a lien and he had to resort to an order for taxation. His Lordship also referred to the comments of Lord Esher in the case of "Kent v. Ward" (70 L.T., 612) on the present position of an uncertificated solicitor, to the effect that a solicitor could not make any one liable to him in respect of solicitor's business done while he was uncertificated. In his Lordship's opinion, the charges incurred during the period the certificate had not been taken out did not constitute a debt or matter which ought to be brought into the bill for taxation, on which the clients had submitted to pay.

*Reported by D. FITZGERALD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He directed the taxation to be reviewed and the items incurred during the period in question to be discarded. [Solicitors—Greig, Meikle, and Briggs, for the applicants; Sweeting, for the respondent.]

CARTER V. CLARKE AND OTHERS.*

Master and Servant—Employers' Liability Act—"Plant"—Defective condition—Hold of vessel not properly ventilated—Negligence of person in superintendence.

This was an appeal from the Lewes County Court. The action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and resulted in judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants, Messrs. Stephenson Clarke and Co., were under a contract to supply coal to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company. They shipped the coal at Cardiff, in vessels belonging to the London, Antwerp, and Continental Navigation Company, to be carried to Newhaven. On March 26, 1897, an explosion of gas took place on board one of the vessels so used, by means of which the plaintiff, who was a man employed in unloading the vessel, received the injuries complained of. The plaintiff was one of a gang of men employed by a man named Wicks, who was employed by the defendants to provide a gang for the purpose of unloading the vessel. The action was brought originally against Messrs. Stephenson Clarke and Co. Subsequently the shipowners were joined as defendants. The particulars of demand alleged that the explosion was caused "by reason of a defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant" used by the defendants, under subsection 1 of section 1 of the Act, and further, "by reason of the negligence of a person in the service of the defendants who had superintendence intrusted to him," and "of a person to whose orders or directions the plaintiff was bound to conform." Under subsections 2 and 3 it was proved that the vessel was not provided with proper ventilators; that it was ordinarily ventilated by opening the hatches during the voyage, but that, in this case, owing to rough weather, it had not been possible to open the hatches. On her arrival in port the hatches were removed, and the men immediately went into the hold with their lanterns and the explosion took place.

The action against the shipowners was dismissed, but the learned JUDGE gave judgment against Messrs. Stephenson Clarke and Co., holding that the vessel was part of their "plant" and that it was defective in not being properly ventilated.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Bankes appeared for the appellants, Messrs. Stephenson Clarke and Co.; Mr. Boxall for the respondent, the plaintiff in the action; and Mr. Laing for the shipowners.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., contended that the vessel was not "plant" used by Messrs. Stephenson Clarke and Co. He cited "Brannagan v. Robinson" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 344) and "Simpson v. Burrell" (23 Rettie, 500).

Mr. BOXALL contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that his claim was good under subsections 2 and 3 of the Act. Wicks, he said, knew that the vessel had no ventilators. He knew also that it contained Welsh coal, and a kind of coal particularly liable to generate gas, and that the hatches had not been opened during the voyage. Notwithstanding that knowledge, he allowed the men to go down as soon as the hatches were removed. He was therefore clearly guilty of negligence.

MR. JUSTICE DAY, in dismissing the appeal, said that the ship must, for the purposes of the action, be considered as plant used by the defendants Messrs. Stephenson Clarke and Co. The development of gas in a vessel not provided with ventilators was what might be expected. It had not been possible to open the hatches during the voyage. It was, therefore, negligence on the part of the stevedore to permit the men to approach the hold with lighted lamps immediately after the hatches had been removed.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

MILLARD V. WASTALL.*

Local Government—Smoke nuisance—Notice to abate—Validity—Public Health Act, 1875.

This was an appeal, by case stated, from the decision of justices, dismissing an information under the Public Health Act, 1875, section 91, and the following sections, charging the respondent with committing a nuisance by permitting black smoke to be discharged from a chimney not being a chimney belonging to a dwelling-house. A preliminary objection was taken to the information that the notice on which it was founded did not set out the works required to be done to remedy the nuisance. The objection was allowed, and the information was dismissed. Section 94 provides that the notice shall be a notice requiring the person causing the nuisance "to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose."

MR. F. LOW, for the appellant, contended that it was not in all cases necessary to specify in the notice works to be done in order to abate the nuisance, because in many cases, as in the present, no works were necessary.

The respondent was not represented.

MR. JUSTICE DAY, in allowing the appeal, said that it was not necessary for the local authority to invent works to be done by persons whom they required to abate a nuisance. All that was required in the present instance was that the respondent should refrain from using such coal as caused the emission of black smoke from his chimney.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that it was no more necessary to prescribe works to be done to abate a nuisance of black smoke than it was to abate a nuisance caused by keeping a pig.

HOWDEN AND CO. V. THE STEAMSHIP NUTFIELD COMPANY (LIMITED).†

Ship—Charterparty—General average—Wages of crew while vessel detained in port through stress of weather—Right of shipowner to retain general average contribution as against charterer.

This was an action brought to recover a sum of money which the defendants, as owners of the steamship Nutfield, had recovered in general average in respect of expenditure on wages and provisions in ports of refuge in the following circumstances. By a charterparty dated November 12, 1896, the defendants agreed to let and the plaintiffs to hire the steamship Nutfield for the term of four to six months, charterers' option (with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen), on the following conditions. The material clauses of the charterparty were as follows:—"1. That the owners shall provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; shall pay for the insurance of the vessel; also for all engine-room stores, and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service. That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, ballast, pilotages, agencies and commissions, and all other charges whatsoever, except those before stated. 2. That the charterers shall pay for the use of the said vessel at the rate of £850 per calendar month. 6. Payment to be made monthly in advance. 7. That the captain shall be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain signing bills of lading or in otherwise complying with the same. 11. That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than 24 working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she shall be again in an efficient state to resume her service; and should she in consequence put into any other port than that to which she is bound the port charges and pilotage at such port to be borne by the steamer owners; but should the vessel be driven into port or anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense. 12. That should the vessel be lost any freight paid in advance and not earned shall be returned to the charterers. . . . Average as per York and Antwerp rules, 1890." Rule XI., read with rule X., of the York and Antwerp rules, 1890, provides that "when a ship shall have entered or been detained in any port in consequence of accident, sacrifice, or other extraordinary circumstances which render that necessary for the common safety, the wages payable to the master, officers, and crew, together with the cost of maintenance of the same during the extra period of detention in such port or place until the ship shall or should have been made ready to proceed on her voyage, shall be admitted as general average." The Nutfield loaded a cargo of steel rails at Antwerp for Rio de Janeiro. Bills of lading were given for the cargo which provided that general average should be according to York and Antwerp rules, 1890. The plaintiffs received the whole freight on the rails in advance. In the course of her voyage to Rio the Nutfield was compelled, owing to stress of weather and accidents to the cargo, to put into Southampton, Plymouth, and Vigo, at each of which places she remained for a number of days, during which under the terms of the charterparty hire continued to run, and the defendants had to pay for the wages and provisions of the captain and crew. At the end of the voyage a general average statement (which was admitted in evidence) was made up, under which the expenditure in respect of wages and provisions during the period of detention at the three ports of refuge was contributed to by the contributing interests—namely, the ship and the cargo as increased in value by the payment of freight in advance.

The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to the contribution so received by the defendants.

Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. F. Laing appeared for the defendants.

At the conclusion of the argument, his Lordship reserved judgment.

The learned JUDGE, in giving judgment, said that the case raised a novel and curious point. The plaintiffs had to make out that they were entitled either by virtue of contract or on well-known equitable principles to recover the moneys which the defendants had received. His Lordship then stated the facts of the case and read the clauses of the charterparty and York-Antwerp rules set out above, and, continuing, said that the relations of the parties to that charter were those that had been described in the case of "Manchester Trust v. Furness" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 539). The captain in signing bills of lading no doubt in a sense was acting for the charterers, but he remained the servant of the owners. The plaintiffs said that, although the defendants had paid for the wages and provisions during detention, as they were bound by the charterparty to do, still they were none the worse off, inasmuch as they had received hire for the whole of that period, that the plaintiffs and not the defendants were the losers by the stay in the ports of refuge, and that the wages and provisions during that period were in effect paid by the plaintiffs, because the hire was calculated at a rate sufficient to reimburse the defendants for the cost of wages and provisions. But the plaintiffs had to make out, not that the defendants ought not to have received contribution, but that they were entitled to get that contribution out of the defendants' hands. Mr. Scrutton contended that the charterers, having undertaken to indemnify the owners against the consequences of the captain signing bills of lading, were entitled to the benefits received under the bills of lading, which were contracts really made on their behalf. But had the plaintiffs made out any legal right to receive that contribution which was by the York-Antwerp rules made in respect of wages and provisions for which the plaintiffs had stipulated that the defendants should pay? If the plaintiffs had themselves claimed to recover general average contribution, the answer would at once have been made that it was not they who paid the wages. In substance the plaintiffs were seeking compensation for loss of time which by the terms of their contract they had undertaken to bear, having moreover agreed that compensation should be paid, not for loss of time, but for expenditure on wages and provisions. The defendants were, therefore, entitled to judgment.

THE BOYNTON.*

Ship—Collision—Steamship and sailing ship—
Stopping and reversing rule discussed.

In this case the plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Helena, and claimed damages for a collision between their vessel and the defendants' steamship Boynton. The defendants counter-claimed for the damages they had sustained. It appears that at about 1.30 a.m. on December 16, 1897, the Boynton was steering E. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. up the Bristol Channel, when the masthead and red lights of the Helena were sighted about a point on the port bow. The Boynton continued on her course till the Helena, when about 2 to 2½ points on the port bow and about two ships' lengths away, suddenly opened her green light. As the only means of avoiding collision the Boynton was kept on her course at full speed, but the Helena with her stem and port bow struck the Boynton a heavy blow about abreast of the engine-room on the port side, causing the damages complained of.

Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Dawson Miller appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Pyke, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall for the defendants.

The PRESIDENT, after finding the facts set out above and holding the Helena to blame, said,—The question now is when the Boynton saw the green light of the Helena open at some such distance and some such bearing, whether or no she is to be condemned because she undoubtedly did not stop and reverse. Now I think the law about this matter is not quite the same as it was, and perhaps the obligation to stop and reverse is now somewhat less stringent on vessels. The old rule 18 was:—"Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary." Now, as we all know, the rule received a stringent application in the case of the Khedive (5 App.Cas., 876)—where it was held that the rule must be obeyed strictly. The case of the Benares (9 P.D., 16) undoubtedly added that where the one course of seeking safety was not to obey the rule, but to keep one's speed, then the general principles of navigation allowed by the latter article enabled the speed to be kept, and the strict obligation of article 18 was not to be followed, but that article 23 of the old rules applied. The law as it now stands appears to me to have been framed in contemplation of those cases, and now one has to look, I think, at article 21, article 23, and also, of course, article 29. Article 21:—"Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course and speed." It is suggested that this only applied where the vessels' courses were crossing and when they were some little distance from one another. I cannot accept this, partly because it is obvious that article 18 was intended, when modified, to apply to cases where the collision is imminent, when one looks at the note to article 21:—"When, in consequence of thick weather or other causes, such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving-way vessel alone, she also shall take such action as will best aid to avert collision." Article 23 reads:—"Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop and reverse"—that is to say, under the obligation which both vessels were under under article 18 of the old rules. The result is that when collision is imminent and one vessel is to keep her course and speed it must be read with this modification:—"If the collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving-way vessel alone, then the other vessel is to take such action as will best aid to avert collision." That is the state of things which has arisen in the present case. Owing to the action of the Helena the Boynton found herself so close that a collision could not be avoided by the action of the Helena alone, and then came the obligation on the Boynton, not absolutely to stop and reverse, as it would have been under the old rules, article 18, but "to take such action as would best aid to avert collision." It might perhaps be put under article 29, but then it probably comes to the same thing. The way I prefer to put it is to consider whether the Boynton took such action as would best aid to avert the collision. Upon the point I have consulted the Trinity Master and considered the matter carefully, having regard to the facts as I have found them to be, and I am advised that there would have been a collision even if the Boynton had stopped and reversed. The conclusion which I have come to is that the Boynton took such action as best aided to avert collision, and I hold the Helena alone to blame.

GRANT V. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*
Negligence—Railway company—Shunting operations—Personal injuries—Evidence of negligence.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Henn Collins at the trial of the action with a special jury at Glamorgan. The case is reported in The Times of July 5 last. The action was brought by the widow of a railway shunter named Grant against the Great Western Railway Company for compensation for the death of her husband, which occurred from an accident whilst shunting. At the place where the accident happened there were several curved lines of railway connecting the Great Western Railway with the Taff Valley Railway. These several curves converged and met at each end before connecting the two main lines. They were used as sidings. According to the plan used at the trial the Taff Valley Railway was at the right-hand end of the curves and the Great Western Railway at the left-hand end. On January 19, 1897, the date of the accident, at about 9 o'clock in the evening, a Taff Valley train consisting of 38 wagons with a view to shunt into these sidings backed some way into curve No. 6 from the right-hand end. At this time there were 14 Great Western trucks standing in this curve and they were pushed further towards the left-hand end by impact with the tail of the Taff Valley train. There were also some Great Western trucks standing in curve No. 5. Each of these two sidings was long enough to accommodate 26 wagons. A shunter named James was sent from the Taff Valley train to see Stone, the Great Western foreman of the sidings, for instructions as to the best mode of shunting the train. Stone told him to back out of No. 6 and put all the wagons he could into No. 5 before putting any into No. 6, and at the same time he directed a Great Western engine-driver to clear No. 5 of the Great Western trucks and having done that to back into No. 6 from the left-hand end and hook on to the 14 trucks and remove the lot to another siding called the long siding. It appeared that while the Taff Valley train was standing in curve No. 6 awaiting instructions, Grant, without the knowledge of either Stone or James, had uncoupled the last 12 wagons, so that when the train moved out of curve No. 6 and shunted into curve No. 5, which had then been cleared, these 12 wagons were left behind in curve No. 6. In shunting into curve No. 5 the remaining 26 wagons completely filled the siding and the consequence was that the engine stood on the crossing at the right-hand junction of the two curves. In this state of things the Great Western engine, having cleared No. 5 of trucks, backed into No. 6 in order to hook on to the 14 Great Western trucks and remove them, but the engine-driver, not knowing that the position of these trucks had been shifted, or that the 12 trucks of the Taff Valley train were in this siding, went too fast and so drove the last of the 12 trucks on to the Taff Valley engine. The deceased was on the line between the 12 trucks and the Taff Valley engine and was crushed to death. The jury gave a verdict in favour of the plaintiff, with damages £250. The learned Judge, however, held that there was no evidence of negligence and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Abel Thomas, Q.C., and Mr. T. F. Howell were for the appellant; Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., and Mr. Benson were for the respondents.

Their LORDSHIPS were of opinion that the learned Judge had taken a too narrow view of the duties of the defendants in these shunting operations and they were not prepared to hold that there was no evidence of negligence. The appeal should, therefore, be allowed.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1898.
Chitty, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Jan. 21.
IN THE MATTER OF AN APPLICATION FOR THE ISSUE OF A BANKRUPTCY NOTICE.*

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Scotch judgment registered in England.

The Court has no power to grant leave to issue a bankruptcy notice founded on a Scotch decret or judgment registered in England under sec. 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

This was an application for an order to issue a bankruptcy notice, Mr. Registrar Giffard having refused to order it to issue. The application was made ex parte in December last, when the Court, upon the ground that the question was an important one, directed the applicant to serve notice of the application on the debtor (see The Times of December 18). This having been done, the application now came on for hearing. It appeared that the applicant had obtained a "decret" or judgment in Scotland against the debtor for the payment of a sum of over £1,000, and this judgment was registered in England under section 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., c. 54). The applicant then applied under section 4 subsection 1 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for the issue of a bankruptcy notice founded upon the Scotch "decret" or judgment, which the Registrar, upon the authority of "In re Watson—ex parte Johnston" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 21), refused. Section 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, provides that a certificate of an extract of a decret of the Court of Session in Scotland for the payment of any debt, damages, or expenses may be registered in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, and "such certificate when so registered shall from the date of such registration be of the same force and effect as a judgment obtained or entered up in the Court in which it is so registered." By section 4 the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster shall have and exercise the same control and jurisdiction over any decret, and over any certificate of such decret, as it now has and exercises over any judgment or decret in its own Court, "but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act."

Mr. F. C. WILLIS, for the applicant, contended that the Scotch decret having been registered in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, it had the same effect as a judgment in England upon which execution had not been stayed. He was therefore entitled to an order to issue a bankruptcy notice. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in "In re Watson—ex parte Johnston" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 21), which seemed to decide that the remedies under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, were limited to execution, was not in accordance with a later decision of the same Court in "In re Low—Bland v. Low" ([1894] 1 Ch., 147).

Mr. CARRINGTON, for the debtor, contended that the decision in "In re Watson—ex parte Johnston," was conclusive, and that the Court in the later case of "In re Low" never intended to disturb that decision in any way.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the case was governed by the authority of "In re Watson—ex parte Johnston," and in his opinion that decision was right. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, did not extend to Scotland, and the words "final judgment" in section 4, subsection 1 (g), obviously meant a final judgment obtained within the jurisdiction in which the Act applied, that is, a final judgment obtained in England. Therefore, if that section stood alone, the creditor would not have brought himself within it. It was said that section 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, gave power to issue a bankruptcy notice. It was true that section 3 of that Act was in large terms. But reading that section with section 4 a limitation was imposed upon that wide provision. The limitation was "in so far only as relates to execution under this Act." The application for a bankruptcy notice did not relate to execution. In his opinion that was the true construction of the Act. But, however that might be, the decision in "In re Watson—ex parte Johnston" was conclusive.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred upon the ground that the case came within the decision in "In re Watson—ex parte Johnston," which was binding upon this Court, and that "In re Low" was not inconsistent with that case.

Chitty, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Jan. 21.

IN RE PALMER—EX PARTE BRIMS.*

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Judgment creditor—Equitable assignment of judgment debt.

A judgment creditor who has made an equitable assignment of the judgment debt is still entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice in respect thereof.

This was an appeal against an order of Mr. Registrar Brougham setting aside a bankruptcy notice. In 1889 the debtor, Sir Charles M. Palmer, was in partnership with a Spanish gentleman named Martinez Rivas, under the style of Martinez Rivas Palmer, for the purpose of making docks in Spain. In that year the firm made a contract with a contractor named Brims, by which Brims undertook to construct docks for the firm in Spain. While the docks were being constructed the firm was converted into a Spanish company. Certain sums became due under the contract, and in 1892 an action was brought by Brims against Rivas and Sir C. M. Palmer to recover £16,273. Rivas allowed judgment to go against him by default, and on November 14, 1893, Sir C. M. Palmer consented to judgment being entered against him for the amount claimed. Sir C. M. Palmer subsequently paid part of this amount. Later on negotiations took place, in the course of which Sir C. M. Palmer requested Brims to go to Spain for the purpose of seeing what he could get from Rivas and the company, and it was agreed between Brims and Sir C. M. Palmer that any composition which the former could recover from Rivas or the company was not to affect his claim for the balance against Palmer. Brims, thereupon, went out to Spain, and it was arranged that all the creditors, whether of Martinez Rivas Palmer or of the company, or of both, should take bills of the company as security for their debts. On March 30, 1896, Brims received from the company a bill for £10,866, dated October, 1894, and payable two years after date. In the summer of 1896, shortly before the bill was becoming due, further negotiations took place between Brims and Sir C. M. Palmer in reference to an offer by Rivas to pay Brims and the other creditors 7s. in the pound on the company's bills, and Sir C. M. Palmer through his solicitors consented to Brims accepting the composition of 7s. in the pound. Rivas then paid Brims 7s. in the pound, and Brims signed a receipt, which stated that Brims had received from Rivas a certain sum (representing the above-named composition) in full for the purchase of all his claims, ascertained or unascertained, against the company and (or) the firm of Martinez Rivas Palmer. The receipt ended as follows:—"In consideration of the payment now made I undertake, if and when called upon, to execute a due assignment of all my claims as above to Señor Martinez Rivas or his nominee." Sir C. M. Palmer did know of the form of the receipt. Brims having served a bankruptcy notice upon Sir C. M. Palmer in respect of the judgment debt, the Registrar set it aside upon the ground that by virtue of the above document the debt was assigned by Brims to Rivas. It was stated by Sir C. M. Palmer in affidavit that in case Rivas tried to enforce the claim against him he had a counterclaim against Rivas largely exceeding the amount of the judgment debt. Brims appealed, and contended, as in the Court below, that there had been no assignment of the judgment debt against Sir C. M. Palmer, but only of his claim against the company on the bill.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. PICKFORD, Q.C., and Mr. AENEAS MACKINTOSH appeared for the appellant, and contended, in addition to the contentions in the Court below, that, assuming that there was an assignment of the judgment debt to Rivas, the assignment was only an equitable assignment, and that therefore Brims still had the right to sue at law, and was entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice. They referred to "In re Hastings, ex parte Dearle" (14 Q.B.D., 184).

Mr. MARSHALL HALL and Mr. R. E. MOORE, for the respondent, contended that, though this was only an equitable assignment, Brims was not a person who was entitled to enforce the judgment within the meaning of section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and did not therefore come within section 4 subsection 1 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. He could not issue execution on the judgment. Further, the Court would set aside the bankruptcy notice upon the ground that it was inequitable to issue it, as the respondent had a large counterclaim against Rivas, who was the person beneficially entitled to anything recovered under the judgment.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that many points had been argued, one being whether a certain document given by Brims to Rivas was an assignment of a judgment debt due from Sir Charles Palmer to Brims. His Lordship was not going to decide that question that day, but he might say that he felt this difficulty during the argument, that if the document assigned the judgment debt due from Rivas why was not the judgment debt due from Sir Charles Palmer also assigned? However, he could not decide that point. Brims was a judgment creditor of Sir Charles Palmer, and he was prima facie entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice on that judgment. In his opinion there was no legal assignment of the judgment debt, and Brims was entitled to issue the bankruptcy notice. The judgments delivered by the members of this Court in "In re Hastings—ex parte Dearle" showed that this was so. It was then said that it was wholly inequitable to allow a bankruptcy notice to issue because Brims had no interest in the debt. In his opinion Brims was entitled to issue execution on this judgment debt. It was then said that Sir Charles Palmer had a counterclaim or set-off against Rivas. He was by no means satisfied upon the affidavits before the Court that there was such a counterclaim or set-off, and, speaking for himself, he thought that it must be a counterclaim or set-off against the judgment creditor who was seeking to issue the bankruptcy notice.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. Sir Charles Palmer was unquestionably a debtor under a judgment. The judgment creditor was the person who had issued this bankruptcy notice, and he had the legal right to enforce the judgment. The alleged assignment of the judgment debt. Consequently, the legal right to issue execution remained vested in Brims. Assuming, therefore, that this was a good equitable assignment of the debt, which he did for the purposes of the argument only, Brims was trustee of this legal right for Rivas. His Lordship could not say that Brims did not come within section 4, subsection 1 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It would be a different matter when the petition came on to be heard, for then Brims would have to join Rivas, unless he then set up that there was no assignment at all of the judgment debt, which he would probably not do. He was content to rest his judgment upon the above ground. He would point out that section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, had not cut down Brims's rights under section 4, subsection 1 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. There was nothing in the words of section 1 of the Act of 1890 to show that the person who had obtained the judgment and was trustee of it for another had his rights under section 4, subsection 1 (g) of the Act of 1883 cut down.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

THE SOUTH HETTON COAL COMPANY (LIMITED) v. HAWELL, SHOTTON, AND EASINGTON COAL COMPANY.*

Practice—Pleading—Statement of claim—No cause of action disclosed—Striking out—O. 25, r. 4.

These were two motions on the part of the several defendants to strike out (under Order XXV., rule 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883) the statement of claim on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The action was for specific performance of an alleged contract by the defendant company in voluntary liquidation by the agency of their liquidator Mr. Holmes for the sale of certain coal measures known as the Easington and Undersea royalties which belonged to the defendant company, who also held a lease of coal measures known as the Pespool royalty. Besides the liquidating company, their liquidator and Mr. Barwick, a rival purchaser, were made defendants. The application was in the nature of the old demurrer, and was based entirely on the statements contained in the plaintiff's pleading. It appeared from the statement of claim that Mr. Holmes was negotiating with both the South Hetton Company, through their solicitors, Messrs. Dees and Thompson, and Mr. Barwick for the sale of the Easington and Undersea royalties. He made a proposal in writing to each party that they should send in sealed tenders, which he undertook should be opened on October 7 in the presence of the chairman and directors of his company. His invitation closed with the following words:—"And the highest net money tender I receive (all other things being equal and satisfactory), that tender I will at once accept." Mr. Barwick sent in a tender in the following terms:—"I hereby offer you the sum of £81,000 for the company's interest in the Easington and Undersea royalties, and, in addition, I agree to indemnify you and the company against all claims and liabilities under the Pespool lease, taking an assignment of the same as from May, 1896, and repaying the £1,000 already paid by the Messrs. Lamb." Messrs. Dees and Thompson sent in a tender on behalf of their principals as follows:—"Referring to previous negotiations we on behalf of the South Hetton Company offer for these royalties such a sum as will exceed by £200 the amount to-day offered for them by the other proposing purchaser, coupled with a transfer of the Pespool lease, if the other offer be upon that footing." Mr. Holmes accepted the tender of Mr. Barwick as the one he ought to act upon, and the plaintiffs brought this action on the footing that they had made the highest net money tender which ought to be acted on. They claimed specific performance of their alleged contract and an injunction to restrain the carrying out a sale of the royalties to Mr. Barwick.

MR. VERNON SMITH, Q.C., and Mr. MICKLEM for Mr. Barwick moved to strike out the statement of claim and for the dismissal of the action against him.

MR. YOUNGER moved for a similar order on the part of the defendant company and their liquidators.

MR. SWINFEN EADY, Q.C., and Mr. O. LEIGH CLARE, for the plaintiffs, maintained that a good cause of action was shown on the pleading.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH, on the construction of the letters set out in the statement of claim, came to the conclusion that if the plaintiffs' tender could be considered the "highest net money tender" received, it did not fulfil the condition "all other things being equal and satisfactory." Messrs. Dees and Thompson's tender was, he said, an ingenious attempt to get behind the offer of their rival bidder; if they had known what the contents of Mr. Barwick's letters were perhaps they might have succeeded. Their tender included an offer to take an assignment of the Pespool lease, which would carry with it an indemnity for rent from the date of the assignment, but Mr. Barwick offered an indemnity against existing claims in respect of the lease and to take an assignment from a period carrying with it payment of a year and a half's back rent, besides the payment of £1,000 that had been paid by somebody else. In his Lordship's opinion the statement of claim showed no just cause of action. He had been asked that an amendment might be made; such amendment, it was clear to him, would not strengthen the plaintiffs' case, and he made the orders asked for with costs.

CHASE V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND LESLIE AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Nuisance—Collecting crowd—Injury to neighbour's property—Interlocutory injunction refused.

The plaintiffs in this case, who were the owners and the occupier of Court Farm, Epsom, asked for an injunction to restrain the defendants from collecting or causing to be collected together, in or about certain works which are being carried on by the defendants upon lands adjacent to the plaintiffs' farm, large numbers of disorderly persons without providing, by means of proper fences or walls, for the protection of the plaintiffs' land from injury or trespass.

It appeared that in August, 1896, the London County Council bought a large estate at Epsom known as Horton Manor, consisting of 1,058 acres, in order to provide further asylum accommodation for pauper lunatics. On April 29, 1897, they entered into a contract with the defendants, Leslie and Co., for the construction of the foundations of an asylum for 2,000 patients upon a portion of the estate which was adjacent to the plaintiffs' land. Under the contract the work was to be done within six months, but, although commenced on May 28 last, it was not yet completed. The carrying out of these works necessarily involved the employment of a large number of workmen, it being in evidence that from 800 to 1,000 men were from time to time engaged by the contractors. The plaintiffs' case was that in consequence of the defendants not providing proper accommodation for the men and not fencing off the road by which they went to and from the works various acts of trespass and nuisance had been committed upon the plaintiffs' property. They alleged that the workmen had, amongst other things, broken down their fences, taken and used the wood for fires, trodden down and destroyed the crops, caused the cattle to stray, slept in the barns, used the hay, and committed acts of nuisance and indecency upon their lands. Under these circumstances they now moved for an injunction, contending that the case came within the principle of the authorities which decided that to bring together upon land a large crowd or gathering which was certain, if it dispersed, to cause a nuisance or do damage was an actionable wrong. They further pointed out that, although the present contract was nearly completed, it was only for the foundations of the building, and, having regard to the proposed building operations of the County Council in the future, the nuisance complained of might last for many years, and an injunction ought to be granted. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that they were not liable. The County Council said that the men were not employed by them but by the contractors, who were not the agents or servants of the Council, nor were the Council under any duty by law to see that the contractors controlled their men. The contractors submitted that after the men had left the works they had no control over them. This case, they contended, was distinguishable from the authorities as to the collection of crowds, because the workmen were themselves responsible for their acts of trespass, while the contractors were not bound to presume that the workmen would commit trespass or do other unlawful acts. With regard to the present application no injunction ought to be granted against the contractors inasmuch as the contract was almost completed.

MR. MILLAR, Q.C., and Mr. Muir M'Kenzie appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Methold for the London County Council; and Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. A. B. Terrell for Leslie and Co. (Limited).

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in dealing with that portion of the plaintiffs' case which rested upon the alleged neglect of the defendants to provide sleeping accommodation, said that it had not been shown that there was an inadequate supply of lodgings in the neighbourhood, and even if it had been his Lordship thought that that was not a matter upon which relief could properly be given on an interlocutory application. As regards the alleged indecent acts committed by the men, the police ought to intervene; and there was no evidence that the defendants had the police force at their disposal any more than the plaintiffs. With reference to the trespasses committed in going and coming to and from work, the case was thus put by the plaintiffs. A large number of men were brought by the defendants to a piece of land belonging to the Council which was not fenced off from the lands of their neighbours, the plaintiffs. There were two roads by which the men might leave, but still human nature being what it was it might reasonably be expected that unless precautions were taken to prevent it some of the men would make their way to and from their homes by short cuts over the plaintiffs' land. It was contended that the defendants ought to take precautions to prevent their men from entering on or leaving the lands of the Council otherwise than by the roads intended for the purpose. That was based on the law laid down in "Rex v. Moore" (3 B. and Ad., 184), where Lord Tenterden C.J., said, "If a person collects together a crowd of people to the annoyance of his neighbours that is a nuisance for which he is answerable; and this is an old principle"; and in the same case Littledale, J., said, "It has been contended that to render the defendant liable it must be his object to create a nuisance, or else that that must be the necessary and inevitable result of his act. No doubt it was not his object, but I do not agree with the other position, because if it be the probable consequence of his act he is answerable as if it were his actual object." The claim of the plaintiffs in this case went considerably beyond any application hitherto made of the doctrine there expressed, but his Lordship was not prepared to say that it might not prove to be to some extent well founded. Looking at all the circumstances of the case his Lordship thought he ought not to interfere by way of interlocutory injunction. Although he had come to that conclusion, he thought the matter required serious consideration on the part of the County Council; even if the possibility of their being held legally liable for what had happened be left out of consideration still they might reasonably be expected as owners of this property, on which they were erecting extensive buildings, to take care to minimize the inconvenience caused to neighbouring owners and occupiers by the presence of so large a body of men under imperfect control. There was one step which his Lordship would point out that the County Council might possibly take. The proposed asylum must at some time necessarily be fenced off. It would be very reasonable if the fences were erected before the building was proceeded with, so that they might be used for the purpose of preventing these trespasses. On the whole, he thought there ought to be no order on the motion, except that the costs be costs in the action, but this would be without prejudice to any further application by the plaintiffs in the event of any fresh contract being entered into by the County Council for the erection of the proposed buildings.

LANCHBURY V. BODE.*

Custom—Providing a common bull and a common boar for use of parishioners—Custom held good in law—Liability of owner of great tithes—

Lands allotted in lieu of tithes held not subject to the custom.

This was an action of a very singular nature raising the question of the existence of an ancient parish custom of providing a common bull and common boar for the use of the parishioners. The existence of such a custom is alluded to in Shakespeare's Henry IV., Part II., Act II., Scene ii., and in the last chapter of Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." The action was brought by Mr. James Lanchbury, clerk to the Parish Council of Haddenham, Buckinghamshire, and Mr. Frederick Merrick, on their own behalf, and also on behalf of themselves and all other the parishioners of the parish, against Mrs. Jane Elizabeth Bode, widow, claiming a declaration "that it was an ancient custom of the parish of Haddenham that the parson, as the owner of the great tithes of the said parish, and as a charge thereon, should keep within the said parish a common bull and a common boar for the common use of the kine and sows of the parishioners at any time for the increase of calves and pigs within the said parish; and that the defendant, as the present owner of the lands allotted in lieu of the great tithes, is bound to perform the said custom; an injunction to restrain the defendant, her agent and servants, from omitting to provide and keep a bull and a boar in accordance with the said custom, or from otherwise infringing the same; and damages." The plaintiffs alleged in their statement of claim that "from time immemorial it has been a custom in the parish of Haddenham that the parson of the parish as the owner of the great tithes thereof, and as a charge thereon, should provide and keep in the said parish a common bull and a common boar for the common use of the kine and sows of the said parishioners at any time." In the year 1312 the parsonage or rectory of Haddenham was appropriated by the Priory of Rochester, which was dissolved in the year 1540; and subsequently, in 1542, the parsonage or rectory, with the parish church, glebe, tithes, and property belonging thereto, was granted by King Henry VIII. to the Dean and Chapter of Rochester and their successors. Under an enclosure Act of George IV., passed in 1830, certain lands were allotted to the Dean and Chapter in satisfaction and discharge of the great tithes; and in 1866, by an Order in Council, the parsonage and rectory, with the parish church, &c., and the allotted lands, were transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who in 1881 sold the greater part of the allotted lands to Henry Bode, the defendant's late husband, subject to all charges and duties thereon. Henry Bode died in 1892, having devised the lands to his widow, the defendant. The plaintiffs then alleged that "the said bull and boar were always provided and kept by the said priory, the said Dean and Chapter, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners respectively, or their respective tenants on their behalf, and afterwards by the said Henry Bode; but the defendant has, although requested by the plaintiffs so to do, refused to provide and keep the same, and the plaintiffs who, as two of the parishioners, are entitled to the use of the said bull and boar for their cows and sows, have thereby sustained damage." The plaintiffs then claimed relief in the form above mentioned. In her defence the defendant denied the existence of the custom, and asserted that since the appropriation by the Priory of Rochester no parson or rector had resided in the parish or kept a bull or a boar therein, and that the Dean and Chapter had never performed or been required to perform this duty with respect to the parish. She also maintained that there was and always had been a sufficient supply of bulls and boars in the parish and the adjoining parishes, and that neither the plaintiffs nor any other inhabitants of the parish had suffered any damage for want of such animals. She suggested that the alleged custom arose from the fact that Mr. John Franklin, the "squire," and a large landowner in the neighbourhood, who died in 1862, had held the lands allotted in lieu of tithes on a renewable lease for 21 years, and, being interested in cattle-breeding, generally kept a bull on his estate, though not on the lands in question, and that this led to the erroneous impression that he was under a legal obligation to keep a bull and a boar; but that in 1865 the then vicar of the parish ascertained from the Dean and Chapter that neither the lease to Franklin nor any previous leases contained any reference to the alleged custom. She further contended that even if the alleged custom existed she was under no obligation to comply with it, not being the parson of the parish nor in receipt of the great tithes. The action now came on for trial. A number of aged parishioners were called on the part of the plaintiffs as witnesses with a view to proving the existence of the custom, and reliance was placed upon section 27 of the Inclosure Act of 1830, which provided that the commissioners under the Act should allot to the Dean and Chapter of Rochester and their lessee and successors, and to the vicars of the parish of Haddenham, "for and in lieu and satisfaction of and for the several and respective rectorial and vicarial tithes yearly arising, issuing, and renewing out of all and every" the common fields and waste grounds in the said parish, and out of the lands held in severalty within the same parish which were "subject to tithes," parcels of the said commonable lands, which parcels "shall be in full satisfaction and discharge of and for the said several rectorial and vicarial tithes arising, issuing, and renewing from and out of" the said commonable lands and the said lands held in severalty in the said parish. Then section 58 enacted that the lands and hereditaments allotted "for or in respect of any freehold lands, or for or in respect of any right of common or any right or interest appurtenant or appendant to such freehold lands, shall from and after the execution of the award be deemed to be freehold"; and that the lands allotted in respect of copyhold or leasehold lands, or for or in respect of any right of common or any right or interest appurtenant or appendant to any such copyhold and leasehold premises respectively, should from and after the execution of the award be deemed to be copyhold or leasehold respectively, "and shall be held as such by and under the same tenure, rents, payments, fines, heriots, customs, and services as the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold lands respectively for which such allotments shall be made are now or shall be held immediately before the execution of the said award." The evidence showed that a search through the records of the Dean and Chapter and of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had failed to discover any reference to the alleged custom.

*Reported by G. I. FOSTER COOKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Dunham appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Sir R. J. Cust for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH (without calling upon the defendant's counsel for argument) said that the custom alleged in the statement of claim was a good custom in law. Of course, the custom being properly alleged as a legal custom, the first question was whether it had been proved as a matter of fact. In the view that his Lordship took of the case it was unnecessary to answer that question either in the one way or in the other. He should assume that the evidence was sufficient to establish the custom as alleged. It was imposed on the parson of the parish as owner of the great tithes, and it followed that if the great tithes had been assigned to some other person or corporation the custom would go as an incident to the tithes. That he assumed. That brought him down to the year 1830, up to which time the tithes had been in the ownership of the Dean and Chapter of Rochester. In 1830 an Act of Parliament was passed which might be conveniently described as an "Inclosure Act." The general purport of it was to settle all commonable rights and rights of all kinds by an inquiry followed by an award, the result of which would be to allot lands in satisfaction of all rights subsisting up to that time. It was unnecessary to go into the Act at length. All he had to do was to consider that part of it which dealt with the ownership of the tithes. That was section 37. His Lordship read it, and continued:—Now, what was the effect of that? The Dean and Chapter of Rochester were to be compensated for the tithes proposed to be taken from them. The compensation was to go to them and their lessees. They were, it appeared, in the habit of demising the tithes for terms of years. It would have been iniquitous to give compensation to the Dean and Chapter and not to their lessees; the omission to do so would certainly have led to litigation under the covenants in the leases. The mere fact that the lessees were provided for in that way did not appear to be otherwise of importance upon the question he had to consider. The case made by the plaintiffs was that, without more than what he had said, the burden of keeping these animals for the use of the parish was by the Act shifted from the tithes to the land substituted for them, and notwithstanding that the tithes were thereby satisfied and discharged. The first objection was this. This was an ancient custom, to be proved by such evidence as the Court was in the habit of receiving upon such a point; that is to say, the evidence of old people, of documents, and of user. When the question came to be one of a charge on land, there was quite a different question to be considered. A charge on land was proved by producing the original conveyance creating the charge, unless the case was one in which a lost grant could be presumed; but, when the alleged charge was one going back, as here, only to the year 1830, one expected to find something in the nature of an express charge; and it was almost incredible to suppose that the Legislature intended that, when the land was allotted, it should be taken subject to a charge that was not expressed. That appeared to his Lordship to be of itself a sufficient answer to the argument that the lands were to be taken subject to this charge. Now the tithes were one indivisible whole. His Lordship thought he was right in saying that they were to be considered as entire tithes. The right to collect and receive the tithes was one entire and indivisible right vested in the Dean and Chapter and must have been conveyed by them as a whole and not in part. As a matter of fact, the defendant was not the owner of all the lands allotted in substitution for the tithes. She was owner of only a part of those lands. It was said that as owner of part of the land she was liable to the custom. If so, the position must go to this—that the owner of each part of the lands, as, for instance, the owner of one acre, was subject to the custom. It could not be said that one part of the land was subject to the custom and that other parts were not. If so, it must follow that the owner of every piece of these lands must be subject, if at all, to the custom. If the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the custom against the defendant she would, his Lordship supposed, be entitled to contribution from the owners of other parts of the lands; but this conclusion could not be arrived at without stronger reasons being given for it than had been urged before him; and he was not aware of any precedent that the owner of the land could have a right of contribution in the case of such a custom as this. He would take the analogy of a lay rector entitled to a pew in the parish church. Supposing he had lands allotted to him in lieu of his rights as lay rector, could the right to the pew be parcelled out among the several owners of those lands? His Lordship believed that the question, though often mooted, had never been judicially decided, and, therefore, until it actually arose he should not express any decision upon it; but he thought, upon principle, that it fell within the same lines as a case of this kind. The person who wished to establish a right to the pew must do so by some rectorial right. If he could not do so, that was in substance an answer to the plaintiffs' case under section 37, and seemed conclusive. But then it was said there were two arguments, either of which was sufficient for the plaintiffs' case, even if section 37 were out of the way. The first argument was on section 58; but the words did not fit this case at all. (His Lordship read the section and continued.) The language did not apply to the case. The other argument was of a different character. The bull and the boar were kept and were available after the Inclosure Act as much as they were before. They were kept by those who would have kept them if the burden had been in fact shifted from the ownership of the tithes to the ownership of the substituted lands. But if his Lordship's view of section 37 was correct, they had now to deal with the setting up of a new custom, a custom quite different from a custom established by ancient user, a custom said to have been established in 1834. But what was attempted to be shown was that that was done in fulfilment of an obligation, and because there was a liability already existing. No doubt the liability was insisted on by some persons and was not contested by others; but there was nothing to show that when Mr. Bode did not contest his liability he admitted it. It would be monstrous to say that because a man would not contest a claim therefore he must be taken to have admitted it. Experience went to show that many people submitted to claims they believed to be unjust rather than go into litigation. His Lordship would not assume that because Mr. Bode did not dispute the liability therefore it was established against him. The fact was that the parishioners wished to keep up the alleged custom after the award, and they thought that the liability had been shifted from the tithes to the land, and they insisted on the obligation being performed as before. That, however, did not establish the liability, and his Lordship did not see that anything had been done by the Dean and Chapter or their successors, including Mr. Bode, showing that this liability existed. If it could be proved that Mr. Bode, being the owner in fee of these lands, had distinctly admitted this liability, it was possible that he and his successors might have been fixed with the liability, but it required a good deal of evidence to show that an owner in fee had burdened his estate in that way. Therefore his Lordship was of opinion that those other points did not disturb his view of section 37, and accordingly the plaintiffs' case failed, and the action must be dismissed with costs.

Fishery—Nets—Illegal size—Salmon Fisheries Acts.

It is not an offence under the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873, sec. 18 (3), to be in possession of a net with meshes of an illegal size.

*Reported by C. E. WILERHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal, by case stated, from a decision of justices of Merionethshire convicting the appellant of an offence under the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861.

Mr. Honoratus Lloyd and Mr. E. Owen Roberts appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Montague Lush for the respondent.

The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861, section 8, as amended by the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873, section 18, provides that—"No person shall do the following things or any of them, that is to say:—(1) Use any light for the purpose of catching salmon, trout, or char; (2) use any otter lath, or jack, wire, snare, spear, gaff, strokeball, snatch, or other like instrument for catching or killing salmon, trout, or char; (3) have in his possession a light or any of the foregoing instruments under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court before whom he is tried that he intended at the time to catch or kill salmon, trout, or char by means thereof." An information was laid against the appellant under the third subsection. It was proved that in July last the appellant was seen near the river Wnion, a salmon river, having in his possession a net the mesh of which was smaller than that permitted by section 10 of the Act. The justices held that the net came within the description "other like instrument" and convicted the appellant.

Mr. LLOYD contended that a net was not one of the instruments prohibited by section 8 (3), because to catch salmon by means of a net was perfectly lawful, provided the net were of the proper size of mesh. It was clear that the use of a net was not intended to be prohibited, because the offence of using a gaff an exception was expressly made in section 8, when it was used by sportsmen for landing fish, while no such exception was reserved in the case of a net. If the ruling of the justices were correct it would be illegal for a sportsman to carry a net for the purpose of landing fish.

Mr. LUSH contended that a net was ejusdem generis with a snare. He cited "Allen v. Thompson" (L.R., 5 Q.B., 336). He contended, further, that the justices were, at any rate, right in holding the net carried by the appellant to be ejusdem generis with a snare, because that net was an illegal net.

MR. JUSTICE DAY allowed the appeal and quashed the conviction. He said that the net found on the appellant, though an illegal net, was still a net, and was quite different from a snare. The meshes of the net were firm. Neither was it ejusdem generis with a snare.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that the object of the Act was to suppress illegal modes of fishing. The only legal modes of fishing were declared to be fishing by means of a rod and line and by means of nets. Section 10 enacted that it was illegal to use nets of less than a certain size of mesh, but it was nowhere enacted that it was illegal for a person to have such nets in his possession. If the Legislature had intended to make that an offence it would have said so. If the prosecutor desired to catch the appellant under section 10 he ought to have waited until he had found him attempting to catch fish with his net.

SYER V. ALDER.

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Sale of house.

This action was brought to recover damages for breach of an agreement that the defendant would sell to the plaintiff Nos. 1 and 2, Milton-villas, Southend, for £1,500. The defendant pleaded that the contract was conditional.

Mr. Coek, Q.C., and Mr. P. T. Blackwell appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Chester Jones for the defence.

It appeared that the contract was as follows:—"I, Andrew Alder, agree to sell and I, John Syer, agree to buy Nos. 1 and 2, Milton-villas, Southend. Contract to be delivered within 14 days or deposit to be returned." The plaintiff paid to the defendant a deposit of £20, which was returned to him after a few days. He declined to accept it, and instituted the present action. He considered the property was worth about £3,000.

Counsel for the defence contended that the terms of the contract gave the defendant the option of declaring the bargain off within 14 days, and evidence was adduced to show that such was the defendant's intention when entering into the agreement.

His LORDSHIP held that the first part of the agreement acted as a contract and the remainder was not a condition of its being binding; he gave the plaintiff £100 damages with costs.

Stay of execution for 14 days was granted with a view to an appeal.

MARKS V. FROGLEY AND OTHERS.*

Army—Volunteer—False imprisonment—Liability—Military law

This was an action tried in November last before his Lordship and a special jury, being a claim by a Volunteer for damages for assault and false imprisonment. After the verdict of the jury his Lordship reserved judgment until the questions of law arising in the case had been argued.

Mr. A. J. Tassell and Mr. Theobald Mathew appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY read the following judgment:—Henry Marks, the plaintiff in this action, who is a member of a Bedfordshire Volunteer corps, has obtained in an action for assault and false imprisonment which was tried before me, sitting with a special jury, a finding of the jury of £300 damages against three defendants—Arthur Cooper, who is a sergeant, and Thomas Lovelock and George Albert Short, who are privates in the same corps as that to which the plaintiff belongs. A further defendant in the action, Frederic Frogley, who is a superintendent of the Herts County Police, has had, upon the findings of the jury, a judgment in his favour, and no question arises in his case. The points affecting the three first-named defendants, which I reserved after argument for consideration, are of a somewhat peculiar nature. The facts relevant to the decision of the points are as follows:—The plaintiff and these defendants, with other members of the corps, were in August last in military training with a portion of the Regular forces at Shorncliffe. The camp was broken up on the morning of August 8. Early on that morning, and whilst the preparations for the return of the Volunteers to their respective homes were proceeding in the camp, a disturbance took place in and around the tent in which the plaintiff and others had been lodged in consequence of some of the plaintiff's comrades accusing him of having stolen and hidden in his kit bag a number of articles which belonged to them. The adjutant of the corps, Captain Foote, having been informed as to the disturbance, came to the spot, and ultimately (to omit details on which there was some conflict in the evidence) ordered Sergeant Killin to form an escort and take the plaintiff to the guard tent, where he would find Lieutenant Roberts on the point of proceeding with the luggage and its escort to Shorncliffe Railway Station. Sergeant Killin was to direct Lieutenant Roberts to take the plaintiff with the baggage guard to the railway station and there keep him until the D (plaintiff's) Company arrived. By the further orders of Captain Foote, conveyed through Sergeant Killin, the plaintiff, after his arrival at the railway station, was to be taken in military custody in the special military train which was then about to start for the conveyance of Volunteers to Watford, Boxmoor, and other stations to which the plaintiff and other members of his Volunteer corps belonged; and on his arrival at Boxmoor (the railway station, about two miles distant), for Hemel Hempstead, where the plaintiff lived, the plaintiff was to be taken by his escort to the police-station at Hemel Hempstead, and then handed over to the civil authority. Captain Foote at the same time directed that information as to what had happened should be given at Hemel Hempstead to Captain Smeaton, the officer in command of the plaintiff's company. These orders were carried out. After the plaintiff had reached Shorncliffe Station with the baggage guard, under Lieutenant Roberts, and the train was ready to receive her passengers, the defendant Cooper selected, in the usual way, from the ranks of the Volunteers who were drawn up in the railway station, his two co-defendants Lovelock and Short to form the prisoner's escort on the journey to Boxmoor and Hemel Hempstead. The plaintiff was then placed in a compartment with these defendants, and the four so travelled together in the train to Boxmoor (a journey of about 3½ hours). On the arrival of the train at Boxmoor the prisoner, under the charge of his escort, was directed by the defendant Cooper to remain in a waiting-room, while the rest of the Volunteers, other than certain persons who would be required as witnesses in the plaintiff's case, were formally dismissed. The defendant Cooper directed Corporal Young to keep these witnesses together, and, with them to follow prisoner's escort to the police-station at Hemel Hempstead. The defendants then marched with the plaintiff, who was placed between the two privates, to the police-station, and there charged by the defendant Frogley with the offence of larceny. After inquiry, and after hearing the evidence of some witnesses, the defendant Frogley took the plaintiff into custody. As there is now no question affecting this defendant it is unnecessary further to pursue the history of the case, except to say, in justice to the plaintiff, that when put on his trial, as he afterwards was, at the quarter sessions at Canterbury, he was honourably acquitted on the charges made against him. Upon these facts the plaintiff's case against these three defendants Cooper, Lovelock, and Short is a case of assault and false imprisonment based upon the treatment to which they subjected him by keeping him in detention as their prisoner from the time when they took him in charge at Shorncliffe Station to the time when they gave him in charge at Hemel Hempstead. It was not pleaded or contended on behalf of the defendants in answer to the plaintiff's claim that a felony had been committed. Therefore, if the matter had been one touching ordinary civilians the action was, except as to damages, an undefended action. The defendants, however, contended that this was not a case touching ordinary civilians, but a case in which they, and the plaintiff also, ought to be treated as persons under military law; that the order of Captain Foote was, under the law, justifiable; that even if it was in any respect illegal, it was not obviously illegal, and that as they simply obeyed an order which they were bound to obey, they were in no case responsible. These being, as regards these defendants, the only defences of law, and the facts upon which they were based not being in dispute, the only question I had to ask the jury in regard to the claim against these defendants was as to the amount of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff in the event of the defences in point of law being held to be bad. The jury assessed these damages at £300. I have now to decide whether the defendants are entitled to succeed upon any of the points of law which they have put forward. I have come to the conclusion that they are not. In the first place, at the time of the acts of which the plaintiff complains—i.e., during the conveyance of the plaintiff in custody from Shorncliffe to Boxmoor Railway Station and then to Hemel Hempstead police-station—I do not think that either the plaintiff or the defendants were subject to military law. The matter depends upon the provisions of the Army Act, 1881. The most important of these is section 176. That section commences by enacting:—"The persons mentioned are persons subject to military law as soldiers, and this Act shall apply accordingly to all the persons so specified." The statute then enumerates in several subsections, which have no bearing upon the present case, various classes of persons; and in subsection 8 it proceeds to include all non-commissioned officers and men belonging to the Volunteer forces of the United Kingdom, (a) when they are being trained or exercised with any portion of the Regular forces or with any portion of the Militia when subject to military law. Now there is no question that whilst in the camp at Shorncliffe, and, in my view, until the despatch of the prisoner, in fact (although he stated that he was unaware of it), from Shorncliffe Railway Station, both plaintiff and defendants were Volunteers who were being trained and exercised with a portion of the Regular forces, and were therefore, according to this enactment, persons subject to military law. Captain Foote in his evidence deposed to his opinion—and this is the contention of the defendants' counsel—that the "training" or "exercise" mentioned in the section ought to be held to continue in regard to each Volunteer after the camp was broken up by the departure of the Volunteers, and until the moment of his formal dismissal at his home destination, which in the case of the Hemel Hempstead party would be such a point either at Boxmoor Station or after leaving Boxmoor Station as the officer in command of the party might desire for the dismissal of the men. Indeed, I understand Captain Foote to go so far as to say that, in his opinion, if one of these Volunteers had stolen a sheep on his way home between Boxmoor and Hemel Hempstead he could have been tried by court-martial for the offence. I cannot so construe the statute. The words in question appear to me to have a plain and sensible meaning, and to confine the subjection of the Volunteer to military law within the period of his being trained and exercised with any portion of the Regular forces or of the Militia when subject to military law. The interpretation of Captain Foote and the defendants' counsel would add to the subsection the words, "and when they are proceeding to or from such training or exercise." I hold that upon the departure of the plaintiff and defendants from the camp they ceased to be subject to military law; their status ceased to be that of soldiers, and became that of civilians subject only as to discipline to the provisions of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and subsequent statutes relating to Volunteers, under none of which could the defendants justify their treatment of the plaintiff. It is, however, contended for the defendants that even if this be the true view, and they and the plaintiff ceased to be subject to military law after leaving the camp at Shorncliffe, they are entitled to immunity by the combined effect of sections 41, 45, and 158 of the Army Act. I think this defence fails also. There is no doubt that the charge of larceny committed during his training with the Regulars in the camp was an offence for which he might have been tried by Court-martial under section 41; there is no doubt that his arrest by order of Captain Foote when that charge was preferred against him was perfectly proper and legal under section 45; and I am inclined to think that, if after his arrest it had been judged better that instead of being tried by Court-martial the plaintiff should be handed over to the local police with the view of his being tried by the civil Court, the arrest might properly have been continued, provided due diligence was used, until he was so handed over. I understood the plaintiff's counsel to be willing to concede so much. But Captain Foote did not adopt this course. He adopted the course he did with, no doubt, the best intentions, believing it to be both lawful and also expedient, and in order to prevent the inconvenience which would arise from delaying (as the holding of a Court-martial or the sending of the parties concerned to Hythe police-station would delay) the breaking up of the camp and the departure of the plaintiff and the witnesses for their homes by the special train which had been ordered for their conveyance from Shorncliffe. But the course which he preferred was one for which I can find no justification in any section of the Army Act. The provision of section 158 (1) upon which reliance was placed for the defendants appears to me not to afford any, for more than one reason. In the first place, its sanction for taking into and keeping in military custody, and for trying and punishing a person who has been but has ceased to be subject to military law, is by the opening words of the subsection confined to cases in which "an offence under this Act has been committed" by that person. Here, ex concessio, Marks had not committed an offence. One might, perhaps, I agree, have expected that the sanction would have been extended to the case of an offence under the Act being alleged to have been committed; but the words as they stand seem plain enough. Even, however, if the words could be interpreted as they must be interpreted in order to avail the defendants, I could find in this section no justification for that which the defendants did under Captain Foote's orders when, after they had ceased to be subject to military law, they kept the plaintiff as a prisoner during a long railway journey and a two-mile march, not in order that he might be tried by Court-martial, but in order that he might be handed over to the police authority, not at the place of the alleged offence, but in a different county. I doubt whether, even if the plaintiff and the defendants continued, as Captain Foote thought they did, to be subject to military law, a detention of this kind and for this purpose could be treated as a proper exercise of the powers of military custody given by section 45 of the Army Act. The last point taken for the defendants was that, even if the order which they obeyed were unjustifiable or illegal, still it was not obviously unjustifiable or illegal, and the defendants, who were at the time when it was given by Captain Foote subject to military law and bound to obey his orders and simply did what he ordered, ought not to be held liable for what they did. The principles of law applicable to a case such as the present I take as they are stated by Mr. Justice Willes in his judgments in "Keighley v. Bell" (4 F. and F., at pp. 790 and 805) and in "Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby" (ib., p. 831). In accordance with those principles, as I understand them, I should hold this to be a good plea for the defendants if I were of opinion that they and the plaintiff continued subject to military law during the time of the doing of the acts by the defendants of which the plaintiff complains. Even if the order were in excess of the powers as to military custody given by section 45, it would be an excess which, in my view, would not be obvious to persons in the position of the defendants. I am, however, for the reasons which I have already stated, of opinion that at the time of the acts complained of neither the plaintiff nor the defendants were subject to military law, and therefore—also, I think, in accordance with the law as laid down by Mr. Justice Willes in the cases to which I have referred—I must decide that this defence also fails. I give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the damages fixed by the jury.

Mr. MUN applied for a stay of execution pending an appeal.

His LORDSHIP granted a stay upon the terms that within a month the damages be paid into Court or security given, and the taxed costs paid to the plaintiff's solicitors upon the usual undertaking by them.

COUNTY COUNCIL OF DORSET (APPELLANTS) V. PETHICK BROTHERS (RESPONDENTS).*

Practice—Appeal—Leave to appeal.

Applications to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal from the Divisional Court should be made ex parte.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C. (Mr. Clavell Salter with him), applied on behalf of the appellants, the Dorset County Council, for leave to appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court consisting of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence. The Divisional Court had refused leave to appeal. The Dorset County Council claimed £250 for the expenses incurred in repairing the damage to certain roads caused by extraordinary traffic. The respondents, Messrs. Pethick Brothers, were the builders of an asylum and they contracted with a third person that he should cart their materials from the railway station to the place where the building was being erected. This carting occasioned the damage to the roads. The Divisional Court held that the respondents were not liable upon the authority of the decision in "Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard" ([1897] A. C., 633). The learned counsel contended that that case did not apply as there the materials which were carted over the roads did not belong to Lord Gerard, whereas in the present case the materials belonged to the respondents, and whether they carted them or employed a contractor to cart them could make no difference.

MR. C. A. RUSSELL, Q.C. (Mr. H. E. Duke and Mr. Charles S. Preston with him), for the respondents, said that notice of this application had been served upon them, whereas the application ought to have been made ex parte.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., said that there was some doubt as to whether the application should be made ex parte or upon notice.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that these applications should always be made ex parte, and if the Court desired the other side to be heard they would direct notice to be served upon them. The Court would give leave to appeal, and the costs of this application would be reserved.

ROWLAND AND MARWOODS STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. WILLS AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—"Freight to be in full of all port charges"—Tonnage dues—Liability for.

This was an action by the owners of the steamship Roma against the charterers for £57 16s. 5d., balance of freight due under the charterparty. The Roma, a steamship of 1,722 tons register, was chartered by the defendants for the carriage of a cargo of coal from Cardiff to Colombo. The charterparty contained the following clause:—"The freight is in full of trimming, and of all port charges, pilotages, and consular dues on the vessel. All wharfage dues on the cargo to be paid by the charterers." The Roma in due course went to Ceylon, and discharged her cargo. In the freight account the defendants debited the plaintiffs with 891.25 rupees, described as "tonnage dues," which had been paid by the defendants to the Government. The question in this case was whether the plaintiffs were bound to give credit to the defendants for this sum. If they were so bound, it was agreed that the defendants were entitled to set it off against the amount due for freight, and that nothing further was due in this action. By No. 6 of the legislative enactments of Ceylon, 1875, the Colombo Harbour ordinance, the Government was empowered to borrow money for the improvement of the harbour of Colombo, and to levy, in lieu of the port dues then levied at Colombo, such increased dues as might from time to time be sanctioned by her Majesty's Government. By a proclamation of May 6, 1885, certain dues were sanctioned—viz., dues payable by ships entering the port, these dues to clear a vessel inwards and outwards; dues payable by ships discharging or loading cargo; cargo brought to the port for transshipment to be free of dues under this heading if not landed, or if landed and not entered for duty; coal to pay 25 cents a ton inwards only. The sum which the defendants claimed to set off against the plaintiffs' claim was paid by the ship on the discharge of the cargo of coal.

MR. BOYD, Q.C., and MR. ROCHE appeared for the plaintiffs, and contended that the payment was a wharfage charge on the cargo, which, under the charterparty, must be borne by the charterers. The payment was not for services to the ship, but was in the nature of an import duty on coal, leviable on the ship in the first instance, for greater facility in collection. If the cargo were transhipped then the dues were not payable, and that was a matter solely within the control of the charterers.

MR. CARVER, Q.C., for the defendants, argued that the payment was in respect of a port charge for which the owners under the charterparty were liable. The dues were port dues within the definition given by Mr. Justice Mathew in "Newman and Dale v. Lamport and Holt" (1 Com. Cas., 161). Moreover, the dues were for the benefit of the ship, for their object was to improve the harbour. It was never intended or contemplated that this cargo would be transhipped, and no argument could be based on that proviso in the proclamation.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY was of opinion that the defendants must succeed in this action. The question was whether these dues which had been paid by the defendants came within the language of the charterparty, which provided that freight should be in full of all port charges. Those words were intended by the parties to be used in their fair literal sense—that was, port dues chargeable on the vessel. It was indisputable that this was a charge on the vessel, for unless the vessel paid the charge she could not clear out of the port. It was true that in one sense the question whether the ship would have to pay these dues would depend on the charterers' action at the port of arrival. If the cargo was merely transhipped, the dues were not payable, but it was always in the contemplation of the parties that this cargo would be imported into Ceylon in the ordinary course. Therefore, if the cargo had been transhipped, it would have been to the benefit of the owners. There would be judgment for the defendants with costs.

Ship—Mortgage—Sale by High Bailiff in an action in rem.

The High Bailiff in selling a ship by order of the County Court in an action in rem can give a good title to the purchaser notwithstanding the fact that there is a mortgage on the ship.

This was a motion brought by the High Bailiff of the County Court of Bew for directions as to the completion of the sale of the steamship Ruby. It appears that on September 3, 1897, the learned Judge of the City of London Court in a collision action found the steamship Ruby to blame, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs in that action. On September 11, in default of payment by the owners of the Ruby, a warrant of execution was issued. In accordance with the terms of the warrant the High Bailiff appraised the ship and eventually sold her. At the time of the action the ship was mortgaged and the mortgagees had since sold the ship. The Registrar of Shipping refused to register the sale of the ship by the High Bailiff, on the ground that there was a mortgage on the register and the present motion was brought to ask the Court to declare that the High Bailiff could execute a bill of sale of the ship to the purchaser from him.

Mr. BUTLER ASPINALL, on behalf of the High Bailiff, contended that as the judgment was in rem in favour of a maritime lien, the County Court had power to order its officers to sell the property in respect of which the lien had existed to satisfy the judgment, and that the High Bailiff could give a good title to a purchaser from him.

Mr. F. LAING, on behalf of the mortgagees, contended that the County Court could not order a sale of the ship when there was a mortgage upon her, as the Court had no power to deal with mortgages of a ship. The defendants in the collision action only had an equity of redemption, and the High Bailiff could only sell that equity.

Mr. Lauriston Batten appeared for the plaintiff in the collision action; Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy of the owner of the ship.

The PRESIDENT said that the County Court had jurisdiction to order a sale of a ship in an action in rem, and when it empowered the High Bailiff to sell it empowered him to give a good title to the purchaser, and the Registrar of Shipping must make the necessary alterations in the register to give effect to orders of the Court.

Ship—Seaman—Definition of—Ship's husband—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 742—Admiralty Court Act, 1861, sec. 10.

This was a motion to prohibit the learned Judge of the City of London Court from determining a case as to a ship's husband's right to wages. It appears that an action was brought by the plaintiff to recover a sum of £42 for wages as ship's husband to the steamship Ruby. The plaintiff acted as ship's husband and also found charterparties for her and engaged and paid her crew, and on three occasions he went in her to Ostend to transact the ship's business.

Mr. F. LAING, on behalf of the mortgagees of the ship, contended that the claim of a ship's husband was not a claim by a seaman for wages earned by him on board a ship, and did not come within section 10 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, and therefore did not give the plaintiff a lien upon the ship or entitle him to sue the ship in an action in rem.

Mr. LAURISTON BATTEN, on behalf of the plaintiff, contended that the word seaman had been defined by the Merchant Shipping Act to include every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship, and that therefore the plaintiff came within the term seaman, as some of his work had to be done on board the ship, and he was, consequently, entitled to a lien for his wages. In support of his contention he quoted "The Queen v. the Judge of the City of London Court and the Owners of the ss. Michigan" (25 Q.B.D., 339).

The PRESIDENT held that a person employed as a ship's husband was not a person who came within section 10 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, and that the City of London Court could not entertain the action.

Applications for a certificate for a special jury should be made to the Judge immediately after trial.

In this case, which was tried on Friday last, and was reported in The Times on January 22,

Mr. RAWLINSON, Q.C., applied for a certificate for a special jury.

Mr. JUSTICE BARNES.—Have I the power, now, to grant your application?

Mr. RAWLINSON, Q.C.—The Annual Practice, 1898, at p. 689, sub. tit., Ord. 35, Rule 7, says:—"The application for a certificate must be made while the matter is fresh in the mind of the Judge who tried it, 'Webster v. Appleton' (62 L.T., 704)." Lord Ellenborough, however, in "Waggett v. Shaw" (3 Camp., 316), laid down that by the statute 24 Geo. 2, c. 18, "the Judge before whom a cause had been tried shall, immediately after trial, certify in open Court," and said that he knew of no authority for granting a certificate on the day following.

Mr. JUSTICE BARNES.—I must say I entirely agree. I think these applications should be made at the time.

REG. V. TAYLOR AND OTHERS, JUSTICES, AND LAIDLER—EX PARTE VOGWILL.*

Justices—Disqualification—Alleged bias—Magistrate held not disqualified.

This was the argument on a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash a licence granted by two licensing justices for the Rastington Ward of the county of Durham. The rule was obtained by Mr. S. G. Lushington on November 9 on the ground of the alleged bias of Mr. C. Hunting, one of the justices who granted the licence. Mr. Danckwerts appeared to show cause against the rule. The facts on which the rule was granted were these. Mr. Charles Hunting, a justice of the peace for the county of Durham, signed a petition in favour of the granting a grocer's licence to Mrs. Laidler, of South Hatton, Durham, where he also resided. He attended at the licensing sessions sitting at Castle Eden on September 25, 1897, and with another justice formed the Court and took an active part in the proceedings. When the application for the licence was made a petition in support of the application was put in, verified, and received by the Bench. It was the petition which had been signed by Mr. Charles Hunting. The Court refused to read a petition against the licence. The affidavit of Mr. Hunting was to the effect that he attended on the bench at the day in question because he was applied to by the clerk of the justices to do so to make up the number required for the bench. He had no notion when he signed the petition that he should sit on the bench at the hearing of the application. He had no manner of interest in granting or refusing the licence, but he knew the applicant to be a most respectable woman, and he stated special reasons why such a licence was desirable for the benefit of the neighbourhood. The other justice made an affidavit, adding that he was not aware that Mr. Hunting had signed the petition. The clerk of the justices swore that he had written to ask Mr. Hunting to attend because without him there would not have been a quorum. There was a good deal of other work. It was by his advice that the petition against granting the licence was not looked at. He so advised on the ground that there was no evidence verifying the signatures.

MR. DANCKWERTS, for Mr. Hunting, submitted that the affidavits showed that the signature of the petition by Mr. Hunting made no difference in his conduct. He had considered the application on its merits. Lastly, this petty sessions sitting to grant licences was not a Court at all. "Boulter v. Kent, Justice" (66 L.J., Q.B., 787). Mr. Hunting was entitled to use his personal knowledge of the district.

MR. LUSHINGTON submitted that though justices might not be sitting in licensing sessions as a Court, yet that they ought to exercise their discretion judicially. He cited "Allinson v. General Medical Council" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 750). There should be no ground for even suspicion of bias in the administration of justice.

The COURT discharged the rule.

MR. JUSTICE DAY said he had no doubt in this case. He did not see how any reasonable person, knowing the facts of the case, could suspect that Mr. Hunting was influenced by bias. It was true that persons entirely ignorant of all the facts were always prone to suspicion. It was, of course, much to be regretted that any one should do anything at any time which could make fools suspect. Apart from that, there was no reasonable ground for suspicion. Mr. Hunting lived in a district where justices were scarce, and he was on this, as on many other occasions, invited to come to the bench to form a quorum. He had no knowledge that this case was coming on, as it did, after some other business had been disposed of. He explained in his affidavit that he thought the applicant was a fit woman to have a licence. He had been informed by a medical man and other persons knowing the locality that such a licence was wanted in the interests of the public. It could not be said that any one with a neutral mind could reasonably form a suspicion as to the behaviour of the justice on a case such as this. The rule must be discharged.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

SHARPE V. FEENEY AND CO., AND OTHERS.*

Conspiracy—Newspaper—Reports of law cases—Alleged conspiracy to keep solicitor's name out of newspaper—Non-suit.

In this case Mr. J. Sutton Sharpe, a solicitor, practising at West Bromwich and Birmingham, sought to recover damages for an alleged libel, and for conspiracy, from the defendants Messrs. Feeney and Co., who were the proprietors of the Birmingham Daily Post and the Birmingham Daily Mail, and Mr. Bunce, the editor of the Birmingham Daily Post, and Mr. Herbert, a newspaper reporter. The defendants denied that they had published any libel, or that there had been any conspiracy on their part.

Mr. Jelf, Q.C., Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Ernest Jelf appeared for the plaintiff; and Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. H. E. Richards were counsel for the defendants.

MR. JELF, in opening the case, said that the plaintiff, Mr. Sharpe, was a solicitor, who had practised for the last 18 years at West Bromwich and Birmingham, and the defendants were the proprietors of the Birmingham Daily Post and Birmingham Daily Mail, papers of great influence in that district. There were also two other defendants on the record, Mr. Bunce, editor of the Birmingham Daily Post, and Mr. Herbert, a newspaper reporter. The plaintiff complained in the first place that the defendants had conspired to keep his name out of cases in which he was engaged as advocate, a course of conduct which was calculated to do him great injury in his profession. In the second place he complained of a serious libel which had been published in the report of a case tried at the Birmingham Assizes in March, 1897. The defendants said there was a mistake on the reporter's part in the report of that case, but whether there was a mistake or not he should ask the jury to say that the defendants were guilty of a very serious libel, especially having regard to the course of the conduct that had been previously pursued towards the plaintiff by the defendants. Mr. Sharpe was a gentleman who had a large practice in the County Courts and Police-courts of the neighbourhood where he lived, and it was a matter of importance to him, and due to him in common fairness, that his name should appear in the reports of cases in which he was engaged. There was a time when it was a keen disappointment to a learned counsel if his name was omitted in a report in which it should have appeared, and he had no doubt his friend, Sir Robert Reid, had felt the same. (Laughter.)

STR R. REID.—Oh, no. I was never reported. (Laughter.)

MR. JELF (continuing).—Of course there was no legal right that a name should appear, but it was hardly fair that it should be kept out of the papers through pique or motives of that nature. In 1894 and 1895 Mr. Sharpe's name appeared in these Birmingham papers 80 or 90 times, but in 1896 he was engaged in a case in which his client, Mr. Ezra Horton, made a claim against the Birmingham Daily Mail, one of the papers in question, for libel. This action was settled on very reasonable terms, but in the course of the negotiations Mr. Herbert, who had been mentioned as a reporter, warned Mr. Sharpe that he had better be careful of putting himself in antagonism to a great newspaper. Mr. Sharpe was very indignant at the suggestion that he should allow any considerations of that kind to interfere with his duty to his client. Mr. Herbert's threat was subsequently repeated at one of the Police courts, and Mr. Sharpe again expressed his indignation. After this began a system of persecution, and Mr. Sharpe's name was persistently left out in the reports of cases in which he was engaged. The plaintiff then communicated with Mr. Herbert and complained of the omission of his name from reports, where his remarks were actually reported. No answer was sent by Mr. Herbert, and in a subsequent interview Mr. Herbert said he had direct instructions from headquarters to leave out the plaintiff's name from reports of proceedings in which he was engaged. In consequence of this course of "boycotting" Mr. Sharpe wrote to the editors of the Birmingham Daily Mail and Daily Post making a similar complaint, and neither of them vouchsafed an answer. Was that the kind of tone the jury would allow influential papers of the kind counsel had mentioned to adopt? There was, as he had already said, no legal right for any person to have his name reported. Mr. Sharpe at the time, in consequence of the legal difficulties which appeared to beset his position, thought it best to "grin and bear it." Mr. Feeney and the other gentlemen responsible for these newspapers had, however, gone a little too near the edge of a precipice, and had prepared for themselves a fall. There were a large number of cases in 1896 from which the plaintiff's name was kept out, but at the end of the year his name began to appear again in the Mail. At the Assizes at Birmingham, in March, 1897, before Mr. Justice Wright, there were three actions brought by a Mr. Silvester against Messrs. Withington, Ellis, and Jackson. The last gentleman was a solicitor, against whom Silvester had brought an action for negligence, and Mr. Sharpe was solicitor for him (Jackson), but he did not appear in the case beyond sitting beside Mr. Jackson, who conducted his own case, and advising him. A verdict was given for the defendant Mr. Jackson, after he had given his evidence, and on March 16, 1897, there appeared the following passages in a report in the Birmingham Daily Post, which constituted the libel complained of. It was headed, "Curious actions for slander," and the paragraphs complained of were:—

"On the 9th of April, 1890, plaintiff instructed Mr. Sharpe, solicitor, to bring an action against the defendants, but he did not do so, and plaintiff was now bringing an action against Mr. Sharpe for negligence. . . ."

"The action against Mr. J. Sutton Sharpe, solicitor, West Bromwich, to recover damages for negligence was then proceeded with. Plaintiff said he several times instructed him to bring actions against the last defendants, but he neglected to do so. Mr. Sharpe defended himself, and said he never undertook to bring actions against the defendants Withington and Ellis. Plaintiff once spoke to him about Withington, but he was convinced plaintiff had no cause of action. Had he consented to bring the actions he should have required a large sum of money first from the plaintiff to cover costs. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was given with costs."

This paragraph made it appear that it was not Jackson against whom the action for negligence was brought, but Sharpe. There was the serious imputation, too, that a large sum would have been asked as security for costs by Sharpe. The defendants said this error in the report had occurred merely through a slip of the pen, and they would put it right, but they never did so beyond putting the following paragraphs in their paper:—

"The Curious Actions for Slander.—In our report yesterday of the two actions for slander and one for negligence brought by Alfred Silvester, of West Bromwich, it was stated by a slip of the pen that the action for negligence was against Mr. J. Sutton Sharpe, solicitor, West Bromwich. Mr. Sharpe was Mr. Jackson's solicitor at the trial. It was Mr. Jackson whom the plaintiff said he instructed to bring actions for slander against the defendants Withington and Ellis. Mr. Jackson defended himself, and said he never undertook to bring the actions, and the jury gave a verdict in his favour."

The plaintiff declined to accept this paragraph as an adequate apology for what had been done, and some further correspondence ensued, and the defendants expressed their regret and said they would insert a retraction, a copy of which they forwarded to his solicitors, and in the last paragraph expressed the hope that Mr. Sharpe would suffer no professional loss in consequence of the mistake that had been made, especially as the defendant had won the case handsomely. Instead of inserting the whole of the paragraph they had promised, there appeared in the Birmingham Daily Post of March 19, 1897, only a part of it, which ran as follows:—

"In a paragraph in our issue of the 16th inst. reporting these two actions for slander and the action by the same plaintiff for negligence we regret to say that the name of Mr. J. Sutton Sharpe, solicitor, of West Bromwich, was given as the defendant in the latter action. In point of fact this gentleman was not the defendant, but the defendant's solicitor. The error in the report was corrected in our next issue, and we have pleasure in repeating the correction and in expressing our sincere regret that our reporter should have confused the two names and thereby given Mr. Sharpe ground for annoyance."

They carefully omitted part of what they had promised to put in with reference to the hope that no professional loss would be sustained by the plaintiff, and in consequence he proceeded to take action. In answer to interrogatories Mr. Feeney admitted that he had given instructions that the plaintiff's name was not to be advertised in his papers. That was on account of the proceedings in the Horton matter. Counsel asked the jury to look at the whole course of conduct of the defendants, and to say that a very grave wrong had been done to Mr. Sharpe, and by their verdict to make the defendants in future follow the good example which was generally set by the Press of this country.

Mr. John Sutton Sharpe, the plaintiff, was then called. He said he had practised as advocate in the County Courts, Police courts, and at licensing sessions, &c., at Birmingham, West Bromwich, and in that neighbourhood for 18 years. Up to September, 1896, his name had been fairly reported in the Birmingham Daily Post and Birmingham Daily Mail. In that month he was engaged in settling a claim by a Mr. Ezra Horton for libel against the Birmingham Daily Mail.

In the course of the negotiations with Mr. Sullivan, the editor of that paper, Mr. Herbert, a reporter for the Birmingham Daily Post and Daily Mail in the local courts, came to see him, and said he had come from the Birmingham Daily Mail with a view of discussing the claim witness had made respecting Horton. In the course of the discussion Herbert said, "It will be a very imprudent course on your part if you get on two sides with powerful papers like the Mail and the Post." Witness was angry and replied, "You go back to the people that have sent you and tell them that I shall not allow a consideration of that kind to influence me." Three or four days afterwards he saw Herbert again at the Smethwick Police-court, and he then said, "If this claim is persisted in it may be a bad job for you to come into collision with the Mail and the Post." On September 24 witness was engaged in a case at the West Bromwich Police-court of considerable public interest. Mr. Herbert or his son was present in court as reporter, and both the Post and the Mail contained reports of the case, but the witness's name was omitted as solicitor for the prosecution.

Mr. JELF.—From that time onwards was your name in cases where you appeared systematically omitted from reports in the Post?

Witness.—Systematically down to the commencement of this action. The same thing went on in the case of the Mail till Christmas, 1896.

Examination continued.—Witness communicated with Mr. Herbert and Mr. Sullivan, but received no replies. He saw Mr. Herbert, who told him he had received instructions from headquarters to suppress his name in reports of his cases. Witness was at the Birmingham Assizes in March, 1897, and he was solicitor for Mr. Withington, the defendant in the first Silvester action, and for Mr. Jackson, the defendant in the third action. The only part he took in court was sitting beside Mr. Jackson, who conducted his case in person, and advising him. Mr. Jackson was frequently mentioned as the defendant, and he gave evidence on his own behalf. Witness's name was not mentioned by anybody from first to last during the action. Jackson never said that he should have required a large sum of money before bringing the actions to cover costs. Witness then saw the report in the Birmingham Daily Post of March 16, and his solicitors communicated with the defendants, who eventually proposed to insert an apology and retraction, a form of which was sent to witness's solicitors. The paragraph, however, was only partly inserted in the paper. Proceedings were then taken against the defendants.

Cross-examined by SIR ROBERT REID.—Witness's action was for conspiracy to keep his name out of the newspapers. Mr. Ezra Horton, about whom the matter arose, was a West Bromwich football hero. (Laughter.) He disappeared from his home, and a paragraph appeared in the newspapers that his goods had been sold by County Court bailiffs, which was untrue. His property was seized and advertised for sale, but was not sold, as the money required, witness heard, was found. Instructions to take proceedings for libel were first given by Mr. Ezra Horton's brother on September 9 to witness's clerk. The claim was originally for ten guineas from the three papers which had published the offending paragraph, and the witness obtained seven guineas from each paper. It was not the fact that witness had asked Horton to leave the matter in his hands and he would get as much as he could out of the newspapers and would not charge him anything for costs. He said his charge would be two guineas, but it did not appear in his books because the matter was settled. In writing to the defendants claiming reparation his clerk wrote that there was not the slightest foundation in fact for the statement that Horton's goods had been sold, although there had been a seizure and they had been advertised for sale. Witness endorsed his clerk's letter, but at the time did not know of the seizure. He now agreed that the statement made in the clerk's letter was an exaggerated one, but he still adhered to it. He did not agree that the newspaper proprietors had any reason of complaint against witness for his conduct in the matter. It was not his practice to bring claims against newspapers for libel on the terms of getting his costs out of the defendants. Witness had known Mr. Herbert in a friendly way for some time. His case was that he had conspired with Mr. Feeney to keep witness's name out of the papers. In the "Silvester v. Jackson" action witness was of opinion Jackson had acted properly in refusing to bring the libel actions, in consequence of which the action for negligence had been brought against him, and witness's complaint was that he had been put in the place of Jackson. He could not imagine that it had been done by mistake. The two subsequent paragraphs inserted in the papers were not sufficient. If the second paragraph had been put in in the form in which it was originally sent to witness's solicitors this action would not have been brought. The omission of the last part of the paragraph in his opinion showed malice.

Re-examined.—Witness did not discover the real facts about Ezra Horton till some time after the settlement.

By MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS.—Witness did ascertain that there was a judgment and execution against Horton, but he knew that his goods had not been sold. It might have been a little careless on his part not to have made further inquiries.

Charles Darby, the plaintiff's managing clerk, said that he wrote the letter claiming reparation for Ezra Horton on the instruction of his brother, John Horton, and in the absence of the plaintiff on a holiday. His instructions were that the statement that the goods had been sold was quite untrue. He was told that there was a judgment and execution out against Horton, but that the execution had been paid out.

Cross-examined.—About three days after receiving these instructions he heard that the goods had been advertised for sale.

This closed the plaintiff's case.

SIR ROBERT REID submitted there was no case to go to the jury. There were here two causes of action. An alleged conspiracy between two persons to keep a man's name out of the newspapers was absolutely rotten, and there was no special damage alleged at all.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said he was of opinion that there was no case on this head of conspiracy.

SIR ROBERT REID.—This desire to have one's name advertised was absurd. He had never heard before of a solicitor making complaint that his name had not been reported. This was the only means newspapers had of dealing with solicitors who acted in the way the plaintiff had. The defendants had done what was a lawful thing, and they declined to advertise the plaintiff. As to the libel it was most trumpery. The reason of the mistake by which Mr. Sharpe's name appeared as defendant in the "Silvester v. Jackson" case in the newspaper report was this. The reporter asked what was the name of the defendant solicitor—i.e., Jackson. He was informed, it being thought he had asked for the name of the defendant's solicitor, that it was Mr. J. Sutton Sharpe. There was not a suggestion that he had suffered any damage whatever.

It being 4 o'clock, his LORDSHIP said he should adjourn till to-morrow.

SIR ROBERT REID said he had only one witness to call.

The jury, however, intimated at this point that they were unanimously in favour of the defendants.

MR. TINDAL ATKINSON said he should like to address a few words to the jury first before they actually gave their verdict. He commented on the action of the newspapers in publishing the libel on Ezra Horton and the spiteful action they took in keeping the plaintiff's name out of the papers in consequence of his conduct of that matter. They did report him when they could put him in as appearing in an unpleasant situation as defendant in an action of negligence, and it was calculated to do an immense amount of harm to a solicitor in appearing in the papers as a defendant in such a case. He submitted that the newspapers had conducted themselves in a most oppressive manner.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said that if Mr. Sharpe thought that his character had been damaged he ought to have vindicated it in Birmingham where he was well known. Having commented on the plaintiff's action to the newspapers with reference to the Ezra Horton matter, he said no action would lie for keeping the plaintiff's name out of the newspapers, and there was no case on that point. His Lordship, dealing with the libel, pointed out that there was no proof that Sharpe's name had been wilfully substituted for Jackson's. Supposing the action had been against Sharpe, there was nothing which could possibly reflect on the character and conduct of Mr. Sharpe in the report in question.

The jury said they were of opinion that there was no libel, and judgment was given for the defendants, with costs.

HIS LORDSHIP, addressing the jury, expressed a strong opinion that this case ought to have been tried at Birmingham. He disapproved extremely of bringing actions of this character at great expense up to London for trial.

THE SERVIA AND THE CARINTHIA.*

Ship—Pilot—Remuneration—Compulsory pilotage rates in the Mersey—Services outside those covered by the compulsory rates—Mersey Docks Acts (Consolidation Act), 1858—"Vessels proceeding to sea," meaning of.

This was an action brought by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board and the Mersey pilots to recover a sum of £3 from the owners of the steamships Servia and Carinthia for pilotage of those vessels in the river Mersey. This case, which is of considerable importance to shipowners using the river Mersey, was concluded yesterday. The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Carver, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Boyd, Q.C., and Mr. Maurice Hill for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BARNES said.—This is a test action brought to try the right of the Liverpool pilots to certain extra remuneration for piloting outward-bound steamers to the Prince's landing-stage for the purpose of embarking passengers and for piloting inward-bound cattle steamers to the Wallasey and Woodside stages before taking them into dock. Pilotage is compulsory in the port of Liverpool for the vessels in question, and the point in the case is whether the said services are covered by the compulsory pilotage rates or are to be paid for in addition to such rates. The pilotage of the said port is regulated by the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, under which the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is constituted the pilotage authority, with power to license pilots. The board is merely a formal party to these proceedings. The other plaintiffs are pilots licensed by the board. One of them, Mr. Gore, was in charge of the defendants' steamship Servia on her outward voyage in August last, and the other, Mr. Durrant, was in charge of the defendants' steamship Carinthia on her inward voyage in the same month. The defendants load their steamers in the Canada Dock, some distance below the Prince's landing-stage, and after a steamer's loading is completed she is generally taken out of dock on the high water preceding the afternoon of the day fixed for her departure, and, according to the state of the tide, then proceeds to an anchor, and thence to the Prince's landing-stage, or direct to the stage. Sometimes, on account of neap tides, it is necessary for the vessel to leave the dock earlier and moor at the defendants' buoy in the Sloyne, further up river than the stage, before proceeding to the stage. The defendants are the only company possessing a mooring buoy in the Sloyne. The vessel reaches the stage shortly before the hour fixed for her departure, usually about 4 p.m. She is assisted alongside by a tug or tugs, and after making fast to the stage she embarks her saloon passengers and their baggage and the mails, and sometimes receives on board some fine goods. From the stage she proceeds to sea. The time occupied at the stage is sometimes as long as four hours, sometimes not more than half an hour to an hour, and on the average about two hours. The steerage passengers generally embark by tender while the vessel is in the river at anchor or at the buoy, but sometimes in dock, if the vessel goes direct to the stage. The case does not directly raise any question as to the pilot's remuneration for bringing inward-bound vessels to this stage, though I understand that this question is practically involved in that before the Court as to outward-bound steamers. It is always a difficult operation to bring these large steamers alongside the stage, owing to vessels going in and out of dock and the other traffic in the river, and especially on strong flood or ebb tides. The steamers must always leave dock at high water, but they come alongside the stage at all times of the tide. In the particular case of the Servia she left the Canada Dock on August 10 last, on the morning tide, in charge of the plaintiff Gore, and anchored about abreast of the Prince's stage. Shortly before 4 30 p.m. her anchor was weighed, and she was brought alongside the stage under Mr. Gore's charge. There she embarked her saloon passengers, their baggage, and the mails, and thence she proceeded to sea on the same evening through the Queen's Channel, bound for New York. Mr. Gore piloted the vessel to the outward compulsory pilotage limit at the north-west buoy. The defendants have paid the outward compulsory pilotage rate for Mr. Gore's services, and contend that such payment covers his service for taking the Servia to the stage. On the other hand, he claims £1 for extra remuneration for the last-mentioned service. This sum has been fixed by the Pilotage Board as a regular charge to be made by pilots for bringing vessels to the stage for the purpose of embarking and disembarking passengers on the footing that their services in so doing are not covered by the compulsory pilotage rate. The charge has been paid in respect of all steamers using the stage in manner aforesaid. It is now disputed. Secondly, with regard to the case of the Carinthia, she was inward bound with cattle, sheep, and other cargo from America, and about 8 30 p.m. on August 21 last Mr. Durrant boarded her off Point Lynas, took charge, and brought her into the river about 2 a.m. on the 22nd. She then proceeded in the usual way, first to the Wallasey stage, where she discharged her sheep, and then to the Woodside stage, where the cattle were landed. At 5 a.m. she was taken to Canada Dock entrance, but owing to her draught was not permitted to enter, and was, therefore, anchored and lightened. She did not get into dock till the evening tide of the 23rd. Mr. Durrant was in charge throughout. The defendants have paid the inward compulsory pilotage rate for Mr. Durrant's services and 10s. for two days' detention while at anchor at 15s. per day. They contend that such payments cover all his services, but he claims £2 for extra remuneration for taking the vessel to and from the two stages; £1 for each stage is the regular charge fixed by the board in a similar way to that in the outward cases. This charge, which is now disputed, has been paid in respect of all cattle steamers using the stages since the user began 15 years ago. The questions raised turn upon the construction to be placed upon certain sections of the said Mersey Docks Acts (Consolidation Act) of 1858, which render pilotage compulsory for outward and inward bound vessels, except coasting vessels in ballast or under the burden of 100 tons. Section 121 gives power to the board to license persons to act as pilots "for the port of Liverpool." The 123rd section imposes a penalty upon any person who shall pilot any vessel "into or out of the port of Liverpool" without a licence. The 124th section imposes penalties upon any pilot "who shall refuse to take charge of any inward-bound vessel upon a proper signal being made for a pilot, or of any outward-bound vessel upon the request of the master thereof." The sections dealing more particularly with outward-bound vessels are the 127th, 133rd, and 139th. The 127th section, which is under a title as to the duties of pilots, specifies the distances to which outward-bound vessels are to be piloted, but makes no mention of the point at which the pilot is to take charge. This point would ordinarily be the dock in which a vessel loaded, because, except in those cases of embarking passengers, a vessel would usually proceed from the dock to sea as fast as tide and weather would permit. The 133rd section gives power to the board to fix rates of pilotage to be paid to pilots for piloting vessels within certain limits. The rate "for piloting a vessel out of the port of Liverpool" is to be "not less than 3s. and not more than 4s. per foot" draught of water. The 139th section provides that "in case the master of any vessel, being outward bound," except the said coasters, "shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot," he shall still pay the full pilotage rate. The material sections which relate to inward-bound vessels, in addition to the 124th, are the 125th, 128th, the 130th, and the 133rd. The 125th section imposes a penalty on any pilot refusing to conduct an inward-bound vessel. The 128th section defines the duties of the pilot in charge of an inward-bound vessel. It provides that:—"The pilot in charge of any inward-bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river Mersey and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive 5s. per day for such attendance." There is nothing in any other section expressly extending these limited duties or preventing a pilot from making a charge for services performed beyond the limit, nor, on the other hand, imposing on the owners or masters of vessels any obligation to employ pilots to perform services other than the limited services specified in this section. The 130th section provides that in case the master "of any inward-bound vessel (except the said coasters) shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for that purpose," he shall pay full pilotage rates as if the vessel had been piloted "into the port of Liverpool." Under the 133rd section the rate for piloting a vessel from the distance of Great Ormes Head "to the port of Liverpool" is fixed at not less than 5s. nor more than 8s. per foot draught of water, and from any greater distance "to the port of Liverpool" not less than 6s. nor more than 9s. per like foot. There appears to be nothing in the Act rendering it obligatory to employ a pilot when a vessel is changing docks or coming from the docks on one side of the river to those on the other, or is navigated in the port when not outward or inward bound, and the word "stage," according to the interpretation clause in the Act (section 3), is included in the term "dock," though not in the term "wet docks" (see also section 596, subsection, Merchant Shipping Act, 1894). The sections above mentioned have been held to render pilotage compulsory for outward and inward bound vessels except the said coasters, and, although the question in the case is in strictness not whether pilotage is compulsory while the services in dispute are being rendered, but whether these services are covered by the pilotage rates fixed in pursuance of section 133, yet, on the argument before me, counsel felt great difficulty in severing the two questions, because the sections are correlative and the rates aforesaid are fixed for the compulsory services, so that if it is compulsory to employ the pilots for the services in question the services would seem to be covered by the compulsory rates, but if the services are voluntary the rates fixed do not cover them. The material cases which have been decided with regard to outward-bound vessels are "Rodrigues v. Melbush" (10 Ex., 110); "The City of Cambridge" (L.R., 5 P.C., 451); and "The Cachapool" (7 P.D., 217). There are the following cases relating to inward-bound vessels—the "Annapolis" (Lush., 295, 30 L.J., Ad., 205), the "Woburn Abbey" (3 Asp. M.C., 240), and the "Princeton" (3 P.D., 90). It was held in the case of the City of Cambridge that section 138 does not relate to the giving of extra remuneration to those pilots only who are voluntarily engaged. The section provides for the remuneration of pilots voluntarily engaged to attend on vessels in the cases mentioned in the section, and for extra remuneration to pilots compulsorily employed, where delay in the navigation takes place compelling a vessel to remain in the river. It was contended before me that it provided for remuneration for such services as those in dispute at 5s. per day, and extended the compulsory services so as to include those in question, because of the words "attendance on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake, or in the river Mersey." In my opinion, however, this section does not relate to services rendered while a vessel is being actively navigated to the stage or stages for such purposes as those in question, but only to attendance on a vessel lying in the river or at Hoylake, as mentioned in the section. The Act of 1858, so far as the sections relating to pilotage are concerned, is loosely drawn, and these sections are somewhat confused. They appear to have been framed in relation to the known course of business at the port of Liverpool, which is for vessels to load and discharge their cargoes in the wet docks of the port. My review of the aforesaid sections and cases has led me to the conclusion that the principle which underlies the decisions is that if an outward-bound vessel is loaded, equipped, and prepared ready for sea, and in that condition makes such progress to sea as tide and weather permit, from her point of starting on her voyage she is proceeding to sea within the meaning of the Act; but that a vessel is not so proceeding to sea if after leaving her dock she remains waiting in the port for the purpose of performing operations which are necessary in order to complete her loading, or other preparations required in order to render her ready for sea; and similarly that an inward-bound vessel, if she cannot go direct into dock on her arrival in the river, is in course of progress to her dock while she remains at anchor with the intention of docking as soon as tide and weather will permit. The rates of pilotage referred to in the 133rd section were, in my opinion, to be fixed to cover the duties which were to be performed by the pilots in the one case for piloting outward-bound vessels from the time of their start ready to proceed to sea, and in the other case for piloting inward-bound vessels from sea to dock, and if need be for anchoring them in the river till they can be docked. The 5s. a day extra is also to be paid for inward and outward bound ships in case of necessary delay in the navigation on the inward and outward progress. It follows that for services which are not covered by the compulsory rates and the extra 5s. a day, the pilots ought to receive an extra reasonable remuneration. In the present case the outward-bound vessel, the Servia, although her equipment was complete, was not ready for sea until she had taken on board her mails and passengers and their baggage, and, in my opinion, the compulsory rate paid by the defendants for Mr. Gore's services did not cover the service rendered by him in taking the vessel to the Prince's Stage. So also the compulsory rate paid by the defendants in respect of the Carinthia did not, in my opinion, cover Mr. Durrant's services in taking the vessel to and from the Wallasey and Woodside Stages. It was admitted that if reasonable extra charges could be made the pilots were respectively employed on the terms that they should be paid such charges. The charges were fixed by the Board in pursuance of the 18th bye-law made under the 221st section of the Act of 1858, and there was no contest as to their reasonableness if they could be legally made. It was said that the importance of the case to the shipowners is that, if the plaintiffs are right in their contention, vessels proceeding to the stages are not under compulsory pilotage. My decision is only asked upon the question whether or not the pilots are to be paid extra if they are required to take vessels to the stages; but I do not shrink from saying that it may follow from my determination of this question in favour of the plaintiffs that vessels proceeding to the stages are not under compulsory pilotage while so doing. It was suggested in argument that this did not logically follow, and it is not necessary for me to decide that it does, though the reasoning of my judgment probably leads to this conclusion. The suggestion aforesaid was founded on the cases of "The General Steam Navigation Company v. the British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (Limited)" (L.R., 4 Ex., 238) and "The Charlton" (8 M.L.C., 20). These cases decided that where a pilot has been compulsorily taken on board and placed in charge of a ship, and then an accident happens while he is in charge in the district for which he is licensed, though outside the limits of the port in which he is a compulsory pilot, the shipowner is exempt from responsibility for the act of the pilot, on the ground that the relationship of master and servant does not exist, and that the exemption contained in section 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (now section 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894), does not require that the pilot should be compulsorily employed at the spot where the accident happens, but only that he should have been compulsorily employed within the district where it happens, and that the shipowners are within its protection. In each of these cases, however, the pilot was engaged to take the ship to a point beyond that at which the accident happened, and the shipowner had to pay a rate which covered his services to this further point. There are, however, obvious distinctions between these cases and the present, and I am unable to see how the principle upon which they were decided can apply to extra services not paid for by the compulsory rates. It was further said that if this case were to determine that vessels are not under compulsory pilotage while the pilots are rendering services for which they are to receive extra pay great difficulty will arise in the master of a vessel determining whether he or the pilot is in charge. From what I have said, however, the difficulty will not arise with regard to outward-bound vessels if the compulsory duties are treated as commencing at the time when the steamer proceeds from the stage to sea; and with regard to inward-bound vessels, if it follows from this judgment that it is not compulsory to employ a pilot to take a vessel to the stages the service for which extra charge is made would begin and the compulsion cease, or it may be suddenly suspended, as soon as the vessel deviates to the stage from the route which she would follow in docking without going to the stage. It was also urged that as an inward-bound cattle steamer is compelled to go to the cattle stages—or one of them—to land her cattle and sheep before going into dock, unless she lands them in the Alfred Dock, the pilot cannot take her into a wet dock direct, and must therefore take her to the stage or stages in order to earn his compulsory fee, except when she goes to the Alfred Dock. But the answer to this is that the compulsory rate is paid for bringing the vessel in and anchoring her, if necessary, and then docking her, and that he is not responsible for the vessel having cattle or sheep on board, and that if he has to perform duties in consequence which are not provided for in the compulsory rate, and beyond those defined by the 128th section (the only section expressly defining the duties of the pilot of an inward-bound vessel), he must be paid extra for his extra services. As this case only requires a decision upon the question of payment, and not a final determination of the question of compulsory employment of a pilot to take a vessel to the stages, I am not at present called upon to decide a further question which was discussed—viz., whether the interposition of services for which extra remuneration is to be paid puts an end to or suspends the services to an inward-bound cattle ship which are covered by the compulsory rate. It is sufficient for me on this claim to decide that if an inward-bound ship is taken to one or more stages her owners will have to pay the extra charge for each stage. I have not felt disposed to arrive at my conclusions by any narrow construction of the Act. Although it is desirable that no difficulties should be placed by the Court in the way of trade developments and the navigation of vessels in the port, yet it is clear to me that the Act of 1858 did not contemplate pilots performing the duties they are now asked to perform, and receiving nothing more than the compulsory pilotage rates for them. These duties impose upon the pilots requested to perform them great additional responsibility, and require the exercise of great care and skill; and it is only reasonable that they should be properly rewarded for performing them. The case has been contested, as I understand, by the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association in the name of the defendants, and it was stated that the matter of the payments to the pilots was not of so much moment as the question of compulsory pilotage during the services in question. I have dealt fully with all the points taken, but may state that the broad view presented by the defendants' case is that the services in question of the pilots are requisite in order to enable shipowners to carry on what has become a regular course of practice with most passenger steamers, and as regards the cattle ships to comply with the provisions of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, and that their services should be treated as a necessary part of those which they are compelled to pay for under the Act of 1858, and that this Act should be so construed that the compulsory payments should cover all the services. According, however, to the opinion which I have expressed, this construction is wider than the terms of the sections of the Act bearing on the subject will permit. The questions in the case depend upon the construction of these sections, and not upon general considerations; and if I am right in my opinion an amendment of the Act will be necessary in order to carry out the object of the shipowners. My judgment is for the plaintiffs for the sum of £3, with costs, and I certify that this was a proper case to be tried in the High Court.

THE KNIGHT OF ST. MICHAEL.*

Insurance—Marine—Policy on freight—Loss by perils insured against.

Loss of freight consequent on discharge of cargo to prevent probable damage by fire held to be a loss by perils insured against, although the fire had not actually occurred.

This case was tried last term on an agreed statement of facts. It was also agreed that the decision of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes should be final. The facts appear in the judgment delivered yesterday.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. A. D. Bateson appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the defendants.

The COURT found for the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE BARNES said,—"This case raises certain novel and interesting questions of marine insurance law. A special case has been stated by the parties, which sets out the general facts, refers to the policies, ship's practice, and certain reports of surveyors, and gives the Court power to draw inferences of fact. It is necessary that I should first state the facts which I find and upon which I base my judgment. The plaintiffs are the owners of the sailing ship Knight of St. Michael, and on November 1, 1895, she was chartered to carry a cargo of coals from Newcastle, New South Wales, to Valparaiso at a freight of 15s. per ton. The plaintiffs insured the freight with the defendants for £2,500 and the perils insured against included perils "of the seas, fire, jettisons, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the" said subject matter of insurance or any part thereof. The vessel sailed with a cargo of 3,206 tons of coal on February 1, 1896. On February 2 part of the cargo was found to be getting hot, and the vessel was accordingly taken into Sydney on February 4. Several surveys were then held upon the cargo, with the result that 1,716 tons were discharged and sold. The vessel sailed with the rest of the cargo on March 31 for Valparaiso. No freight was paid or payable in respect of the coal sold at Sydney, and the plaintiff and his co-owners have lost that portion of the freight amounting to £1,338 2s. 4d. which otherwise they would have earned under the said charterparty. In the special case it is stated that the defendants do not rely on unseaworthiness of ship or on improper condition of cargo as a defence to any claim there may be. If the action had been by the cargo owners against their underwriters for the loss on the coal, I presume that their claim would have been defended on the ground that the loss was due to the inherent vice of the coal, but the practice of the shipowners with regard to the freight is different. I find that it was necessary for the safety of the whole adventure for the vessel to put into Sydney and discharge the coal landed there, and that the coal landed at Sydney could not have been reloaded and carried with safety to Valparaiso and was necessarily and properly sold at Sydney. The owners of the vessel being the persons interested in the freight which has been lost now contend that this freight has been lost by perils insured against by the policies, and claim the right to recover directly from the defendants for the loss. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that there has been no loss of freight by perils insured against by the policies, and, although willing to concede that the freight lost was sacrificed to avert a probable loss by fire and therefore should be made good in general average, they maintain that they are only liable for the share to be contributed in general averages by the shipowners in respect of their interest in the freight. These contentions raise the question whether, although no fire actually broke out on board the vessel, the defendants may be made directly liable for the loss, on the ground that it was in the circumstances due to the operation of perils insured against, and not merely for the share of the loss which would be borne by those interested in the freight if the loss should be adjusted as a general average loss. It was formerly considered, in case of a sacrifice of property for the preservation of ship, freight, and cargo from losses for which underwriters would be liable, that the only liability falling upon the underwriters of the property sacrificed was to contribute their respective proportions to the amount required to make good the loss in general average; but it was decided in the well-known case of "Dickenson v. Jardine" (L.R., 3 C.P., 639) that underwriters are directly liable for a partial loss of the subject insured, occasioned by a general average sacrifice, and that having paid the assured they are entitled to stand in his place with respect to the general average contribution, and it was further held in "Price v. A 1 Ships Small Damage Insurance Association" (22 Q.B.D., 530) that such partial loss as aforesaid is not a particular average loss. The distinction drawn by the defendants between these cases and the present is that in the former the losses were proximately caused by perils enumerated in the policies, the goods in the first case having been jettisoned, in order to avert an existing peril of the sea, and in the second the ship's materials having been cut away and cast overboard in order to avert a similar existing peril, whereas in the present case they contend that the loss was not caused proximately by an existing fire, but by the steps taken in consequence merely of fear of a fire breaking out. Cases were cited to show that a loss caused by steps taken in consequence of fear of peril and not to avert an existing peril is not covered by an ordinary marine policy. It was not disputed that if fire had in any degree actually broken out and the loss in question had happened to avert its consequences the plaintiffs could recover directly from the defendants. Now, I find that fire did not actually break out, but it is reasonably certain it would have broken out, and the condition of things was such that there was an actual existing state of peril of fire and not merely a fear of fire. The case is peculiar and not exactly analogous to that of any other peril. The danger was present, and if nothing were done spontaneous combustion and fire would follow in natural course. In effect the concession of the defendants admits this, because they do not dispute their liability for the shares of the loss in general average. But, in order to give rise to a general average act there must have been imminent danger to ship and cargo—that is to say, real substantial danger. I have found that such danger existed in this case. Then does it make any difference that the fire had not actually broken out? I think not in the circumstances. There was imminent danger of fire and an existing condition of things producing this danger, and if this cannot, strictly speaking, be termed a loss by fire it is, in my opinion, a loss ejusdem generis, and covered by the general words "all other losses or misfortunes," &c. This view is supported by the case of "Butler v. Wildman" (3 B. and Ald., 398), where a master of a Spanish vessel, in order to prevent a quantity of dollars from falling into the hands of an enemy by whom he was about to be attacked, threw the same into the sea and was immediately afterwards captured. It was held that it was a loss by jettison or by enemies, and if not strictly a loss by either peril it was a loss within the general words. In further support of this view I may refer to the judgment of Kelly, C.B., in "Stanley v. Western Insurance Company" (L.R., 3, Ex. p. 74), (Porter's Laws of Insurance, p. 123), the Canadian cases of "M'Gibbon v. the Queen Insurance Company" (10 Lr. Can. Jur., 227), and "Harris v. the London and Lancashire Insurance Company" (ib. p. 268), and the case of "Nobel's Explosives Company (Limited) v. Jenkins and Co." (Commercial Cases, p. 436). I am therefore of opinion that the defendants are liable directly to make good to the plaintiffs the loss of freight as a partial loss under the policies. I am not asked to determine any question as to the right of the defendants to deduct in settling the loss the amount which the plaintiffs, as owners of the ship, are liable to contribute in general average towards the loss of freight.

Court of Appeal (Lord Halsbury, L.C., } 1898.

WOOD V. MAYOR, &c., OF WIDNES.*

Local Government—Power of local authority as to privy accommodation—Duty to exercise discretion in each particular case—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 36.

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times L.R., 537) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Lawrance and Mr. Justice Ridley), on a case stated by two justices of the county of Lancaster (reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 537). Mr. Edwin Wood was the owner of certain houses, 52 to 68, Terrace-road, Widnes. At a petty sessions holden at Widnes a complaint was preferred against him by the corporation of Widnes, acting as urban sanitary authority, under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, claiming payment of certain private improvement expenses in respect of slop water-closets fixed at his houses. The justices adjudged that the corporation should recover the sum claimed. The facts were as follows:—On February 12, 1895, the urban sanitary authority confirmed the following resolution of the Health Committee:—"Waste water-closet system.—Resolved,—That in all future cases of nuisances requiring the reconstruction of privies and ashpits the local authority of this borough do, as far as practicable, order that such privies and ashpits be converted into the waste water-closet system, or into such other water-closet system as the local authority may from time to time approve, and that the Highway Committee be requested to take such steps for the adoption of the first-named system generally throughout the borough." On March 22, 1895, the corporation's inspector of nuisances served upon Wood a notice requiring him to abate a nuisance at his premises, 52 to 68, Terrace-road, by converting the privies into water-closets. On April 3 the inspector reported that certain houses in the borough, including Wood's, were without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and on April 9 the local authority confirmed a resolution of the Health Committee that notice be served upon Wood and the other owners of the houses requiring them to provide a sufficient privy and ashpit upon the waste water-closet system approved by the corporation. On April 23 notice was served upon Wood in accordance with the terms of this resolution, and, the notice not having been complied with, the local authority did the necessary work, and then took these proceedings to recover the amount. It was contended for Wood that the resolution of February 12 and the subsequent proceedings thereunder were invalid. The question of law for the opinion of the Court was whether the resolution of February 12 was valid, and, if not, whether it invalidated the subsequent proceedings. The Divisional Court allowed the appeal raised on the case stated, holding that the local authority were not entitled to lay down a general rule to be applied in all cases without regard to the particular requirements of individual houses, and had no power to order that only one particular kind of water-closet should be used. The corporation appealed.

Mr. McCall, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Bonsey appeared for the corporation; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. F. W. R. Rycroft for Wood.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said it was admitted on the part of the corporation that a local authority, when proceeding under section 36 of the Public Health Act, was bound to exercise a discretion in each particular case, and had no right to impose a new scheme of sanitation on a district generally. The only question to be decided now was whether upon the facts of the case the local authority had complied with the statute so interpreted. He came to the conclusion that there was here an effort, without having regard to each particular case, to enforce on the district a uniform scheme. On that ground the judgment ought, in his opinion, to be affirmed. Further, he thought that the notice which had been given to the respondent in this case was not a good notice under the statute. It said in terms that, if he did not do a particular thing, he would not be complying with the notice. If there had been a note at the bottom suggesting that a particular kind of work would satisfy the corporation, that, perhaps, would not have been improper. But if there had been the addition that nothing else would satisfy them, that would have been bad. In the present case it was worse still, for the particular requirement was made part of the notice itself. On both grounds—viz., that there had been no exercise of discretion, and no proper notice—he thought the appeal should be dismissed.

THE DEUTSCHE NATIONAL BANK V. PAUL.*

Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—
O. 11, r. 1 (g).

Order for service out of the jurisdiction under O. 11, r. 1 (g), set aside on the ground that the action was not "properly brought" against the person served within the jurisdiction.

This case raised an interesting point of practice relating to the liability of persons residing out of the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country to be served with notice of proceedings in such Courts. Shortly stated the facts of the case were these. In May, 1890, Messrs. Jellings, Blow, and Co., who carried on business in London, applied to the plaintiffs, a German bank, for a credit, and offered by way of security to give the bank a charge upon certain policies of assurance issued by an English office upon the life of the senior member of the firm. This was accepted by the bank, and the policies were duly deposited with the plaintiffs to secure advances made by them to the firm. In November, 1894, the firm further mortgaged the policies to the defendant Ebbecke, who carried on business at Bremen, in Germany, to secure the repayment of an advance made by him to them, and the firm themselves gave notice of this charge to the plaintiffs. In December, 1894, the firm assigned all their property to a Mr. Jackson as trustee for their creditors. In January, 1897, the plaintiffs commenced an action for foreclosure in this country against Mr. Jackson and the defendant Ebbecke. The writ in that action was not served upon the defendant Ebbecke. Subsequently Mr. Jackson sold the equity of redemption in the policies for the sum of £50 to the plaintiffs, and thereupon by a deed to which the plaintiffs were parties the equity of redemption was transferred by Jackson to two gentlemen named Paul and Farish, both of whom were resident in this country. A fresh action claiming the same relief as the former one, which had been abandoned, was then commenced against Messrs. Paul and Farish and the defendant Ebbecke, and upon the application of the plaintiffs an order was made for the service upon the defendant Ebbecke, out of the jurisdiction, of notice of the writ in this action. The defendant Ebbecke now applied by way of motion to have that order discharged, and the service which had been effected thereunder and all proceedings in the action as against him set aside on the ground that Messrs. Paul and Farish being merely trustees or nominees of the plaintiffs the action was not properly brought against them. It was suggested that the bringing of the action against them was a mere device for the purpose of bringing in the defendant Ebbecke, and thus founding a jurisdiction against him which would not otherwise have existed. The question turned upon the effect of order XI., rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which provides as follows:—“Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the Court or a Judge whenever . . . (e) the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction . . . or (g) whenever any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.”

Mr. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Mr. G. Lawrence appeared for the defendant Ebbecke in support of the motion; and Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Kirby for the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, after stating the facts, said that he would assume that under section 25, subsection 6 of the Judicature Act, 1873, the legal right to sue on the policies was now vested in the defendants Paul and Farish. It was admitted that they were simply trustees for the plaintiffs, and were bound to act with reference to the subject-matter of the trust as the plaintiffs directed, and that they had not refused to do so, and did not object to become co-plaintiffs in the action. To justify service out of the jurisdiction it was clear that the case must be brought within the provisions of order XI., rule 1 (See "Re Eager," L.R., 22 Ch.D., 86; and "Re Cliff," L.R. [1895], 2 Ch., 21). Clause G of that rule was mainly relied on, but at a later stage in the argument a suggestion was made that Clause E might apply, and his Lordship would deal with that first. The writ claimed a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to a charge for the sum of £6,022 6s. 2d. and interest on six policies of assurance, and that the charge might be enforced by foreclosure, and all accounts and inquiries necessary for that purpose, and for further or other relief. The object of the action, therefore, so far as specific relief was thereby sought, was to compel the defendant Ebbecke to redeem the plaintiffs by paying off what was due to them, and in default to become the absolute owners of the property on which the charge existed. Under the claim for general relief the plaintiffs would be entitled to ask that, in the event of the Court refusing to give relief by way of foreclosure, the policies might be sold and the proceeds applied in payment of the plaintiffs' debt. In his Lordship's judgment an action so framed was not founded on a breach of contract within the meaning of order XI., rule 1 E. The plaintiffs' title to a charge might have arisen by reason of a breach on the part of Jennings, Blow, and Co. in not paying what they owed to the plaintiffs. The action, however, was not founded on that breach, nor, indeed, on any other breach of contract; for the defendants had not committed any breach of any contract with the plaintiffs; it was founded on the existence of a charge constituting a security for the debt due to the plaintiffs. Coming then to Clause G the question was whether the present action was properly brought against Paul and Farish. The practice of the Court required that to an action for foreclosure all persons who had or claimed an interest in the equity of redemption should be parties, and his Lordship thought that to such an action as the present the defendants Paul and Farish were certainly proper if not necessary parties. The rule would have been satisfied, however, if those gentlemen had been made co-plaintiffs instead of defendants; and his Lordship thought that they ought more properly to have been made plaintiffs, in the sense that any extra costs occasioned by making them defendants might upon a proper application for that purpose be ordered to be borne by the plaintiffs. Messrs. Paul and Farish were made parties simply to comply with that rule of practice. Against them no relief was sought and no right was claimed to be enforced. No substantial reason was given why they should have been made defendants rather than plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs had taken an assignment to themselves instead of the defendants, the action would not have fallen within order XI., rule 1. It was not necessary to come to the conclusion that the assignment to trustees was a mere device to enable this action to be brought, but in his Lordship's judgment the action was not properly brought against them within the meaning of the rule. The order for service out of the jurisdiction must therefore be discharged.

IN RE CASTELL AND BROWN (LIMITED)—EX PARTE UNION BANK OF LONDON.*

Mortgage—Priority—Equitable encumbrancers—Title deeds of company deposited with bank as security—Question of priority between bank and the company's debenture-holders.

The question in this case was whether the bankers of a company who had advanced money to the company on the security of its title deeds were entitled to priority over the company's debenture-holders notwithstanding that the property comprised in the title deeds was comprised in the debenture security and by the terms of the debenture itself the company was expressly forbidden to charge such property in priority to the debenture charge. It appeared that the above company was formed in December, 1884, and in May, 1885, issued in pursuance of its borrowing powers debentures to the amount of £28,000. Each debenture purported to charge all the property of the company whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being, and was endorsed with conditions. These were, amongst others, that the debenture was one of a series for securing principal moneys not exceeding in the whole at any time two-thirds of the amount of the company's paid-up capital for the time being, and that the debentures were to rank pari passu, and that the charge was to be a floating security, but so that the company was not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge upon its freehold or leasehold hereditaments in priority to the debentures. No legal mortgage of the freehold or leasehold hereditaments was ever made to the debenture-holders, and the title deeds remained in the possession and under the control of the company. In April, 1892, the directors of the company opened an account with the Union Bank of London, and were allowed by the bank to overdraw on depositing the title deeds of the company's leasehold property. The overdraft was paid, but the deeds remained in the custody of the bank, and in August, 1895, the bank allowed a second overdraft on the company giving a memorandum of equitable charge on the deeds and an undertaking that the company and all other necessary parties would on demand make and execute valid legal mortgages in favour of the bank. The interest on the debentures being in default the above action was instituted by the debenture-holders, and in July, 1896, the usual judgment was made for the appointment of a receiver and directing inquiries as to the charges and their priorities. In April, 1896, the company had passed resolutions for voluntary liquidation, and in June, 1897, an order was made for the continuation of the liquidation under the supervision of the Court. In February, 1897, the bank was served with notice of judgment in the action. At that date the overdraft at the bank amounted to some £220. The bank stated that until served with notice of judgment they had not had any notice of the company having issued any debentures, or that it had created any charge upon the property comprised in the deeds deposited with the bank. The company being stated to be insolvent the bank claimed to have a prior charge for £220 and interest, and to retain the deeds until their debt was paid.

Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. E. Ford appeared for the debenture-holders; and Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Gere-Browne for the bank.

*Reported by E. B. SCOMMERFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said.—This is a question of priority between two equitable encumbrancers. The debentures are prior in date. But the Union Bank at the date of its charges had no notice, express or implied, of the prior encumbrance, and obtained possession of the title deeds, and, under the circumstances of the case, claims priority. If the equities of the two encumbrancers are in other respects equal then, of course, priority depends upon the dates of the charges. But the question is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the bank has not the better equity so as to entitle it to priority. Now, as between equitable encumbrancers in determining priority, the possession of the deeds has always been treated as a circumstance of great importance. And, indeed, in some of the numerous cases which show this there are observations of the Judges who decided them which go very far. For instance, in "Rice v. Rice" (2 Drew, at p. 81), Vice-Chancellor Hinderley said:—"We have here, then, ample authority for the proposition or rule of equity that, as between two persons whose equitable interests are of precisely the same nature and quality and in that respect precisely equal, the possession of the deeds gives the better equity." And in "Lloyd's Banking Company v. Jones" (L.R., 29 C.D., at p. 229), Mr. Justice Pearson observed:—"I think upon the authorities which have been cited, and which are so well known, that it would be pedantry for me to go over these again. The doctrine of the Court has always been that, where there are equities which are otherwise equal, the possession of the deeds gives priority to the person who has got them." But, in my opinion, these observations, if taken without any limit or restriction, go too far, for I do not think a prior equitable encumbrancer would lose his priority where he did not obtain the deeds, and the deeds came to the hands of the subsequent encumbrancer through no default of any sort on his part. I therefore proceed to inquire into the circumstances under which, in the present case, the deeds came into the hands of the bank. In the first place, I cannot hold that there was any negligence on the part of the bank. When making its advances to Castell and Brown (Limited) (which I will hereafter call the company) it found the company in possession of the deeds in question, and, apparently, able as unencumbered owner to charge the property. The company purported as such unencumbered owner to give a charge to the bank, and I think the bank was, under the circumstances, entitled to rely upon obtaining a charge free from encumbrance. It is suggested on behalf of the debenture-holders that the bank ought to have made some special inquiries of the company. But it is not suggested that the bank wilfully abstained from making inquiries, and as the bank had no reason to suppose that the company were not fully able to give a valid first charge, and found the company in possession of the deeds which showed no encumbrance, I think the bank was not bound to make any special inquiry. It is said on behalf of the debenture-holders that it is so common for companies to issue debentures that the bank ought to have assumed there were some in this case, or, at any rate, to have specially inquired about debentures. But every company does not issue debentures, and, moreover, every debenture does not charge property of the company, and certainly not property the title deeds of which were left with the company. It might just as well be said, because it is common for private individuals to mortgage their properties, that a person asked to make advances to a borrower who appears to be unencumbered owner, and has the deeds showing him to be such owner, is bound to assume that the borrower has previously mortgaged, or to make special inquiries of him on the footing that he has previously mortgaged. Such a contention appears to me unreasonable. I therefore hold that there was no negligence on the part of the bank; and I now look to see how it was that the company retained possession of the deeds, notwithstanding the issue of the debentures. The reason appears to me to be obvious. The debentures were only intended to give what is called a floating charge, that is to say, it was intended, notwithstanding the debentures, that the company should have power, so long as it was a going concern, to deal with its property as absolute owner. And I infer it was on this account that the company was allowed to, and did, retain possession of the deeds. In other words, the debenture-holders, notwithstanding their charge—and, indeed, by its very terms—authorized their mortgagor, the company, to deal with its property as if it had not been encumbered, and left with their mortgagor the deeds in order to enable the company to act as owner. It is true that, having given this general authority to the company, the debentures purported to put a certain special restriction on its exercise. By the first condition it was provided that, though the charge was to be a floating security, the company was not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge upon its freehold and leasehold hereditaments in priority to the debentures. This restriction was, no doubt, quite valid as a private arrangement between the company and the debenture-holders. But can the debenture-holders, under the circumstances, set it up as against the bank taking its securities without notice? I think not. I take it to be established that if a first mortgagee, even though he has the legal estate, authorizes the mortgagor to retain the deeds in order that the mortgagor may thereby as ostensible owner of the property be able to deal with it, though only to a limited extent, yet if the mortgagor takes advantage of the deeds so left with him to deal with the property to an extent beyond what was authorized, then the mortgagee cannot set up his charge as against a purchaser for value without notice who claims under the unauthorized dealing and relied on the deeds and the apparent ability of the owner to deal with the property free from encumbrances. In "Perry Herrick v. Atwood" (2 D. and J., at p. 39) Lord Cranworth, L.C., says with reference to a case of this kind that if a person taking a legal mortgage chooses to leave the deeds with the mortgagor, not through negligence or fraud, but with the intention of enabling him to raise a sum of £15,000 which is to take precedence of the legal mortgage, the mortgagee cannot as against subsequent mortgagees complain, if instead of £15,000 the mortgagor raises £50,000, because he had himself put it into the mortgagor's power to raise any sum of money he pleased; and the principle has been acted on in numerous later cases, amongst which I may mention "Briggs v. Jones" (L.R., 10 Eq. 92). This being the case as between a prior legal mortgagee and a subsequent equitable encumbrance, it is an a fortiori case where the first mortgage is only equitable. In my opinion, therefore, the bank has a stronger equity than the debenture-holders and is entitled to priority. I may add that if I am not mistaken in my inference that the deeds were allowed to remain with the company because the debentures created a floating charge only, and it was intended that the company should be authorized to act as owner (subject to the special conditions imposed by the debentures), then I cannot see why the debenture-holders should not have obtained possession of or control over the deeds in some shape or form, and they would come within the series of cases which have decided that a first mortgagee, even a legal one, who negligently leaves the deeds in the hands of the mortgagor, is postponed to a subsequent mortgagee who obtains the deeds without notice; see inter alia "Clarke v. Palmer" (L.R., 21 C.D. 125), and "Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Com- panies v. Whipp" (L.R., 26 C.D. 482). I therefore declare that the bank's charge has priority and their costs will be added to their security.

BENNETT V. SLATER.*

Friendly Society—Policy of insurance—Nomination of person to receive the moneys at death under sec. 15 (3) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875—Will—Revocation of nomination.

This was an issue directed to be tried in interpleader proceedings, by which the Royal Liver Friendly Society interpleaded upon a claim made by the defendants, the executors of the will of William May, deceased, under a policy granted by the society to William May.

Mr. H. Burrows appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Bonsey for the defendants.

In 1864 a policy for £100 was granted to William May by the Royal Liver Friendly Society—a society deemed to be registered under the Friendly Societies Acts. In 1889 William May made a nomination for the full amount in favour of his daughter, Patience Bennett, the plaintiff in these proceedings. The nomination was made and delivered to the society in accordance with section 15 (3) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, which provides:—"A member of a society (other than a benevolent society or working men's club), not being under the age of 16 years, may, by writing under his hand delivered at or sent to the registered office of the society, nominate any person not being an officer or servant of the society, to whom any money payable by the society on the death of such member, not exceeding £100, shall be paid at his decease, and may from time to time revoke or vary such nomination by a writing under his hand similarly delivered or sent; and the society shall pay to the nominee the amount due to the deceased member, not exceeding the sum aforesaid." William May died on October 29, 1896, leaving the will, dated September 7, 1895, of which defendants were the executors. By the will he left all his property to his executors in trust to pay his funeral expenses and debts and upon other trusts. Neither the will nor a copy thereof was delivered or sent to the society during the lifetime of William May, but after his decease probate of the will was delivered. The amount due from the society on the death of William May was £104. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that the nomination was not equivalent to a will or subject to the law of wills, and was, therefore, not revoked by the will made subsequently; and that, even if it were, the terms of the Act with regard to revocations had not been complied with. For the defendants it was contended that the nomination was a gift revocable by will, and that it was in fact revoked by the will. It was also contended that as the Act only applied to sums less than £100 it could not govern the present case where the sum payable was £104.

His LORDSHIP gave judgment for the defendants. He said that the nomination was not a will nor anything in the nature of a will, nor was it a gift. The object the Legislature had in view when they enacted section 15 (3) was to enable members of friendly societies to make a disposition without trouble and to enable the nominee to obtain the money without taking out letters of administration. In the present case a nomination was made. Subsequently to the nomination a will was made by which the executors became entitled to all the property of the testator subject to the payment of debts. It appeared that without recourse to the money payable by the friendly society the debts could not be paid. Mr. Burrows contended that the nomination was irrevocable. That that was not the case was clear, because the Act provided for revocation. But it was said further that if the will revoked the nomination the proper steps had not been taken to bring the revocation to the notice of the society. It was said that the proper mode was to produce the original will during the lifetime of the member. But, in truth, the proper mode was to produce the probate of the will, as had been done in the present case.

Company—Winding up—Proof—Directors' fees. Directors held entitled to rank as ordinary creditors in respect of unpaid fees.

"Ex parte Cannon" (30 Ch.D., 629) distinguished.

This case resulted in a very useful decision as to directors' fees. The directors were required by the articles of association to possess a share-qualification, and article 62 provided that "the remuneration of the board shall be an annual sum of £1,000 to be paid out of the funds of the company, which sum shall be divided in such manner as the board from time to time determine." The company having gone into liquidation the directors claimed to rank as ordinary creditors in respect of their fees due at the commencement of the liquidation. Section 38, subsection 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that "no sum due to any member of a company, in his character of a member, by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise, shall be deemed to be a debt of the company payable to such member in a case of competition between himself and any other creditor not being a member of the company; but any such debt may be taken into account for the purposes of the final adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves." It has been somewhat hastily assumed that in all cases where directors are obliged to be members of the company their unpaid fees are debts due to them in their character of members, and are postponed to the debts of outside creditors, the decision of Mr. Justice Pearson in "Ex parte Cannon" (L.R., 30 Ch. D., 629) being often regarded as an authority for this proposition. In that case, however, the articles only provided that "the remuneration of the directors for their services shall be such sum as the company in general meeting may from time to time determine," and Mr. Justice Pearson held that no remuneration being fixed, it depended entirely on the good will of the meeting whether any remuneration was to be given.

Mr. DIGTON POLLOCK, for the directors, contended that "Ex parte Cannon" was distinguishable, but that if it was in point it ought not to be followed, having regard to Mr. Justice Kay's decision in "In re Dale and Plant" (L.R., 43 Ch. D., 255).

Mr. HOWARD WRIGHT, for the liquidator, said his client did not wish to oppose the claim if the Court thought the directors were legally entitled to the remuneration.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said the case depended on an article (62) which was different from that in "Ex parte Cannon." That article was not in itself a contract between the company and the directors—it was only part of the contract amongst the members of the company inter se. But when, on the footing of that article, the directors were employed and accepted office the terms of the article were embodied in the contract. Under the article as thus embodied the directors obtained a contractual right to an annual sum of £1,000 as remuneration. His Lordship did not intend by this decision to fritter away any obligation of being bound by any previous decision. If the facts in "Ex parte Cannon" and in this case had been the same his Lordship would have followed "Ex parte Cannon," but the ground of Mr. Justice Pearson's decision was that the directors in that case were not in a distinct contractual position, as regarded the company. The present case was within the principle of "In re Dale and Plant." It was not within section 38 of the Act of 1862, because the remuneration was not due to the directors in their character of members. It was not due to them by their being members, but under a distinct contract. The claim must, therefore, be allowed.

ROGERS V. MANCHESTER PACKING COMPANY.*

Factory Acts—"Factory," what is—Bleaching and dyeing works—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, sec. 93.

This was a case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Manchester on the hearing of an information by an inspector for factories for that the respondents, being the occupiers of a "factory," did employ a young person after 8 p.m. The Justices dismissed the information on the ground that the premises of the respondents were not a factory within the meaning of the definition in the 93rd section of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 16). The definition provides that "factory" includes a "non-textile factory," which includes "bleaching and dyeing works"—i.e., "premises in which bleaching, beetling, dyeing, calendering, finishing, hooking, lapping, and making-up and packing any yarn or cloth or any material, or the dressing or finishing of lace, or any one or more of such processes or any process incidental thereto are or is carried on." The respondents carried on the business of makers-up and packers in their premises. This business is exclusively the hooking, lapping, making-up and packing of cloth for exportation. The respondents receive the cloth from the shipping merchants in the finished condition in which it is received from the manufacturers. The respondents then cut it into lengths according to instruction, and these lengths are then folded in different ways. After binding or stitching the ends of the folds together in order to keep them straight, this cloth is made up into neat parcels and labels are affixed thereon. A number of these parcels are then placed together and hydraulic pressure is applied to reduce the bulk. The respondents despatch the goods direct from their warehouse to the shipowners. The processes just described are essential to the business of the respondents, and are properly called hooking, lapping, making-up and packing. By the operation of "hooking and lapping" the cloth is measured and folded. It was admitted that hooking, lapping, making-up and packing could be carried on as a separate trade, though it was often the case that bleaching, beetling, dyeing, calendering, finishing, hooking, lapping and making-up and packing of cloth were carried on together in premises known as bleaching and dyeing works. It was part of the bargain between the merchant and his customers that the cloth should be made up in a particular way. The sole question was whether the premises were a factory. The respondents contended that they were not, on the ground that the hooking, lapping, making-up and packing were not carried on incidentally to bleaching and dyeing. The appellant contended that any premises where hooking, lapping, making-up and packing were carried on were a bleaching and dyeing works within the Act.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Attorney-General and Mr. H. Sutton appeared for the appellant; Mr. A. M. Langdon for the respondents.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said these premises were premises in which four of the processes named were carried on, therefore these premises were a "factory." He referred to the history of the legislation on the subject. First came the Bleaching and Dyeing Act (1860) (23 and 24 Vict., c. 78), on which he cited the case of "Howarth v. Coles" (12 C. B., N.S., 140); then followed the Statutes 26 and 27 Vict., c. 38 (1863), 27 and 28 Vict., c. 98 (1864), which showed that if hooking and lapping, making-up and packing were carried on on premises they were a factory. By 33 and 34 Vict., c. 62 (1870), all these bleaching and dyeing Acts were repealed, and such classes of premises were brought within the Factories Act.

Mr. LANGDON said the premises in question were not bleaching or dye works, and therefore not a factory. The respondents received the goods when completed. The work carried on by them was a separate business. The words "any one or more of such processes" meant any of them incidental to bleaching and dyeing. The premises referred to in the section were bleaching and dyeing works in the ordinary sense of the words, where one or other of the processes named was carried on.

Mr. JUSTICE DAY said it was clear that the contention for the Crown was right. The Legislature had power to regulate factories, and they had done so. His Lordship then referred to the words of the section, and said that though not bleaching and dyeing works in the natural sense of the words, yet the premises in question were clearly within the definition of bleaching and dyeing works given in the section. The matter must go back to be dealt with by the magistrates.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

THE MERSEY STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V.
MAYOR, & C., OF LONDON.*

Thames—Navigation—Corporation of London (Tower Bridge) Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict., c. cxv.), sec. 54—Duty of Corporation to provide a steamtug—Liability.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Corporation of London, from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew at the trial of the action with a special jury.

The case is reported in The Times of July 10. The action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for injury to their steamship Oratava. The question arose under section 54 of the Corporation of London (Tower Bridge) Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict., c. cxv.), which imposes a duty upon the Corporation of providing and maintaining a steamtug for the purpose of assisting vessels and barges navigating the centre channel of the Upper Pool. That section provides that "if and so long as the Conservators (of the Thames) shall require them so to do, the Corporation shall, from and after the commencement of any temporary works in connexion with the construction of the piers of the Tower-bridge, at all times thereafter during the construction of the Tower-bridge, and after the completion thereof, provide and maintain a steamtug upon the River Thames between the Shadwell entrance to the London Docks and London-bridge for the purpose of assisting vessels and barges navigating the centre channel of the Upper Pool. The captain or other person in charge of the said steamtug shall in all things observe the bye-laws for the regulation of the navigation of the River Thames for the time being in force, and also the directions of the harbour-master and other officers of the Conservators." It appeared that the Oratava was coming out of the London and St. Katharine's Docks, which were just below the Tower-bridge on the north side of the Thames, stern first, shortly before high tide, when she was caught by the tide, and in consequence of the number of barges in the river she was placed in a position of danger with regard to one of the piers of the Tower-bridge. Her engines were accordingly put full speed ahead in order to bring her down the river and thus get her out of danger, when the propeller fouled a buoy and was damaged. It was admitted that the defendants had, at the request of the Conservators, provided and maintained a steamtug for the purpose of assisting vessels navigating the centre channel, that this steamtug was close at hand when the accident happened, and that the master of the tug saw the Oratava, but did not go to her assistance, as he did not think that she was in danger. It was also admitted or proved that if the tug had gone to her assistance it could have brought her head down channel and prevented the injury to her. The jury found that before and at the time of the accident the Oratava was navigating the centre channel of the Upper Pool. By consent all other questions were left to the Judge. The defendants contended that their sole duty under section 54 was to provide and maintain a steamtug and to place it at the disposal of the Conservators of the Thames, who had control of the navigation of the river, and that the master of the tug was the servant of the Conservators, he being bound to obey the orders of the harbour-master, who was in the employment of the Conservators and who alone could give him any orders, and that, therefore, they were not liable. The learned Judge held that the defendants' duty was to provide and maintain a tug and to assist vessels navigating the centre channel, that the master of the tug was the servant of the defendants, who were responsible for his acts, and that the master was negligent. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts (Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., with them) appeared for the defendants.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that in his opinion the judgment of the learned Judge was right. The question turned upon the true construction of section 54 of the Corporation of London (Tower Bridge) Act, 1885.

By that section, when properly interpreted, the obligation of the defendants was to provide and maintain a steam tug when required to do so and to assist vessels navigating the centre channel when circumstances arose which rendered assistance necessary. If that were so the inevitable result followed that the defendants were guilty of a breach of duty by their servant, who was bound to assist and did not assist the Oratava. That really disposed of the whole case. No doubt the steam tug, in navigating the river, was bound, like any other vessel, to obey the orders of the harbour-master in the region of his administration. What that was the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, showed. It was clear that there were two different sets of Acts, and there was no difficulty in assigning each to its proper jurisdiction. There was, first, the navigation of each vessel on the Thames, and there was also the general navigation of the river, the general dominion over the traffic on the river. To say that the navigation of each particular ship in the Thames was under the control of the harbour-master, who was the officer of the Thames Conservancy, was to reduce the whole thing to an absurdity, because that would make the Thames Conservancy responsible for every act of every vessel navigating the Thames. In his opinion the master of the tug was the defendants' servant, and the true construction of section 54 of the Act of 1885 was that the words "for the purpose of assisting" meant "and shall assist."

The LORDS JUSTICES concurred.

JENNINGS V. JENNINGS.*

Goodwill—Sale of business—Settlement of action between partners amounting to sale—Canvassing customers—Injunction.

The question in this case was one which often arises upon the termination of a partnership—namely, whether where one partner retains the business the others are entitled to canvass the customers of the old firm. It was decided by the House of Lords in 1896, in the case of "Trego v. Hunt" (L.R. [1896], A.C., 7), that upon the sale of the goodwill of a business the vendor was not entitled to canvass the old customers of the firm, and the substantial question was whether the present case was covered by that decision. The case came on upon a motion to restrain the defendant from canvassing customers of a business formerly carried on by the plaintiff and defendant in partnership. The partnership was entered into under articles dated January 25, 1896. In February, 1897, the present defendant commenced an action against the present plaintiff in the Queen's Bench Division, claiming a rescission of the partnership and damages on the ground of misrepresentation made by the present plaintiff to the present defendant. That action came on to be tried on November 22, 1897, but was at once compromised upon the terms stated in the following certificate:—"By consent the Judge directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for £1,200, to include costs, on the following terms. All charges of fraud withdrawn. The plaintiff to be indemnified as to all debts of partnership, and the partnership to be dissolved, the defendant retaining the assets and allowing the plaintiff 14 days to remove from the premises. The other action to be dropped. This in full settlement of all disputes." Subsequently, the defendant issued a circular to the old customers stating that he intended to commence business and asking for orders. Thereupon the present action was brought.

Mr. Rashleigh appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Daniel Jones for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that the injunction was claimed upon the authority of "Trego v. Hunt" (L.R. [1896], A.C., 7), in which it was established that when the goodwill of a business was sold the vendor, although he might set up a rival business, was not entitled to canvass the customers of the old business, and might be restrained from soliciting any person who was such customer to continue to deal with the vendor or not to deal with the purchaser. The obligation to refrain from canvassing the customers arose out of the relation of vendor and purchaser. His Lordship then referred to the observations of Lords Macnaghten, Herschell, and Davey in "Trego v. Hunt," and, continuing, said that the source of the obligation was well shown by the decision in "Walker v. Mottram" (L.R., 19 Ch. D., 355), where it was held that a bankrupt, the goodwill of whose business had been sold by the trustee in his bankruptcy, could not be restrained from canvassing the customers, not because the goodwill sold by a trustee in bankruptcy differed from that sold by a solvent man, but simply because the bankrupt was not the vendor, and consequently under no liability towards the purchaser. "There is all the difference in the world" said Lord Macnaghten, referring to "Walker v. Mottram," "between the case of a man who sells what belongs to himself, and receives the consideration, and a man whose property is sold without his consent by his trustee in bankruptcy, and who comes under no obligation, express or implied, to the purchaser from the trustee." The first inquiry therefore must be whether the relationship of vendor and purchaser existed between the plaintiff and defendant, and in his Lordship's judgment that question must be answered in the affirmative. The judgment was one by consent upon terms agreed and stated by the certificate. The case was not one of a dissolution and sale by the Court, but of a dissolution by mutual consent, one of the terms being in substance a sale by the plaintiff of all his interest in the assets of the partnership for £1,200, and indeed this was not disputed by the defendant. Next, was the defendant the vendor of the goodwill? He sold all his interest in the "assets" of the partnership. Goodwill was not expressly mentioned. It was not disputed that the word "assets" included goodwill so far as it constituted property, but it was contended that the defendant was not such a vendor as to give rise to the obligation on which the plaintiff's title to an injunction rested. The word "assets" was a compendious expression for the aggregate of the several items of property belonging to the partnership. An agreement for the sale of such assets would in most cases bear the same construction and have the same effect as if the several items of property were specifically enumerated either in the body of the agreement or in a schedule annexed to it. There were however two cases, binding on his Lordship, which were said to establish that this was not always so. His Lordship then referred to the cases of "Gray v. Smith" (L.R., 43 Ch. D., 208) and "Pearson v. Pearson" (L.R., 27 Ch. D., 145), and said that in point of decision neither of those cases governed that now before the Court. "Gray v. Smith" did not, for it related to the use of the trade name and not to the canvassing of customers. It was, however, an authority in favour of the defendant to this extent, that it decided that a contract for the sale of "assets" generally did not always confer on a purchaser the same rights as one in which goodwill was specifically mentioned. Neither again did "Pearson v. Pearson," for all the learned Judges relied on the terms of a clause, no equivalent to which was found in the agreement with which his Lordship had here to deal. It appeared, however, to be an authority in favour of the plaintiff so far as it contained expression of opinion by the majority of the Court of Appeal that, under a clause not substantially differing from the agreement now before the Court, the defendant was not entitled to canvass customers; while the third member of the Court (Lord Justice Cotton) apparently was not of that opinion. It appearing therefore that in some cases a contract for sale of assets did not confer on a purchaser the same rights as if the items of which the assets consisted, and in particular the goodwill, were specifically enumerated, it became necessary to inquire in what cases this happened. On a sale of property the parties did not in general contemplate the possibility of personal liabilities on the part of either contracting party arising otherwise than out of the contract itself. If, then, the purchaser tried to use some part of the purchased property (such as the trade name) in such a way as to throw on the vendor a liability not directly arising from the relation of vendor and purchaser, it might well be that he should not be allowed to do so unless he could point to something in the contract which justified his act over and above the mere description of the subject matter of the sale in general terms, such as "assets," "interest," "property," and the like. On the other hand, if a vendor sought to exonerate himself from a liability which would be the ordinary consequence of a sale of property comprised in the contract, his Lordship thought that he ought not to be allowed to do so unless he could point to some express stipulation in the contract for sale enabling him in that behalf. This view appeared to be consistent with both "Gray v. Smith" and "Pearson v. Pearson." It was to be observed that the obligation enforced in "Trego v. Hunt" was not confined to goodwill, but extended to other kinds of property. If, for example, the assets sold by the defendant to the plaintiff had included a house which adjoined land belonging to the defendant, he could not, after the sale, build on his own land so as to obstruct the access of light to the house which he had sold. It was true that if the house commanded a sea view the defendant could not be restrained from building so as to shut out from the house the view of the sea; but the reason was that the law did not recognize any property in such a view, although it did recognize a right to the access of light to a window. As the law recognized a property in goodwill, his Lordship thought that the defendant by selling it came under an obligation not to do any act which would injure it, and amongst such acts was included canvassing of the old customers. His Lordship then dealt with a further contention on behalf of the defendant—viz., that the word "assets" ought not to be held to include more than would be ordered to be sold if the Court were directing a sale for the purpose of winding up the partnership—but expressed no opinion upon the points to which it gave rise, and said that his present decision rested upon the following findings, viz.:—that the sale with which he had to deal was not a compulsory one made by the Court, but was the subject of a voluntary agreement containing no express stipulation reserving to the defendant any right to carry on business. His Lordship thought, therefore, that the defendant was subject to the ordinary obligations of a vendor, and that an injunction ought to be granted.

REG. V. TEMPEST AND ANOTHER (JUSTICES) AND CUTTS —EX PARTE TOWNEND.*

Poor Rate—Distress warrant—Agreement with owner to pay rates—Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, secs. 3 and 16.

In this case Mr. Roskill appeared for the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire to show cause against an order for a mandamus directing them to state a special case; Mr. Alexander Glen appeared in support of the rule.

The facts were these:—On June 19, 1897, a poor-rate for the parish of Hemsworth, in the county of York, was made and allowed. The rate on the face of it was expressed to be estimated to meet all expenses which should be incurred before September 29, 1897. In this parish the vestry, under section 4 of the Poor-rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 41), ordered the owners of all rateable hereditaments not exceeding £8 per annum to be rated instead of the occupiers. A Mrs. Cutts was entered as the owner of 12 dwelling-houses under the rateable value of £8 each. The houses were newly built, being completed and occupied just before the date of the rate on June 19. Mrs. Cutts on June 18 agreed with the overseers to pay the rates for the 12 houses whether occupied or not, and thereby obtained a reduction of 25 per cent. A demand for a rate of £5 8s. was made on her. She, however, refused to pay. The overseers took out a summons to enforce the rate. The justices ordered the issue of a distress warrant for the sum of £4 1s. 0½d., giving as their reason for not issuing a warrant for the full amount that the rate made on June 19 was current for the period from March 25, 1897, to September 29, 1897, while the houses were only occupied on June 12, and that, therefore, the rate ought not to be paid in full. An application was thereon made to them to state a case, but the justices refused to do so. Mr. Glen obtained a rule nisi to compel them to state a case; he had also asked for a rule for a mandamus to direct the justices to issue a distress warrant. The Court, however, had made him select between the two. On the present motion cause was shown against the rule for a special case on the ground that, on the authority of the case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent," ([1897] App. Ca., 556), the justices enforcing a distress warrant, not being a Court of summary jurisdiction, could not state a special case.

Mr. ROSKILL cited "Ex parte May" ([1862] 31 L.J., M.C., 161); "R. v. Price" ([1880] 5 Q.B.D., 300), and urged that both these cases were still good law. He commented on "R. v. Lord Mayor of London" ([1887] 57 L.T., 491), and said that this was overruled by "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" ([1897] App. Ca., 556). He also cited "Fourth City Building Society v. Churchwardens of East Ham" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 661). The statute 52 and 53 Vict., c. 63, s. 13 (11), defined "Court of summary jurisdiction" to mean any "justice or justices . . . to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is authorized to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, whether in England, Wales, or Ireland, and whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law." The words in the definition could not embrace all acts of magistrates, but only when they were exercising summary jurisdiction. The original jurisdiction to enforce a rate was under the statute of 43 Elizabeth c. 2, s. 2 (1601). Assuming that, under that statute, they exercised both judicial and ministerial functions, they were still not exercising summary jurisdiction. Section 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884, provided that "nothing in this Act shall alter the procedure for the non-payment of any poor-rate." The case of "R. v. Lord Mayor of London" must be taken as being overruled by the case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent." Therefore, the case of "R. v. Lord Mayor of London" was not an authority against his contention. At this point the COURT intimated that, as the whole of the difficulty could be avoided if the rule were moulded into one for a mandamus to the justices to issue a warrant, the merits of the case should be gone into.

Mr. ROSKILL said he would deal with them, though it was the other point that he had come prepared to argue. He then contended that the course followed by the justices was right and equitable and in accordance with the analogy afforded by section 16 of the Act of 1869, in the case of an occupier ceasing to occupy before the rate was discharged. Here the houses were non-existent for a great part of the time in respect of the expenses for which the rate was made.

The COURT, without calling on Mr. Glen, came to the conclusion that the best course would be for the matter to go back to the justices with the expression of opinion from the Court that a warrant of distress for the whole sum should issue, Mr. Glen to have liberty to apply again if necessary. It was probable that the lady would pay the rate after that. There would be no order for costs. The rate in this case operated from June 19, and the tenants who then occupied the houses would have been chargeable had not the landlady made a contract with the overseers by which she undertook to pay the rates for these houses herself. The 16th section of the Act (32 and 33 Vic., c. 41) did not apply to the circumstances of this case. Passing by the point that that section only applied to occupiers and not owners, as not being a broad enough point in this case there was no ceasing to occupy before the rate had been wholly discharged, nor was the hereditament unoccupied at the time of the making of the rate. Therefore the justices had no jurisdiction to say that only a proportionate part of the rate should be levied.

SEAWARD V. DREW AND FARMER (THIRD PARTY).
Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Determination—Notice—Validity—Notice by mortgagee of assignee of lease.

This was an action to recover rent under a lease dated February 1, 1883, and the question was whether that lease had been determined by notice at the end of the 14th year. The plaintiff was assignee of the original lessor. The defendant Drew was the original lessee. The third party, Farmer, took an assignment from Drew, and covenanted to indemnify him. Farmer by deed assigned to one Yarnold, who covenanted to indemnify him. Yarnold gave a charge on the lease to Messrs. Hays and Co. to secure £50, and deposited the lease with them. Yarnold disappeared, and left the premises unoccupied. Drew was called upon to pay the rent, and in turn called upon Farmer to indemnify him, and Farmer paid the rent. Farmer then took an assignment from Hays and Co. of his rights, whatever they were, and they accepted from Farmer £10 as purchase money of their debt of £50 due to them from Yarnold. Farmer proceeded to take possession of the premises and let them, and applied the rents in discharge of the rents due to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was aware of what was being done, and applied to Farmer from time to time for rent due under the lease, giving him receipts for rents as being due from Drew. Notices of repair were given, which were done by Farmer. On September 24, 1896, notices were given by Drew and Farmer to the plaintiff's solicitors to determine the lease, and the question was whether the lease was thereby determined. The proviso in the lease under which the notices were given was as follows:—"In case the said Richard Drew, his executors, administrators, or assigns shall be desirous of determining this present lease or demise at the end or expiration of the first seven or 14 years of the said term hereby granted, and of such his or their desire or intention, shall give notice in writing to the said Frederick Hose, his heirs, or assigns, or shall leave the same at his or their usual or last-known place of abode in England, six calendar months before the expiration of the said seven or 14 years of the said term hereby granted . . . then and in such case forward and immediately after the expiration of such seven or 14 years of the said term this indenture and every covenant clause, matter, or thing herein contained shall cease and determine." It was contended that Yarnold having abandoned possession of the premises, thereby authorized Farmer to deal with them as he pleased, and Yarnold, if he appeared, would be estopped from denying Farmer's authority to give the notice.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL, in giving judgment, said the plaintiff was not estopped by anything that had passed between him and Farmer from denying that Farmer was assignee, and unless there was such an estoppel, the dealings between them appeared immaterial. He did not think that Yarnold would be estopped from denying Farmer's authority to give the notice. Farmer's possession was only as mortgagee. No proceedings to foreclose had been taken, and no power of sale had been exercised. There was no authority to give the notice arising out of what Yarnold had done. He gave no authority to Hays and Co. by going away to do anything but protect their security, and possibly for that purpose he must be taken to have authorized them to take possession of the abandoned property. Farmer, as purchaser of Hays and Co.'s rights, got no authority except what they had. The fact that Yarnold failed to indemnify Drew and Farmer did not entitle them to touch or deal with his property in the term, any more than it entitled them to recoup themselves out of any other property that he might have left behind him. Neither Drew nor Farmer had any kind of lien or interest in the term after the assignment of it by Farmer to Yarnold. If Yarnold was insolvent and so unable to perform his covenants, Farmer, with good reason, might have called upon him to exercise his option, and determine the lease; but if Yarnold had unreasonably and vexatiously refused to do so, he could not be compelled by any process that he knew of to give the notice, or to give the use of his name that notice might be given for him. He could not be treated as a mere trustee of the option, and bound to exercise it as directed by Farmer. The notice did not purport to be given on behalf of Yarnold, and could not, therefore, be ratified by him. Under those circumstances, he must hold that the lease was still subsisting.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £30 against the defendant with costs. Judgment for the defendant against Farmer on the indemnity directing him to indemnify the defendant. Costs on the High Court scale.

Mr. Kerly (Mr. Duke with him) appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Lailey for the defendant; Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. P. T. Blackwell for the third party.

HOCKEY V. WESTERN.*

Mortgage—Rights of mortgagee—Mortgage of trust fund—Receipt by mortgagee—Conveyancing Act, 1881, sec. 22, subs. 1—Trustees—“Re Bell” ([1895] 1 Ch., 1).

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Oliver Hockey, from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's, dated November 12 last. The plaintiff and Mr. H. C. Hay (since deceased) were both members of an association called the Southwark Freehold Land and House Property Association. It was established on March 1, 1882, under an indenture of that date, its object being to purchase land in England for the purpose of dealing with the same as the association should direct. The defendants, Mr. John Western and Mr. William Butcher, were the present trustees of the association. On September 24, 1889, Mr. Hay assigned to the plaintiff, by way of mortgage to secure the sum of £600 and interest, all the money paid in and then standing to the account of Mr. Hay in the association and the value of his share and all other (if any), his right, title, and interest in the association and the benefit, advantages, and emoluments arising from the same, together with certain other property. On December 20, 1896, Mr. Hay died intestate. There was no legal personal representative in existence. On January 14, 1897, the defendants furnished the plaintiff with a cash statement of the association showing that there was due to him and to Mr. Hay and the other members of the association, on account of their respective shares therein, the sum of £300. Subsequently further sums of £50 were shown to be due to the members respectively. The defendants were authorized by a resolution of the members to pay these sums subject to each member signing a receipt for the same in an approved form. The plaintiff claimed as mortgagee to be paid the sums of £300 and £50 due to Mr. Hay, and he alleged that the defendants had refused and neglected to pay the same to him. He accordingly brought this action against the defendants to enforce his claim. By their defence the defendants stated that in January, 1897, they had had notice that the son of Mr. Hay was winding up the estate of his father. They alleged that the plaintiff, though often so requested, had wholly refused to produce to them for their perusal the mortgage deeds and to furnish them with any account of the moneys owing in respect of the mortgages; that they were willing and had offered the plaintiff to pay him so much of the sums of £300 and £50 as, upon taking the accounts between mortgagor and mortgagee, might be found to be due to the plaintiff and upon receiving from him a proper covenant of indemnity against any claims which might arise or be made upon them in respect of the said sums or in respect of the association. The plaintiff contended that—inasmuch as under section 22, subsection 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the receipt in writing of a mortgagee was a sufficient discharge for any money comprised in his mortgage, and that a person paying the same was not to be concerned to inquire whether any money remained due under the mortgage—it was the duty of the defendants to pay the money to the plaintiff, he being a person empowered to give a receipt. It was decided by Mr. Justice Kekewich on the authority of “Re Bell, Jeffery v. Sayles” ([1896] 1 Ch. 1), that the defendants were entitled to refuse to hand over the money to the plaintiff until an account had been taken; and that upon their undertaking to pay the money into Court the action would be dismissed. From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Mr. WARRINGTON, Q.C., and Mr. A. BEDDALL for the appellant argued that the authority of “Re Bell” (ubi supra) was distinguishable—first, because in that case there was only part of a fund due, while in the present case prima facie the whole fund was due; and, secondly, because in that case there were known to be adverse claimants, and therefore persons with whom the trustees could settle, while in the present case there were no adverse claimants and, therefore, no persons to settle it.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. R. H. Spearman for the respondents were not called upon to argue.

Their LORDSHIPS affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich and dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the case was one of considerable importance to trustees and mortgagees of equitable interests. He took the law to be as it was laid down in “Re Bell” (ubi supra). The only question was what was the effect of section 22, subsection 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Speaking generally, that was a statutory substitution for the power to give receipts commonly inserted in mortgage deeds, and it must not be cut down. Under it it was perfectly safe to pay money to mortgagees; and a person paying was not concerned to inquire whether any money remained due under the mortgage. If, therefore, there was no notice of anything wrong, persons need not hesitate to pay on having the receipt. But was it misconduct to say that if there were something suspicious a person would be justified in refusing to pay? Was it any answer to trustees to say that they must not seek the protection of the Court? That would be a revolution in the law relating to trustees. The case was gone the moment it was decided that the trustees should pay the money into Court. If there were any circumstances which made it reasonable for trustees to decline to be satisfied that the money ought to be paid over to the person claiming, it was competent for them to pay it into Court. It was not necessary to go closely into the facts of the present case. Here there was a mortgagor who was dead. The trustees knew that there was a controversy as regarded the mortgage debt, and they required to have the protection of the Court. The position taken up by the mortgagee was that the trustees had nothing to do with that and must pay the money on his giving a receipt. That was going a great deal too far. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the same effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

MONTGOMERY, JONES, AND CO. V. LIEBENTHAL AND CO.*

Practice—Writ—Service—O. 11, r. 1. (e).

There is nothing in the rules to negative the right of a person to enter into an agreement as to the mode in which service of a writ may be made upon him.

This was an appeal from an order by Mr. Justice Phillimore. The plaintiffs were corn merchants carrying on business at Liverpool. The defendant resided at Leith, in Scotland, and carried on business there as a corn merchant under a firm name. The action was brought for breach of a contract whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs a cargo of Northern spring wheat. The contract was in the form used by the London Corn Trade Association and was made at Leith. By the terms of the contract buyer and seller agreed that for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, the contract should be deemed to have been made in England and to be performed there, and that the service of proceedings upon a party residing or carrying on business in a foreign country by leaving the same at such Consulate, and upon a party residing or carrying on business either in Scotland or Ireland by leaving the same at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, together with the posting of a copy of such proceedings to the address abroad or in Scotland or Ireland of such party, should be deemed good service, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding. The writ of summons, by which the action was commenced, was served by the delivery of a true copy thereof to the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association at the office of the association in the City of London. The defendant took out a summons at Chambers to have the service set aside, on the ground that under the rules of Court there was no power to effect such service. Mr. Justice Phillimore refused to set the service aside. The defendant appealed. It was contended on his behalf that according to the rules a writ could only be served upon him either by personal service or by substituted service in pursuance of a Judge's order, and that it was not open to the parties by any agreement to alter the rules as to the service of proceedings.

Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the defendant; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. L. Sanderson for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the order of Mr. Justice Phillimore was right. The defendant applied to have service of the writ set aside. The answer was that the writ had been served in the way in which he had agreed that it should be served. The defendant was a domiciled Scotchman, and he entered into a contract to sell corn to the plaintiffs. The contract provided that any party to the contract residing or carrying on business in Scotland or Ireland should be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, and that service of proceedings upon such party by leaving the same at the office of the London Corn Trade Association should be deemed good service, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding. Why could not the parties enter into such an agreement? Except for Order 11, rule 1 (e), he could see no pretence for suggesting that a person in the position of the defendant could not agree that he would accept service of a writ in this manner as good personal service. The case of "Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Société des Métaux" (60 L.T., N.S.; 924) was in favour of the plaintiffs, and showed that parties might make such a contract, if it did not involve their asking the Court to do something which by the rules the Court was prohibited from doing. In the case of "British Wagon Company v. Gray" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 35) the Court was asked to do that which was expressly prohibited by Order 11, r. 1. (e), and it was on that ground that they declined to grant the application.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that the real question was whether the parties could rightly enter into such a contract as was made here. It was argued that it was void by reason of the rules, and "British Wagon Company v. Gray" was relied on. But in that case the rules contained an express prohibition. Here there was no such prohibition; in his opinion there was no rule which negated the right of a person to enter into an agreement as to the mode in which service of a writ might be made upon him.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

THE MELROSE ABBEY.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—"Two voyages per month, fortnightly"—Meaning of.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the County Court of Glamorgan holden at Swansea. It appears that the respondents entered into a charterparty with the appellants to charter the steamship Melrose Abbey from the end of June, 1886, to the end of April, 1897, for two voyages per month fortnightly. The appellants placed the Melrose Abbey at the respondents' disposal on July 15 and 28, August 5, 19, and 31, September 16, and October 8 and 29. The respondents claimed to have been entitled to the ship on October 23, and not being able to obtain the vessel on that date they chartered another vessel and brought an action in the County Court to recover the extra freight they had had to pay for the vessel they had chartered in the place of the Melrose Abbey. Judgment having been given in favour of the respondents, the appellants appealed.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the appellants, contended that the words in the charterparty, "two voyages per month, fortnightly," meant that the appellants were to supply a steamer at intervals of about a fortnight, and not more than two per month. This they had done. The steamer of October 8 was supplied before she was properly due under the charterparty, and the appellants were not bound to supply another till about the 28th.

Mr. PYKE, Q.C., and Mr. IVOR BOWEN, for the respondents, contended that one steamer was to be supplied at the beginning of the month and another at a fortnight from that date. So that if one vessel was supplied on the 8th of the month, another was to be supplied a fortnight afterwards, and the next steamer was to be supplied at the beginning of the next month. The fortnight was to be reckoned from the time the steamer at the beginning of the month was supplied, even though she was supplied at a date earlier than that stipulated in the charterparty.

The Court allowed the appeal with costs.

The PRESIDENT said that if the contention of the respondents was right it would lead to a curious result, and one that the parties could not have contemplated when they entered into the charterparty. On the respondents' contention the appellants would be entitled to supply a vessel at the commencement of the month, again on the 15th of the month, and not another till nearly a month later—or they might supply a steamer about the 14th of the month, another on the 28th, and again at the beginning of the next month. If, however, they read "fortnightly" approximately, all trouble in construing the charterparty was avoided. This the appellants had done, and, in his opinion, they had fulfilled all their obligations under their contract and were entitled to succeed in their appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, after concurring with the judgment of the President, said that there was a clause in the charterparty which, in his opinion, emphasized the view taken by Mr. Lush. It was that "owners to have liberty of substituting their Tintern Abbey or other approved steamer." Reading that clause with the clause as to the sailing of the Melrose Abbey fortnightly, it was evident that the parties to the contract intended the Melrose Abbey to sail at regular intervals, and not in accordance with the way suggested by Mr. Pyke. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

IN RE LAND MORTGAGE BANK OF FLORIDA (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Voluntary liquidation—Surplus from calls in hands of liquidators—"Undistributed assets," what are—Scheme under Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, sec. 15.

This case raised a very important question as to the powers of the board with reference to liquidators of companies. The company went into voluntary liquidation in December, 1895, and then appointed voluntary liquidators. This was done because the company had got into difficulties (caused by the destruction of the orange groves in Florida), and was unable to pay the interest on its terminable debentures. On April 15, 1896, a scheme was sanctioned by the Court under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. Under this scheme the uncalled capital was to be called up and thereout a dividend of 12s. 6d. in the pound was to be paid to the debenture-holders in September, 1897, the balance being payable in 1902, and the interest being kept down in the meantime. Any surplus from calls, after paying the first dividend, was to be applied according to the liquidators' discretion for management and other expenses. The scheme also gave the liquidators power to borrow for protecting and developing the assets. By a trust deed executed in pursuance of the scheme the liquidators covenanted to apply the proceeds of the calls in accordance with the scheme. The liquidators in May and September, 1897, delivered to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies the statements of account required by section 15 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, and the Board of Trade subsequently directed them to pay into the Companies Liquidation Account the surplus of calls which their accounts showed that they had still in their hands. The liquidators refused to comply with this direction on the ground that the money was net "undistributed assets" within the meaning of section 15 (3) of the Act of 1890. In consequence of such refusal the Board of Trade now moved for an order on the liquidators to pay the money into the Companies Liquidation Account.

Mr. INGLE JOYCE, in support of the application, said that the case was clearly within section 15 of the Act of 1890, and Rule 127D of the Winding-up Rules. The proceeds of calls were clearly assets, and they had not been distributed, although they had been in hand for more than six months. It was not proposed to interfere with the scheme, but only to see that the assets were in proper custody. This was the very object of section 15, and there could be no objection to complying with it except that it was supposed to be inconvenient, and that the Act was absurd. The Act was plain in its terms, and must be obeyed.

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON, Q.C., and Mr. THEOBALD, for the liquidators, said the case was not within section 15 at all. The winding up was a liquidation, for the present at any rate, for the debenture-holders' benefit only, and when the scheme was worked out the winding up would be stayed and the company would go on as before. The assets were not undistributed, for they were appropriated to the purposes of a scheme and a trust deed approved by the Court. Under the scheme so approved the liquidators had a discretion as to payments and otherwise, which the Board of Trade wished to take away from them. If the order was made the liquidators would have to ask the Board for every cheque they had to pay under the scheme. The money was safe in a bank, and ought not to be diminished by the payment of the fees which would be payable if it was paid into the Companies Liquidation Account.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said that the application failed. Under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, section 2, a scheme, on being sanctioned by the Court, became binding on the creditors or class of creditors concerned, and also on the liquidator. The material provisions of the scheme in the present case were embodied in paragraph 9 of the scheme, under which, if there was a surplus after paying a dividend on the debentures, it might be applied, before paying any further dividend, in the payment of wages, &c., or in "any expenditure which the company may think necessary or expedient for protecting and keeping up the company's property and assets, or of developing the same with a view to the realization thereof." The scheme further provided, by clause 20, that a proper trust deed, giving effect to the provisions of the scheme, should be prepared and executed, and under clause 23 this deed was to be settled by counsel approved by the Judge. This scheme had been sanctioned by the Court, and the trust deed contemplated by it had been executed, with provisions in it relating to the application of the moneys in the hands of the liquidator. Section 15 (3) of the Act of 1890 was as follows:—"If it appears from any such statement or otherwise that any liquidator of a company has in his hands or under his control any money representing unclaimed or undistributed assets of the company which have remained unclaimed or undistributed for six months after the date of their receipt, the liquidator shall forthwith pay the same to the Companies Liquidation Account at the Bank of England. Every such liquidator shall be entitled to the prescribed certificate of receipt for the moneys so paid, and that certificate shall be an effectual discharge to him in respect thereof." It was not suggested that the sums in respect of which the present application was made were unclaimed assets, but it was said that they were undistributed assets. The answer to that was that, having regard to the scheme, they were not undistributed, but that some legal event had happened which had made them distributable in another way. In his Lordship's judgment the matter was governed by the provisions of the scheme. The special legislation provided by the scheme was not to be overruled by the general legislation of the Act with reference to the liquidator's duties. If the application were well-founded, it would be competent to the Board of Trade, and might perhaps even be their duty, to get in all the moneys in the hands of the liquidator, and to take the whole matter out of his hands and substitute the discretion of the Board for that given to the liquidator by the scheme. That was not the conclusion at which his Lordship ought to arrive. The question had been very properly raised, but in his judgment the Board of Trade were not entitled to displace the discretion given to the liquidator by the scheme. The motion must therefore be dismissed with costs.

IN RE THE M'DONALD GOLD MINES (LIMITED)—EX PARTE DUNCAN.*

Company—Winding up—Petition to wind up, on the ground that the whole substratum of the company had gone, dismissed—"In re Coolgardie Consolidated Gold Mines (Limited)" (13 The Times L.R., 301) distinguished.

This was an appeal by the petitioner, Mr. James Duncan, from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright, sitting as an additional Judge of the Chancery Division, dated November 24 last. The above-named company was incorporated in December, 1896, with a nominal capital of £80,000, divided into 240,000 ordinary shares of 5s. each. By its memorandum of association the company's object was stated to be, among other things, to take over the business property, undertaking, and assets of a company then in liquidation called the Bathurst Gold Mines (Limited), and its incorporation was part of a scheme of reconstruction of the Bathurst Company. The petitioner was the holder of 200 shares in the Bathurst Company, and he applied under the scheme of reconstruction for and was allotted 200 shares in the M'Donald Company, on which the sum of 4s. had been considered to have been paid, and he had paid two calls of 3d. each, making the shares 4s. 6d. paid. The Bathurst Company had agreed with the M'Donald Company for the acquisition by the latter of the mines and mining property of the Bathurst Company in New South Wales. The petitioner alleged that the Bathurst Company had not the mines and mining property in New South Wales which the M'Donald Company was formed to acquire, nor any mines and mining property at all which the Bathurst Company could transfer to the M'Donald Company, and that the M'Donald Company was negotiating for the acquisition of some other mining property. Under these circumstances the petitioner submitted that the whole substratum of the M'Donald Company had gone, and that it was not possible to carry out the essential purpose for which it was formed, and that it was just and equitable that it should be wound up. He accordingly presented his petition in August, 1897. The petitioner was supported by only one creditor and contributory, but persons holding shares to the value of £41,308 out of a total number of 164 shareholders whose shares amounted to £53,618 opposed the petition. Mr. Justice Wright was of opinion that, if the directors found that it was desirable to abandon the Bathurst Company's mine for another mine, so long as they had money to acquire that mine, it was impossible to say that the substratum had gone. His Lordship accordingly dismissed the petition with costs. The petitioner now appealed.

Mr. EUSTACE SMITH and Mr. W. HIGGINS, in support of the appeal, relied upon "In re Coolgardie Consolidated Gold Mines (Limited)" (13 The Times L.R., 301, and 76 Law Times Reports, p. 269), among other authorities.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Curtis Price were for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the case was a curious one, and brought much discredit on the Companies Act, 1862, showing how by great ingenuity the Limited Liability Act could be used for purposes that were never originally contemplated. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued.] The scheme of reconstruction was to transfer all the assets of the Bathurst Company as a going concern to the M'Donald Company. That scheme might be regarded as being the means of calling into existence the M'Donald Company. The petition was presented by the holder of a very few shares in the M'Donald Company in August, 1897, a little more than six months after the formation of that company. He might be said to stand alone. His interest was exceedingly small, his unpaid liability as a contributory being only £5. His case was that the primary object of the M'Donald Company was for working the Bathurst Company's mine, and that therefore the M'Donald Company had failed in attaining its object. His Lordship thought that it did appear that there was nothing worth having from the Bathurst Company's mine. Such as it had was apparently hardly worth working or taking over, although its plant and machinery might possibly be worth something. His Lordship, however, considered that there was great difficulty in bringing the present case up to the principle upon which the Court of Appeal acted in "In re the Coolgardie Consolidated Gold Mines (Limited)"—ubi supra. That was a sound principle, but he had great difficulty in applying that case to the present in consequence of the difficulty there was in construing the memorandum of association in the present case. A reconstruction scheme was contemplated which it was difficult to work out. His Lordship, therefore, was not satisfied that the present case was clearly brought within the wholesome principle of the "Coolgardie" case. It appeared that the only person who wanted the M'Donald Company wound up was this petitioner with a very small interest. If there was a winding up the petitioner would not get anything out of it. The other shareholders were against it altogether, and his Lordship did not see that the Court was bound in the face of that opposition to make a winding-up order. He did not think that the petitioner was entitled to a winding-up order ex debito justitiæ. He thought that the appeal failed, but he regarded the affidavits filed on the other side as fishy and tricky, and he considered that if his learned brothers agreed he ought to say—Dismiss this appeal, but without costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY, in the course of his judgment, said that he was satisfied that the "Coolgardie" case was well decided, but he thought that this appeal should be dismissed on the grounds stated by the Master of the Rolls. He was not satisfied that the petition was really presented in good faith and not for a collateral purpose. He agreed that the appeal must be dismissed without costs.

LLEWELLYN V. VALE OF GLAMORGAN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railways—Construction—Interference with roads—Right to sue for penalties—Owner of half of road.

Section 54 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, is applicable to a case where part of the width of the road interfered with is owned by one person and part by another, and the first of such owners who sues and brings his action to trial can recover the penalty.

*Reported by E. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. G. EUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of Wright, J. (13 The Times L.R., 491, and [1897] 2 Q.B., 239), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright; reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 491; [1897] 2 Q.B., 239. The action was brought under section 54 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to recover £1,700 as penalties for 85 days for default on the part of the defendants in providing a road in substitution for another road which they temporarily obstructed. The plaintiff was the owner of land situated near Bridgend, in the county of Glamorgan, and bounded on one side by a road which was not a public highway, but was an occupation road used by the owners of the lands adjoining it. The plaintiff, therefore, was the owner of one-half of the road—usque ad medium flum. The defendants were, by a special Act incorporating the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, authorized to construct a railway crossing the road at a point adjoining the plaintiff's land, and in constructing their railway they temporarily interfered with the road, and rendered it impassable, without providing a substituted way as required by section 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845. The plaintiff contended that the defendants were liable to penalties under section 54 of that Act. By section 53, if it be found necessary to cross, cut through, raise, sink, or use any part of any road, either public or private, so as to render it impassable for or dangerous or extraordinarily inconvenient to persons entitled to the use thereof, the company shall, before commencing such operations, cause a sufficient road to be made instead of the road to be interfered with. By section 54, "If the company do not cause another sufficient road to be so made before they interfere with any such existing road as aforesaid, they shall forfeit £20 for every day during which such substituted road shall not be made after the existing road shall have been interrupted, and such penalty shall be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of such road, if a public road, and shall be applied for the purposes thereof, or, in case of a private road, the same shall be paid to the owner thereof, and every such penalty shall be recoverable with costs by action in any of the superior Courts." The defendants contended that the plaintiff, being the owner of one-half of the road, was not the "owner" of the road within the meaning of section 54, and could not sue for the penalties. By a compromise it was agreed that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, £150 should be the amount recoverable. Mr. Justice Wright held that the plaintiff could recover, and gave judgment for him. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Kenyon Parker appeared for the defendants; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. E. F. Buckley appeared for the plaintiff.

The Court, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read the judgment of the Court as follows:—This is an action to recover penalties from the defendants; a railway company, who in contravention of section 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, cut through and otherwise interfered with a private road without first causing a sufficient road to be made in substitution as required by that section. The plaintiffs are the owners of the soil of half the road up to the middle line in that part of the road which was wrongfully cut through and interfered with. Mr. Justice Wright gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount at which the parties agreed the penalties in the event of the plaintiffs being entitled to succeed. The only point raised by the defendants on the appeal was that the plaintiffs were not "the owner" of the private road within the meaning of section 54 of the Act. The contention was pushed to the extreme length of saying that "the owner" meant all the owners for the entire length and breadth of the road, and apparently without any defined limit in the direction of the road, and it was argued that no action could be sustained for the penalties unless all such owners joined in the action. This contention is extravagant; if accepted it would operate to defeat the obvious intentions of the Legislature in many, if not in most cases. If any one of a dozen or a hundred of such owners declined to join in suing, the railway company would escape the penalty. It was further contended for the appellants that if this argument failed, as we think it does, the owner of the soil in the other half of the road ought to have joined in this action, and that the plaintiffs, suing alone, cannot recover. At the outset it is plain that the owner of one half had not in 1845, nor has he now, any power to compel the owner of the other half to join in suing. The question turns on sections 53, 54, and 55 of the Act. It is not necessary to state in full the terms of section 53. There is nothing in that section or in the other parts of the Act to oust the jurisdiction of the Court to grant an injunction. Section 54 divides itself into two parts. The first imposes the penalty and runs thus:—"If the company do not cause another sufficient road to be so made before they interfere with any such existing road as aforesaid, they shall forfeit twenty pounds for every day during which such substituted road shall not be made after the existing road shall have been interrupted." This is plainly a penalty; it is not intended to be a sum payable by way of compensation for the wrong done to any particular person or to his soil or interest in the road. It is imposed by way of punishment on the railway company for their high-handed and illegal acts in violation of the provisions of section 53, and it is intended as a deterrent against the continuance of the illegal acts. There is another point. The penalty is £20 for every day during which the offence is committed. We think it is clear, on the language of the statute itself, and without having recourse to the principle on which the leading case of "Crepps v. Durden" (Cowp. 640) was decided, that one penalty, and one penalty only, is inflicted for every day. Mr. Justice Wright seems to have been inclined to think that more than one penalty of £20 for each day was recoverable. We are unable to accept that suggestion, but we entirely agree with him in the opinion that the penalty is not apportionable; it is one entire sum of £20. This has an important bearing on the second part of the section, and tends to support the plaintiffs' case. The second part runs thus:—"And such penalty shall be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of such road, if a public road, and shall be applied for the purposes thereof, or in case of a private road the same shall be paid to the owner thereof, and every such penalty shall be recoverable with costs by action in any of the superior Courts." Before commenting on this part of section 54, we will state shortly the effect of section 55:—"If any party entitled to a right of way over any road so interfered with" suffers special damage by reason of the failure to substitute a sufficient road, he may recover the special damage by action, and that

"whether any party shall have sued for such penalty as aforesaid or not, and without prejudice to the right of any party to sue for the same." Damages recoverable under this section are by way of compensation to the person whose right of way is interfered with and who can prove special damage; these damages are wholly distinct from the penalty, and are recoverable whether the penalty has been sued for or not. There may be a question whether the right of way spoken of in this section is a right of way in the strict legal sense of the term, or a right of passing over the road in the more popular meaning of the words. It is not necessary to express any opinion on this point, and we refrain from so doing. If the term is used in the strict sense, the owner of the soil of one half of the road could not recover the special damage in respect of his own half of the soil of the road, because a man has no right of way over his own land; but he could in a case like the present recover his special damage for obstructions of the right of way which he is entitled to over the other half of the soil of the road, and the owner of that half would be in a corresponding position. If, on the other hand, the expression "right of way" is used in the popular sense, then each owner could recover the special damage proved in respect of the entire breadth of the road. Practically there would be little, if any, difference between the amount of the special damage recoverable whichever view be taken of the meaning of the term "right of way." These considerations appear to us to remove in great measure the difficulty which Mr. Justice Wright felt in the supposed case of the railway company breaking up or stopping up a mile of road each hundred yards of which is owned by a different person. Section 55 applies to a public road and a private road without distinction, and all persons, whether landowners or not, who are entitled to a right of way or of passing over the road (whichever be the right expression) can recover the amount of the special damage sustained, whether the road be public or private, and quite irrespectively of the penalty. We revert to the second part of section 54. Under the older system of legislation the enforcement of the penalty would probably have been left to the common informer in a qui tam action; and had such been the case, the informer who first instituted proceedings or obtained judgment would have received the fruits of his diligence to the exclusion of all others. But here the common informer is excluded by the language used. The enactment is that the penalty shall be paid. Then a distinction is drawn between a public road and a private road. In the case of a public road the penalty is to be paid to the trustees, commissioners, surveyor, or other person having the management of the road. Exactly the same point as is raised on this appeal might arise with respect to a public road. The management of the road, conceivably, might be vested in one body up to the middle of the road on one side and in a different body up to the middle on the other side. It was stated at the Bar that such cases do in fact exist. In the case of a private road the enactment is that the penalty shall be paid "to the owner thereof," and the section concludes by making the penalties recoverable in both cases by action. Now we think that the word "thereof" relates exclusively to that particular portion of the road which is crossed, cut through, or otherwise unlawfully interfered with by the company in violation of section 53. The appellants' counsel referred to the interpretation clause (section 3) as to words importing the singular number including the plural, which is in the usual form, and argued that "the owner" meant all the owners of the part affected. They did not refer to the same clause as to the interpretation of the term "owner," because they admitted (and rightly) that the plaintiffs were owners of the soil of half the road within the Act. Where an Act is open to two constructions, that construction ought to be adopted which is the more reasonable and the better calculated to give effect to the expressed intention, which, in this case, is that the penalty shall be paid. The result of adopting the appellants' contention would be in many cases to enable the company to escape the penalty by placing practical difficulties in the way of its recovery. As already pointed out, the owner of one-half of the soil of the road cannot compel the owner or owners of the other half to join in suing; he or they may decline to do so without assigning any reason; they may be numerous, or under some incapacity, as infancy, lunacy, or the like, or they may be interested in the company. The conclusion at which we arrive is that the Act ought so to be read as to afford facilities for suing; that the owner of the soil of part of that portion of the road interfered with can sustain an action for the penalty; and that, in analogy to the case of the common informer, the first of such owners who sues and brings his action to trial can recover. We further hold that the plaintiffs can retain the penalty for their own use, and that the defendants are not liable to more than one penalty of £20 for each day during which their wrongful acts are continued. For these reasons we think the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

IN RE DE NICOLS—DE NICOLS v. CUELIER.*

International Law—Husband and wife—French law as to community of goods—Change of domicile—Will.

A Frenchman and a Frenchwoman having married in France without entering into any contract altering the French law as to community of goods between husband and wife subsequently acquired a domicile in this country, the husband taking out letters of naturalization as a British subject.

Held, that "movable goods" such as money and securities acquired by the husband during his domicile here are not affected by his will made here according to English law so as to deprive his widow of the rights originally vested in her by the French law at her marriage.

This case raised a curious and interesting question of international law—namely, whether, where a Frenchman and a Frenchwoman, having married in France without entering into any marriage contract altering the French law as to the community of goods as between husband and wife, subsequently come over to this country and acquire a domicile here, "movable goods," such as money and securities, acquired by the husband during his domicile here can be affected by his will made here according to the English law, so as to deprive his widow of the rights originally vested in her by the French law at the date of her marriage. It was stated that though there were dicta by Judges and text writers on the subject, the point had not previously come before the Court for actual decision. The question now arose in consequence of the death of a testator—Mr. Daniel Nicolas de Nicols, the late proprietor of the Café Royal, Regent-street. The story of the case was a curious and romantic one. In the year 1854 Mr. de Nicols was a man of no means, earning his living as a coachmaker in Paris, at wages. On May 30 in that year he married his first cousin (both being of age), the ceremony being performed at the mayor's office of the Third District of Paris, and the marriage was duly registered at the Prefecture of the Department of the Seine. It appeared, however, that the register was destroyed by fire by the Commune at the close of the Franco-German War. No contract of marriage was executed on the marriage, but in accordance with French law and custom the municipal officer who performed the ceremony formally called upon the parties to declare whether they had executed any contract of marriage, to which they both replied in the negative, when their answers were duly recorded on the usual "Minute." The husband had at the time of the marriage no property whatever of his own, but the wife was possessed of a small piece of land at Vachy, in France, which was the birthplace of both of them, a sum of 1,000*fr.*, or about £40, in cash given to her as a dote by her parents, and a sum of between 1,500*fr.* and 1,800*fr.*, or between £60 and £64, representing savings by her as an assistant in a linen business. Soon after the marriage the husband and wife sold the piece of land for 500*fr.*, or about £20, and became managers of a wine and spirit business in Paris, which in a year's time they purchased from the proprietor for 6,000*fr.*, made up of the proceeds of the wife's piece of land, her dote and savings, and the joint earnings realized by her husband and herself in carrying on the business. In December, 1862, they sold that business for 14,500*fr.*, or about £580. In October, 1863, Mr. and Mrs. de Nicols came over to England, and with a sum of about £400, which represented their sole property, set up a small café, called the Café Royal, in Glasshouse-street, Regent-street, and under their skilful management this café expanded into the large and well-known café of that name in Regent-street. In 1865 he took out letters of naturalization as a British subject, and he and his wife remained in this country until his death, she actively assisting him in the management of the café. Out of that business and from an interest in the property upon which the Empire Theatre now stands Mr. de Nicols amassed a fortune of about £600,000. On February 28, 1897, he died, having made a will dated March 22, 1895, in the English form, in which he described himself as "of the Café Royal, No. 68, Regent-street, in the county of Middlesex, and Regent-house, Surbiton, in the county of Surrey, restaurant proprietor," and proceeded, "I hereby declare that I am a domiciled Englishman naturalized in England in the year 1865." Then, after appointing three persons his executors and trustees, and bequeathing various legacies, he gave his residuary real and personal estate to them in trust for sale and to hold the proceeds on trust for his wife for life and after her death upon trusts for his daughter, her husband, and children. He died possessed of considerable freehold and leasehold property besides investments in numerous stocks and shares. It was said that he had also £100,000 worth of wine in France. The only issue of the marriage was one child, a daughter. This was an originating summons taken out by Madame de Nicols, the widow, against the executors and trustees of the will and the daughter, to ascertain (amongst other things) what were the rights and interests of the plaintiff in the real and personal estate of the testator by reason of her marriage with him without any marriage settlement or contract, the parties being then domiciled in France. Subsequently the question for decision was formulated in Chambers as follows:—"Did the change of domicile alter the legal position of the parties to the marriage in reference to property?" And the summons was adjourned into Court for argument on this question. Upon the summons being opened it was arranged that the argument should be confined to the effect of the change of domicile on the testator's "movable goods" only. The contention on the part of the plaintiff was that the "communauté légale de biens" was never dissolved during the joint lives of herself and her husband, and that such "communauté" regulated the property and interests of herself and her husband as from the date of the marriage up to the determination of the "communauté" by his death, and that she was entitled under it to one moiety of all property in the possession of her husband or of him and herself jointly at the time of his death, notwithstanding his will. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the defendant, the child of the marriage, that the rights of the parties were governed by the law of their changed domicile.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. E. J. Elgood, and Mr. Maugham for the defendants, the executors and trustees; and Mr. A. V. Dicey, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney for the defendant, the daughter.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said the only question he was now called on to decide was whether, with regard to the property conveniently described as "movable goods"—though the expression was not so familiar to the English law as to the writers of books on international law—of which this testator was at his death in the ostensible possession, his widow was entitled to some interest in it by virtue of French law applicable to his property at the date of the marriage, and continuing during the rest of their joint lives. It was admitted on both sides that there was no decision on the question, that is to say, no decision of a Court of competent jurisdiction in England, by which this question had been determined. There were dicta of Judges, but beyond a dictum of Lord Eldon's, the meaning of which was not quite clear, there were none which touched the point he had now to decide. There were plenty of dicta in the text-books, some of which, so far as they went, seemed to be in favour of the plaintiff; and, so far as a consensus of opinion could be gathered from them, it was not adverse to the plaintiff's claim in the present case. The result was that he must decide the case on principle. It might be that the principle which occurred to him as governing the case might not be the right one. If so, no doubt he would be corrected. But if one got hold of a principle governing the case, the only course was to follow that principle right through to its conclusion and apply it to the facts before the Court. The principle upon which he should base his decision was this. These spouses were French people and they intermarried in France. It was open to them to marry according to one or more regulations affecting matrimonial property—property which they might acquire during coverture. They had some choice in the matter. They might have elected to marry according to the rule as to community of goods, a rule that was applicable to their proprietary rights in the absence of any express election to the contrary; and that was, so far as was known, what took place. It might be that there was something more, because it had been mentioned that in the fire which followed the Franco-German war many documents in Paris were destroyed; and it might be that there was some evidence of a contract between the parties. But, so far as it appeared, they did marry according to the law of France so as to settle the property they then had according to the law applicable to community of goods. In his Lordship's opinion, that was a contract entered into by them, a contract which this Court did not regard as the less effectual to include property after acquired because it was not at that time so expressed and was not in the contemplation of the parties. The contract was as effectual as regarded property after acquired as property contemplated at the time; and, if so, that contract was thenceforward binding upon property whether in possession or after acquired, even though neither party contemplated a change of domicile. There was no reason why it should be inferred that the contract did not include property after acquired as well as property existing at the date of the marriage. If the principle he had endeavoured to expound was right, the contract must be held to have related not only to property which the parties had at the time of the marriage, but also to property which they might thereafter acquire. That was the principle which, in his opinion, he ought to apply. These spouses lived here, became domiciled here, and to all intents and purposes they were an Englishman and an Englishwoman. No doubt they must look at the domicile to see what were the rights under this will and to ascertain the rights of the parties among themselves—that is, the husband, wife, and child. But they must look back to the matrimonial domicile and see what the rights were then. They must not apply the domicile doctrine to the moment of death only, by regarding the then domicile of the husband. The domicile at the death did not govern rights of his which did not exist. He did not affect to dispose of property which was not his; and to see what was his property and what was not they must look back and see what was the law that governed his proprietary rights. Those rights were, it appeared to his Lordship, fixed at the time of the marriage—that is, they were governed by the law as to the community of goods, both with regard to property the parties or either of them had at that time and to property that might be after acquired. His Lordship saw nothing to alter that contract, and there was, in his opinion, no principle requiring him to say that by a change of domicile at any time subsequently there was any surrender by the wife of that to which she was entitled under the matrimonial contract; and therefore he must hold that the husband by his will disposed only of such property as was properly his, and that it did not include what was the wife's property under the matrimonial contract—that is, her right under the law of community of goods. Therefore he would make a declaration that the plaintiff's right under that law to movable property acquired during the coverture by husband and wife, or either of them, was not affected by this will. But this decision was without prejudice to any question as to the rest of the property of the testator, and therefore the rest of the summons must stand over.

J. LYONS AND SONS V. WILKINS.*

Trade Union—Strike—Picketing—"Watching and besetting"—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, secs. 3 and 7.

This action was tried last sittings, when his Lordship reserved his judgment. Since the trial, the House of Lords has delivered its judgment in the case of "Allen

v. Flood," which is reported ante, p. 125, and [1898] A.C. 1. The Amalgamated Trade Society of Fancy Leather Workers (who are registered under the Trade Unions Act, 1871) were at one time joined as defendants to the action, but during the trial their names were struck out. As regards Messrs. A. Thompson, J. Laverick, and F. Goodhall, the trustees of the society, the pleadings were directed to be amended by stating that these defendants were sued in their representative capacity. Mr. P. C. Wilkins, another defendant, was the secretary of the society, and C. Clarke was one of its executive officers. The action was commenced in consequence of what took place in connexion with a strike in 1896 of the workmen employed by the plaintiffs, who were leather bag and portmanteau manufacturers carrying on business in Redcross-street, London, E.C. The other material facts are stated in his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Ward Coldridge were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE gave judgment as follows:—In this case, the plaintiffs have obtained an injunction until judgment to restrain the defendants Wilkins and Clarke, their servants or agents, from watching or besetting the plaintiffs' works for the purpose of persuading, or otherwise preventing, persons from working for them, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information; and also from preventing Adolph Schoenthal or other persons from working for the plaintiffs by withdrawing his or their workmen or workwomen from their employment respectively. By a slip, the order as drawn up has been made more extensive, but the terms I have mentioned are the true terms of the order pronounced by the Court of Appeal, as appears by the judgment of Lord Justice Kay (12 The Times L.R., 278, and [1896] 1 Ch., 811, 832). In substance, at the trial the plaintiffs have clearly proved the case made upon the motion as to watching and besetting the plaintiffs' premises illegally, and in my judgment they are entitled to have the injunction made perpetual, so far as the first part of the injunction is concerned, for the reasons given by the Court of Appeal upon disposing of the motion; and I do not consider it necessary to add anything upon the law bearing upon this part of the case. I consider that it is clearly proved that the defendants Wilkins, Clarke, and Thompson watched and beset the plaintiffs' works, or place of business, and the approaches thereto for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing persons from working for the plaintiffs, and for purposes other than that of merely obtaining or communicating information. In reference to the second part of the injunction, I think the case made upon the motion is fully proved, and I think also that it has been clearly shown that the same defendants illegally watched and beset the premises of Schoenthal for the purpose of preventing him from working for the plaintiffs, but I think it probable that the Court of Appeal would have framed the second part of the injunction granted in a different manner had the case of "Allen v. Flood" then been decided by the House of Lords. At any rate, the point has not been specifically argued whether or not, apart from the question of malice, it was unlawful to call out the workmen of Schoenthal in order to prevent him from working for the plaintiffs. Had the matter been one of importance in the present case, I should probably have required further argument, but the strike is long since over, and I have assumed that the parties would prefer not being put to the trouble and expense of a re-argument upon this point. I propose, therefore, to grant a perpetual injunction following the terms of the first part of the order of the Court of Appeal, but to frame the latter part of the injunction as follows, "and also from watching or besetting the premises of Adolph Schoenthal for the purpose of persuading or otherwise preventing him from working for the plaintiffs, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information." The injunction must extend to the defendant Thompson, who participated in the wrongful acts committed. The acts in question being unlawful, the other defendants, if they conspired to induce the commission of such acts, are equally liable to an injunction, and by their amended defence all the defendants make common cause and accept common responsibility in respect of the matters I have referred to, as well as in respect of the alleged libels, which still remain to be dealt with. And, indeed, it is difficult to see how, as officers of the society under an obligation to attend all meetings of the executive council, under whose directions the defendant Wilkins acted, and with power to express their opinions, they could well do otherwise, whatever the domestic constitution of the society they belong to may provide as to their voting powers. The plaintiffs further ask for an injunction to restrain the defendants from maliciously inducing or conspiring to induce persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiffs, and I postponed judgment at the request of both parties until after the decision of the House of Lords in "Allen v. Flood" should be given. The effect of that decision, which has now been delivered, is, in my opinion, to show that the plaintiffs are not entitled to this injunction. It was conceded by the plaintiffs that they could not succeed unless they could show malice; and it is the law, as finally determined by the House of Lords, that the existence of a malicious motive cannot in such a case as this render unlawful an act or acts otherwise lawful. Another injunction was asked for by an amendment made by leave at the trial against the defendants Thompson, Laverick, and Goodhall, as trustees of the society, from applying the funds of the society in furtherance of the wrongful acts complained of. I am of opinion that there is no legal ground to justify such an injunction, and I refuse it, and disallow the plaintiffs the costs of the amendment made in pursuance of such leave. I now come to a part of the case which has not been dealt with upon motion—viz., the question whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction or to damages in respect of certain alleged libels. These are contained in two letters, the first being dated January 11, 1896, written by the defendant Wilkins, as secretary of the society, to Mr. J. Thorne. The plaintiffs had at that date and still have in their employment a youth named John Joseph Thorne. The letter was meant for him, but, being addressed to Mr. J. Thorne, was received by his father. The other alleged libel is contained in a letter addressed to Mr. Rudge, the father of another youth, named Thomas Rudge, then and still in the employment of the plaintiffs. The father was, in fact, dead, and the letter was consequently received by Thomas Rudge himself. I think that those letters contain statements which are distinctly calculated to injure the plaintiffs in their trade, and to hold them up to hatred and contempt in the eyes, not only of workmen and of fair employers of labour, but also of customers and persons who might intend to become customers. It appears to me that the letter to Thorne means that he is being grossly underpaid, receiving less than half the wages which men in other firms are receiving for the work he is doing, and that the plaintiffs endeavour to get their labour for a "starvation wage." Some argument was addressed to me as to the true interpretation to be put upon the expression "starvation wage." Whatever else it means, and whatever it does not mean, I am satisfied that, as used in the letter, it does mean a rate of wages unfair, unusual, and such as a decent employer of labour would not pay. The letter to Rudge, I think, means that Thomas Rudge was being grossly underpaid by the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs impose unfair conditions of labour on their workpeople. The defendants all join in the plea that the statements in both the letters are true in substance and in fact. In my view, the evidence proves generally that the rate of wages received by the persons employed to do the work required by the plaintiffs was fair and usual. On the part of the defendants there was really no substantial evidence of underpayment at all, and one of their witnesses, Arthur Davies, seems upon his own showing to have been sufficiently and properly paid, actually receiving less at the first places he went to after leaving the plaintiffs than he had received while with them. He has since improved and now earns more, but when he went to the plaintiffs he was a lad of from 13 to 14 years of age, working in a bag shop for the first time, and while with them he says he was only a beginner and improved very little. A. J. Roberts does appear to have got a substantial rise in wages when he left the plaintiffs and took a fresh employment, and he says he did "pretty well the same work as at Lyons's," but no details were given, and I do not think that the mere fact of his getting the rise is sufficient to enable me to say that he was underpaid by Lyons and Co. It appears that the plaintiffs do not pay their workpeople in the bag department directly, but that they employ a foreman, D. Murphy, to whom they pay so much per dozen or per gross for bags, he engaging and paying the hands, some of whom are employed at piecework and others at weekly wages. The plaintiffs find the business premises and pay establishment expenses. Opinions may differ, and fairly differ, according to the point of view, whether or not this is a method best calculated to regulate fairly the relations between employers and employed, but it is perfectly lawful, and if the hands are fairly paid it affords no justification for the statements made in respect of the plaintiffs. As to the particular cases of Thorne and Rudge, I have heard their evidence, and I do not consider that there is any justification for the suggestion that they were grossly or at all underpaid. Rudge was an improver, learning his business, and about 18 years old, and Thorne was a lad of about 17. The work they were doing was lad's work and not men's work, and they never complained. Rudge did get a rise of wages in January, 1896, from 12s. to 15s. a week, about the time of the commencement of the strike, but that was given to him when he asked for it, and it is in accordance with the practice to raise the boys' and improvers' wages as they learn to do their work better. He says that when he got the letter he showed it to some friends, and decided to remain at work, being then satisfied with his wages. Having regard to the facts that the libels were not repeated, that they were contained in letters which did not remain long in the hands of the recipients, and that the recipients were not induced by them to leave their employment, I think that justice will be satisfied if I award £5 damages in respect of the libels, which I accordingly do. The strike being long since over, I understand that the plaintiffs do not care actually to take an injunction. The defendants must pay the costs of the action except those I have mentioned, but they are entitled to be paid the costs of the motion to strike out the name of the society as defendants, and there must be the usual set-off. His Lordship also dealt with a question as to the costs of certain particulars. The defendants intimated that they would probably appeal, but not on the finding as to libel.

RE HOGG—EX PARTE PARKIN.*

Friendly Society—Dispute—Arbitration clause—
Friendly Societies Act, 1896, sec. 68—Jurisdiction—Writ of prohibition to County Court granted.

This was an application by John James Parkin, the secretary of the Pride of the Valley Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters Friendly Society, for a prohibition in an action in the County Court of Derbyshire, held at Alfreton, in which James Hogg was the plaintiff and the applicant was the defendant.

Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the applicant; and Mr. Scarlett for Hogg.

The question in the case was whether the County Court had jurisdiction to hear an action brought by James Hogg, who was a member of the Pride of the Valley Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters, against the secretary of the order, claiming certain sick pay alleged to be due, having regard to the provisions of section 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 25). Section 68 provides "Every dispute between (a) a member . . . and the society or branch or an officer thereof . . . shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society or branch . . ." and subsection 6 provides "Where the rules contain no direction as to disputes, or where no decision is made on a dispute within 40 days after application to the society or branch for a reference under its rules, the member or person aggrieved may apply either to the County Court or to a Court of summary jurisdiction, and the Court to which application is made may hear and determine the matter in dispute; but in the case of a society with branches the said 40 days shall not begin to run until application has been made in succession to all the bodies entitled to determine the dispute under the rules of the society or branch, so however that no rule shall require a greater delay than three months between each successive determination." By the general laws of the order, and by the rules of the court to which Hogg belonged, it was provided that all matters of dispute under the rules of the court should be referred to the arbitration committee of the court, subject to an appeal to the district arbitration committee and to a final appeal to a committee elected by all the districts of the order. In the year 1894 Hogg became entitled to sick pay under the rules of the court. He was paid 6s. per week, but he claimed to be entitled to 8s. per week. In August, 1895, he brought an action in the County Court against the secretary of the Court, claiming £3 2s., the balance alleged to be due from June 4, 1894, to December 29, 1894. This action was dismissed by the County Court Judge, with costs, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to try it. In the meantime, in December, 1894, the court passed a resolution fixing Hogg's rate of sick pay at 3s. per week for life. On March 21, 1896, Hogg was suspended for refusing to pay the costs of the action brought in the County Court in August, 1895. On July 23, 1896, Hogg wrote to the Arbitration Committee of the Fritchley Lodge of Foresters as follows:—"I apply to the Arbitration Committee of the Fritchley Lodge of Foresters for an arbitration under the rules of the lodge into my claims as under. (1) A claim by me for sick pay according to the rules from June 4 to December 29, 1894, amounting to £2 2s.; (2) a claim by me for sick pay at 3s. per week deducted or unpaid by you through non-payment by me of an illegal demand for law costs in a case undecided at the time such demand was made." No decision upon this application was ever communicated to Hogg. On November 3, 1897, Hogg brought an action in the County Court against the applicant in the present case claiming £12 12s., being sick pay at the rate of 8s. a week from March 21, 1896, to October 30, 1897. The applicant objected to the jurisdiction, but was overruled, and judgment was recovered by Hogg.

Mr. LUSH, on behalf of the applicant, contended that, there being a dispute under the rules, the County Court had no jurisdiction. He cited "Bache v. Billingham" ([1894], 1 Q.B., 107).

Mr. SCARLETT contended that there was no dispute, the only question before the County Court Judge being whether an action could be brought or not—"Palliser v. Dale" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 257). The applicant was estopped from asserting that Hogg was still a member of the order, for the order purported to expel him—"Willis v. Wells" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 225), "Prentice v. London" (L. R., 10 C. P., 679). The writ of prohibition was a discretionary writ, and the applicant, applying as he did after judgment, was too late—"Broad v. Perkins" ([21 Q. B. D., 533).

His LORDSHIP granted the writ. He said that he did so reluctantly. Hogg did put before the arbitration committee a proper claim for the 3s. per week in his letter of July 23, 1896, and it was doubtful whether that claim had ever been properly adjudicated on; but he did not exhaust his remedies. When the proper time had elapsed he was bound to appeal to the district committee and so on through successive stages. He did not satisfy the County Court Judge that he had done this. Facts were in dispute between the parties, and where that was the case arbitration was necessary. The County Court Judge, therefore, had no jurisdiction, because he could not have found the facts necessary to enable the plaintiff in this action to recover. Mr. Scarlett said that the applicant was estopped from treating Hogg as a member. It was Hogg who was estopped from denying his membership, seeing that his claim depended on his retaining that capacity. His Lordship doubted whether the writ of prohibition was discretionary, except where it was applied for by a stranger to the proceedings or where the conduct of the party was so improper as to disentitle him to the remedy. If, for instance, the party fought the action out on the merits in the Court below, this Court would be slow to grant the writ, but where, as in this case, the applicant only went to the Court in order to object to the jurisdiction he has pursued just the right course to entitle him to the writ. As to the application being too late, it must be recollected that there were no pleadings and that the proceedings were not terminated, for though judgment was recovered there was still something left to be done. There would be no order for costs.

Mr. LUSH stated, on behalf of the order, that they had no wish to stifle this claim, but the order desired to establish its claim to settle disputes among its members. This member's claim would be considered by the society.

Patent—Validity—Want of invention—Method of cutting necktie linings with a band knife.

that there was not sufficient invention to justify this patent.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer. The action was brought for an injunction to restrain an alleged infringement of a patent (No. 18,694 of 1891) for an improved method of cutting necktie linings with a band knife. By the complete specification the plaintiff alleged that on account of the peculiar material employed, which was a soft, spongy sort of cloth called "swansdown," it had not hitherto been found practicable to cut out a large number of these linings by a machine knife except in shapes which had straight or parallel edges devoid of curves or recesses, and he claimed for his process that any pattern, whether straight or curved or recessed, or partly straight and partly recessed or curved, could be rapidly cut in piles of 36 to 72 thicknesses deep. The plaintiff then gave a detailed description of his invention, which consisted of a series of templates placed in couples on the cloth before it was cut—one beneath the cloth and the other above, the upper one being directly over the other, and each couple being clamped at the ends. These templates were wider at one end than the other, and they were so arranged that the wide end of one would be next the narrow end of the adjoining one, the object of this arrangement being to cut the cloth to the greatest advantage. The templates were described as being formed by preference of thin metal plates with wood backing. In conclusion, the plaintiff declared his claim to be for the method of cutting at one operation a large number of necktie linings by means of a revolving band knife, the material being clamped firmly between two templates of identical form as therein described and set forth. The infringement was admitted, but the defendant impeached the validity of the patent. Mr. Justice Romer declared the patent void for want of invention. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., and Mr. E. Ford were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter were for the defendant.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS dissenting.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS said that the objection taken to this patent was that it was bad for want of subject matter, or, in other words, that there was no sufficient invention in it having regard to the state of public knowledge. Of all questions under the patent law that was the most difficult to decide. Stated in another way the question was whether, if the Court allowed this patent to prevail, it would amount to a public nuisance—whether it would be an intolerable burden to impose upon the public. His Lordship agreed with Mr. Justice Romer in thinking that it would. What was the problem to be solved? The patentee wanted to cut out a large number of linings for neckties with a band knife. Band knives were not new, and they had been used to cut materials more or less soft. Now, it was obvious that soft materials required to be stiffened before they could be cut, but there were several modes of stiffening which were as old as the hills. The common method was to clamp them up. That was done in many trades, and particularly in the book-binding trade. There was no novelty in the idea of stiffening soft materials by pressing them together between hard materials. Stiffening was necessary in order to make the pile of cloth sufficiently rigid to enable the knife to operate upon it. Then, as to the particular method employed in this case, the patentee wanted to cut out linings of a certain shape, and accordingly he had templates made of the required pattern and pressed the cloth between two templates, which were clamped together. It was said that this was new because the templates were screwed up in such a way that they could be placed against the band knife by the hand without the clamps getting in the way. In his Lordship's opinion any one whose mind was addressed to the problem to be solved would have solved it in the same way as the plaintiff had done, and could have solved it in no other way. There was, therefore, no sufficient invention to justify this patent. The appeal should, therefore, be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed. A certain plausibility was given to the patent by confining it to neckties; but a patent could not be made good by applying it to one particular article, unless it was equally good for other articles of a similar description. His Lordship understood the claim to be for the use of a band knife in combination with a new machine, that machine consisting of two templates of the exact outline of the thing to be cut out and clamped together. But that was not a new machine in the sense that nobody could be allowed to make it, and it was not contended that anybody could be prevented from using a hand knife with that machine. Then what was the combination? It was a combination of a new thing which anybody might make with an old thing which anybody might make, and, there being no invention in the application of the one to the other, there was no subject-matter for a patent. It amounted to nothing more than this—the use of a band knife where a hand knife might have been used.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS differed. The object of this invention was to enable the band knife to be applied to the linings of neckties made of this flimsy material known as "swansdown," but in his Lordship's opinion it applied to all flimsy materials of this sort, whether converted into linings of neckties or otherwise. That had never been done before, and the utility of the invention was not disputed. In his Lordship's opinion the reason why the use of the band knife for this purpose was not previously known to the trade was not because people did not choose to use it, but because of the difficulties attending its use by reason of the clamps interfering with the cutting. There was no evidence of templates having been coupled together before. The result of this invention was that the templates, being themselves used as the clamps, served the purpose of a guide—not a guide to the eye merely, but a physical guide to the hand, the edge of the template being placed against the band knife. In his Lordship's opinion this invention taught people for the first time how to apply the band knife to consolidated layers of flimsy material, and that invention was sufficiently indicated in the specification. He thought that there was in this enough ingenuity to entitle the inventor to maintain his patent.

MOLYNEUX V. FLETCHER AND CLARK.*

Trust—Trustee—Duties and liabilities—Breach of trust—Advancement clause in will—Moneys advanced to cestui que trust.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was tried before Mr. Justice Kennedy at the last summer assizes at Liverpool, and was then adjourned by his Lordship to London for further argument. The facts fully appear from the judgment.

Mr. W. F. Taylor, Q.C., and Mr. MacConkey appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. McCall, Q.C., Mr.

Rotch, and Mr. H. Cunningham for the defendant Fletcher; Mr. Pickford, Q.C., Mr. Segar, and Mr. Cleave for the defendant Clark.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said,—This action was brought by certain infants (by their next friend) against two gentlemen, and it was claimed that the defendant Fletcher, acting as trustee under the will of Edward Durant, the plaintiffs' grandfather, had committed breaches of trust. By the terms of Edward Durant's will, which was dated April 18, 1878, the testator appointed executors and trustees, and devised to them all his real and personal estate, with certain directions as to realization and investment, and made his children the beneficiaries under his will. The testator left two children surviving him, who were infants at the date of his death, on April 20, 1878. The two children were Fanny Jane, who came of age in 1880 and is still living and unmarried, and Amelia Margaretta, who came of age in 1881, and in 1885 married Daniel Webster Molyneux. Both she and her husband are still living, and the plaintiffs, six in number, are the children of this marriage. Neither Miss Durant nor Mrs. Molyneux are parties to this action. The defendant Fletcher was appointed a trustee of the will by order of the Court in 1887. The other defendant, Clark, became a trustee only quite recently, and long after all the events in respect of which the claim in this action is made had taken place. It is alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs that in 1887 the defendant Fletcher and his then co-trustee, Thomas Urmoston Clare, committed a breach of trust in advancing out of the capital funds £500 to Miss Durant and £250 to Mrs. Molyneux, and the question I have to determine in this action is whether in either or both of those cases a breach of trust has been committed. The will contained a direction to the trustees to apply in or towards the maintenance and education or otherwise for the benefit of each child of the testator entitled under the trusts of the will to a share, not absolutely vested, the annual income of such share. The will further declared that it should be lawful for the trustees to apply in or towards the advancement in life of each child a sum not exceeding £500 of her presumptive share, such sum or lesser sum to be paid if the trustees should think fit, notwithstanding that the child's share was settled as thereafter mentioned, and the trustees were to be the sole judges of the advisability of such payment and of what the term "advancement in life" might signify. Subject to that power, the trustees were, after the shares became vested, by the children coming of age, to pay the income to the two children in equal shares, and after their death upon trust for such of their children as they should appoint, and in default upon the same trusts for the children. If the daughters had no children, then their shares were to go as they might appoint, and in default of appointment to their next-of-kin. The claim in this action was put upon the ground that the moneys paid by Fletcher in 1887 were not paid with the single view of "advancement," but with the view of the money being used for the benefit of Fletcher himself; Fletcher was a large creditor of Mrs. Molyneux's husband, and was pressing for payment, and it was said that, though the money was nominally advanced under the power in the will, it was in reality advanced with the well-understood purpose that it should pass into the hands of Mr. Molyneux to be used by him in reduction of his debt to Fletcher. In the first place, I think it right to say that upon the construction which I put upon this will there was no power to make any advance at that time at all. It is clear on the authorities that where a power is given to trustees to apply capital money for the advancement in life of a child that power is to be construed according to a well-understood meaning. Undoubtedly instances occur in reported cases where it was intended that the advance might be made at any time in the life of the beneficiary and not within some strictly limited period. Where there is such intention apt words, such as "or otherwise benefit," are always used to express it. In "In re Kershaw's Trusts" (6 Eq., 322), Vice-Chancellor Malins held that where there was a power at any period of the daughter's life to apply a portion of the trust fund for her advancement or otherwise for her benefit (which the Vice-Chancellor described as a very large power) an advance might be made to the husband to set him up in trade. And again, in "Lowther v. Bentinck" (19 Eq., 166), the judgment of Sir George Jessel shows that the word "advancement," where used without some larger words, has a more restricted and narrower meaning. Now, in this case the words are not only "advancement in life," but there is a further provision that the money is to be a sum not exceeding £500 of the "presumptive share." That means I think that the advancement is to be limited to the time when the share is presumptive and not vested, and I am fortified in that view by the statement in "Davidson on Conveyancing," 2nd edition, vol. 3, p. 555, where in dealing with the cognate subject of settlements it is pointed out that the power of advancement should be extended to vested as well as presumptive shares. I further think that in spite of the very large powers of discretion given by this will to the trustees to determine what is "advancement in life," it is doubtful whether in this case an advance of money for use by the husband in his business (quite apart from the question of the benefit to Fletcher) can be justified under the terms of the will, the fund being for the daughter's separate use without power of anticipation. In "Talbot v. Marshfield" (3 Ch. App., 622) Lord Hatherley, then Lord Justice Fagge Wood, held that where a share was advanced to set up a married daughter in business for her separate use that was a good execution. But that case clearly shows where the line must be drawn, for Lord Hatherley points out that the fund was settled to the daughter's separate use (as is the case here), and that, therefore, an advance for the purpose of paying the husband's debts was not justifiable. On the facts of this case I feel bound to come to the conclusion that, although the money was paid on the formal request of Mrs. Molyneux and her sister, it was perfectly well understood by Fletcher that the money was to be used in the husband's business for the payment of his debt to Fletcher. I am of opinion that that was not a proper or justifiable exercise of this power of advancement. See "Duke of Portland v. Topham" (11 H. L. C., 32), and "Humphrey v. Oliver" (28 L. J., Ch., 406). In justice to Fletcher I must add that I have no doubt he believed that whatever the husband did was done with the full consent of the two ladies. The result is that Fletcher must repay the £250 advanced to Mrs. Molyneux; but I make the order without prejudice to any proceedings for an indemnity which Fletcher may take against Mrs. Molyneux, she being a tenant for life assenting to a breach of trust. With regard to the £500 advanced out of Miss Durant's share I cannot give the plaintiffs any relief, because their interest depends only on the possibility of Miss Durant dying unmarried and without exercising her power of appointment or intestate and the plaintiffs being her next-of-kin. See "Clowes v. Hilliard" (4 Ch. D., 413), and "Stockley v. Parsons" (45 Ch. D., 51). The defendant Clark had no part in the breach of trust, but he has put in a defence in this action siding with Fletcher and pleading that there was no breach of trust. Under these circumstances I cannot give him costs, but I do not give costs against him. I give directions for a reference to the Registrar for the appointment of new trustees.

REG. V. CHARLES ROSE.*

Criminal Law—Evidence—Confession of prisoner —Admissibility—Inducement.

This was a case stated by the Quarter Sessions for Norfolk raising a question as to the circumstances under which a confession of guilt by a prisoner to a prosecutor may or may not be admissible in evidence against him.

Mr. Wild appeared for the prisoner; the Crown was not represented.

On January 12, 1898, the prisoner, Charles Rose, was indicted on a charge of stealing from his master, a farmer named Corney, certain corn, chaff, sheep, poultry, and grass seeds. He was found guilty, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment. The evidence showed that on November 16 the prosecutor, in the presence of a police-constable, asked the prisoner how he accounted for the number of sheep on the farm not being so large as it should be, and the prisoner in answer admitted that he had sent a fat lamb and a live ewe to a butcher, who had given him money for them. The prosecutor then asked about the corn, and the prisoner confessed to stealing some, but under circumstances hereafter set out in the judgment, which prevented the confession being admissible.

Mr. Wild read the case.

Mr. JUSTICE MATHEW then asked whether the prisoner was out on bail or in prison.

Mr. Wild said that bail had been refused. He had asked for it, and was told to apply to a Judge in Chambers, which the prisoner could not afford to do. Moreover, the prisoner had been in prison since November 17.

Mr. JUSTICE MATHEW said it was unreasonable that bail was not given. It was in vain that Judges laid down time after time at assizes and elsewhere that justices should take bail whenever it was practicable.

The COURT, after a short consultation and without calling on Mr. Wild to argue, quashed the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said,—The conviction could not stand. These were the facts; the prisoner, who was in the employ of a farmer in a more or less confidential capacity, was charged at the Norfolk Quarter Sessions, on January 12, with stealing a number of things, the property of his employer, and selling them in the neighbourhood. The things were corn, chaff, sheep, poultry, and grass seeds. In the course of the trial the master stated that, having reason to suspect the prisoner, he taxed him with the theft. It appeared that with regard to some of the stolen articles, the prisoner confessed voluntarily and without any inducement or threat being held out by any person in authority. Upon this he was pressed to make a clean breast as to the other matters. As to this the case stated:—"On cross-examination the prosecutor admitted that when he asked the prisoner about the corn he might have said, 'You had better tell me about all the corn that is gone,' and he further stated that he would not swear that he did not induce the prisoner to confess about the corn." The nephew of the prosecutor, who was present at the interview, said that the prosecutor then "asked Rose to speak the truth, and said it would be better for him if he did so." Assuming for the moment that that amounted to a statement made under circumstances which prevented it being given in evidence as a voluntary confession, the question arose as to what course the presiding magistrate ought to take. It was easier to say what he ought not to do than to define exactly what he should do. One thing was clear, and that was that he ought not to allow the whole of the evidence to go to the jury. Whether he ought to content himself with striking out the evidence and telling the jury to disregard it or whether he ought to discharge the jury and impanel a fresh one was not a matter which was now before the Court. At any rate, it was clearly wrong to admit it at all. The question then arose whether the evidence in this case was such as ought to have been left to the jury or not. It was the opinion of the Court that the evidence was not such as should properly be left to the jury. The rule was a very old one that a confession of a prisoner in order to be admissible must be free and voluntary. If it be said to him that it will be better or worse for him if he do or do not confess it was not admissible. East's Pleading the Crown, vol. ii., 659. His Lordship then referred to the cases of "Reg. v. Baldry" ([1852] 21 L.J., M.C., 130), "Reg. v. Jarvis" (1 L.R., C.C.R., 96), and "Reg. v. Thompson" ([1893] 2 Q.B., 12), and on their authority held that the evidence was not properly admissible. He added that counsel and solicitors conducting prosecutions should remember that a confession by a prisoner before it could be put in evidence must be affirmatively proved to have been made voluntarily, and they should be careful to make sure of their position in this respect when confessions of guilt formed part of the evidence on which they relied. Lastly, he thought it was a great pity that bail had not been originally accepted in this case by the magistrates, and it was a greater pity that that was not done by the quarter sessions when the case was reserved for this Court. Bail was not intended to be punitive, but only to secure the attendance of the prisoner at the trial.

The other learned JUDGES concurred.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF DORKING UNION V.
THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF ST. SAVIOUR'S UNION.*

Poor Law—Settlement—Parish—Sub-division under Local Government Act, 1894—Loss of settlement.

Decision of Divisional Court (13 The Times

This was an appeal by the guardians of St. Saviour's Union from a decision of the Divisional Court—Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Collins and Mr. Justice Ridley—dated July 30 last and reported in The Times of the following day; also in The Times Law Reports, vol. 13, p. 558. A special case was stated by quarter sessions of the County of London for the opinion of the Divisional Court raising a question as to the result for purposes of pauper settlement law of the division of a parish under the Local Government Act, 1894. The case was stated on an appeal from the order of justices. It appeared therefrom that A. E. Bridger, a pauper, was born on December 26, 1879, at Westcott, a hamlet then forming part of the parish of Dorking, in the Dorking Union, in the county of Surrey. He never acquired a settlement elsewhere. In August, 1896, he became chargeable to the St. Saviour's Union, in the County of London, which on August 18 obtained an order for his removal to the Dorking Union. It was against this order that the appeal was brought. At the time of the passing of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 73), the parish of Dorking was situate partly within and partly without the Dorking Rural Sanitary District and had overseers who levied a rate for the entire parish. By the operation of section 1 (3) of the Local Government Act, 1894, the part of the parish which was within the said rural sanitary district and the part which was not became two separate parishes and the old parish ceased to exist. The names of the new parishes, by order of the County Council, became "Dorking" and "Dorking Rural" respectively. They each had separate sets of overseers and rates. Westcott, where the pauper was born, is situate in Dorking Rural. It was contended by the guardians of Dorking Union—(1) That, as the hamlet of Westcott was within the parish of Dorking Rural and not the parish of Dorking, the order of the justices was bad, inasmuch as the pauper, if settled at all in any parish of Dorking Union, was settled in the parish of Dorking Rural, not in Dorking; that, there being no evidence before the justices who made the order that the old parish of Dorking had been divided as aforesaid and that the new parish of Dorking Rural had been formed and was in existence, the said order could not be amended by the insertion of the word "rural." (2) That in consequence of the division of the old parish it had ceased to exist, and the pauper had lost his birth settlement in the old parish, and that, as there was not at the time of his birth any parish of Dorking Rural, he could not have any settlement in that parish now, not having acquired one since its formation. The Court of quarter sessions held that they could amend the order by adding the word "rural." As to the second contention, that Court held, upon the authority of "Reg. v. Hunnington" (5 Q.B., 279), "Stourbridge v. Droitwich Union" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 769), "Reg. v. Tipton" (3 Q.B., 215), "Reg. v. St. Martin's-new-Sarum" (9 Q.B., 241), that the pauper had no settlement in Dorking Rural, and could not be removed to the Dorking Union in virtue of his birth settlement in the old parish of Dorking, that parish for the purposes of settlement having been destroyed and the pauper's settlement gained in it by birth being wholly lost. On the special case stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions the Divisional Court decided that when the principle of the authorities above cited was that when the parish in which a pauper was born was divided the entity maintaining its own poor in which the pauper had acquired his settlement no longer existed; that whether those cases were rightly decided or not they had been law for so long it would be quite impossible for the Court not to follow them; and that, as therefore the place to which the pauper in the present case ought to be sent no longer existed, he must remain chargeable to the union where he was—viz., St. Saviour's. From that decision the guardians of St. Saviour's Union now appealed.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by E. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C. (with him Mr. G. Elliott) was for the appellants; Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C. (with him Mr. W. F. Barry) was for the respondents. Their LORDSHIPS affirmed the decision of the Divisional Court and dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that in his opinion the case of "Reg. v. Tipton" (ubi supra) placed a very narrow construction on the old Act of 14 Charles II., c. 12. But it was clear that under that decision, where a settlement had been acquired by birth, if the old parish was abolished the settlement no longer existed. It could not be said that the pauper was settled in the part in which he was born. There was nothing in the Local Government Act, 1894, which so enacted. Inferences from section 68 of the Act of 1894 did not meet the case. One must bear in mind that the Legislature in passing that Act knew how the Poor Law stood at the time, and they did not put in the statute that where a parish was divided a person should have a settlement in that part in which he was born. The decision of the learned Judges in the Court below was therefore right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY, in the course of his judgment, said that in 1842 a rule had been laid down in "Reg. v. Tipton" (ubi supra) which had never been departed from. Whether it was right or wrong, time had confirmed it, and it could not be altered now.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

BURBOW V. TILSON.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Sequestration—Accounts of sequestrators appointed by Chancellor's Court—County Court proceedings—Res judicata.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance) on the hearing of an appeal from the County Court of Birmingham. The action was brought to recover a sum of £49 under the following circumstances. The plaintiff was the vicar of St. Andrew's, Bordesley, Birmingham. The curate of the parish, being unable to obtain payment of his stipend, took proceedings against the vicar in the Court of the Chancellor of the Bishop of Worcester. The Chancellor ordered a writ of sequestration to issue for the amount of stipend due and costs. The defendants in the present action were appointed as sequestrators. The sequestrators proceeded to execute the writ, and under it they received into their possession out of the living a sum of £79. They then carried in their account before the Chancellor showing a balance of £10 10s. due to the vicar. The Chancellor made his certificate allowing the account and adjudicating that the sum of £10 10s. was due to the vicar from the sequestrators. The vicar, being dissatisfied with this, brought the present action in the County Court to recover £49, which he alleged to be the balance properly due to him. The County Court Judge held that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the action, the matter in dispute having already been determined in a Court of record. The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge, but gave the plaintiff leave to appeal. It was now argued on his behalf that the civil Court was the proper tribunal to inquire into the accounts of sequestrators, and the following cases were cited:—"Beaurain v. Scott" (1 Camp., 388); "Kimber v. Paravicini" (15 Q.B.D., 222); "Jones v. Dangerfield" (1 Ch. D., 438).

Mr. Yeatman appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. F. Hinde for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that this was really an action to re-open the certificate which had been made by the Bishop's Chancellor in his Court and to have the sequestrators' account taken over again notwithstanding that certificate. In his opinion, the County Court Judge and the Divisional Court had come to the right conclusion. The cases of "Kimber v. Paravicini" and "Jones v. Dangerfield" were actions dealing with the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act, and in his opinion had nothing to do with this case.

HALL V. LAUNSPACH.*

Mayor's Court—Costs—Jurisdiction—Libel—
Less than £5 recovered as damages—Mayor's Court Act, 1857, sec. 11.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Ridley at Chambers prohibiting the Mayor's Court from taxing the plaintiff's costs in an action of libel in which the plaintiff recovered a verdict for £2 10s. The Judge in the Mayor's Court entered judgment for the plaintiff for £2 10s. and certified for counsel. The Registrar taxed the plaintiff's costs on the scale applicable to cases where under £20 was recovered. The defendant contended that there was no scale upon which the costs could be taxed where £5 or under was recovered, and that therefore the Mayor's Court had no jurisdiction to tax the plaintiff's costs, except those costs relating to allowances to witnesses and Court fees. The plaintiff contended that under Order 8, rule 1, of the Mayor's Court Rules, 1892, the costs followed the event, and the costs would be taxed upon the scale applicable where less than £20 was recovered. Mr. Justice Ridley held that the defendant's contention was correct and ordered the prohibition to issue. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. M. R. Emanuel appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. S. Lynch appeared for the defendant.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read the following judgment:—
This is an appeal by the plaintiff in an action in the Mayor's Court from an order of the Judge in Chambers directing a writ of prohibition to issue. The Judge gave leave to appeal. The terms of the order are special. The writ is to prohibit the Court from further proceeding in the matter of granting an allocatur for the amount of the plaintiff's taxed costs as taxed upon a judgment for £2 10s. and costs obtained by him in the action and of proceeding upon the judgment to enforce costs, except in respect of Court fees paid and allowances to witnesses. The sole question then is whether the Mayor's Court had jurisdiction to order any costs to be paid to the plaintiff beyond Court fees and allowances to witnesses. The action was for a libel. It was not and could not be disputed that the Mayor's Court had jurisdiction to try such an action (see Section 11 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857). The action was tried before a Judge with a jury. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 50s. damages. The Judge gave no certificate as to costs, except that he certified for counsel. The judgment was entered for the damages and costs. The Registrar, who is the taxing officer, allowed to the plaintiff costs beyond the Court fees and allowances to witnesses. The defendant brought the Registrar's allocatur before the Judge for review of the taxation on the point now in question, but the Judge refused to disturb the taxation. It was in these circumstances that the defendant applied for the prohibition. The burden of showing want of jurisdiction rests on the party applying for the prohibition. See "Taylor v. Nicholls" (1 C.P.D., 242). The contention of the defendant was that if the Mayor's Court had an ancient jurisdiction to give costs it had lost it or had been deprived of it by the rules now in force in that Court. The question of ancient jurisdiction was touched upon slightly, but was not seriously argued, by the defendant's counsel. He entirely failed to satisfy us that the Court had no such jurisdiction. It was conceded that it was the practice of the Court to give costs. In the absence of anything to the contrary, the presumption arising from the practice would be in favour of the jurisdiction. The presumption is supported by section 11 of the Act of 1857, already referred to, which assumes the jurisdiction to give costs. The effect of the section, stated shortly and so far as is material for the present question, is that if in an action founded on contract the plaintiff shall recover less than £5, or if in an action on tort, except certain specified actions, among which exceptions is an action for libel, the plaintiff shall recover less than 40s., the plaintiff shall have no costs unless the Judge certifies that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Mayor's Court. This negative but limited enactment takes away the jurisdiction of the Court as to costs, which it presupposes, but in certain specified cases only; it does not take it away in such an action as the present, because this is an action for libel, and the plaintiff has recovered more than 40s. damages. The presumption, then, being that the jurisdiction existed down to the passing of the Act of 1857, and the defendant having failed to prove the want of original jurisdiction, the only remaining question is whether the jurisdiction has been taken away by the rules of Court passed for the regulation of the practice and procedure of the Court. The subsisting rules are those of 1890 and 1892. These rules were made by the Mayor's Court under section 45 of the Act of 1857, and were sanctioned by the Rule Committee under the provisions of section 24 of the Judicature Act, 1884. The first rule of 1890 was this:—"In every action or matter in the Mayor's Court all costs shall be taxed by the Registrar of such Court according to the scales of fees and costs set out in the schedules hereto annexed, subject to the review of such taxation by one of the Judges of the Court." There are three schedules. Schedule A relates to fees of Court. Schedule B relates to costs where the amount recovered exceeds £5 and is less than £10, and prescribes that the only costs (exclusive of Court fees) to be allowed in that case shall be those specified. Schedule C prescribes that "the following costs only exclusive of Court fees" shall be allowed where the amount recovered is £10 and upwards, and it then sets forth in a tabular form three scales, the first where the amount is under £20, the second where it is £20 and under £50, and the third where it is £50 and above. It is plain, then, in my opinion, that there is no scale of costs (exclusive of Court fees) applicable where the amount recovered is £5 or under £5—in other words, that there is no scale of costs which applies to the present case. There is no rule among those of 1890 or 1892 to the effect that no costs shall be allowed other than those for which scales are prescribed. I think that rule 1 of 1890, that all costs shall be taxed according to the scales of costs, is confined to cases where the scales apply, and that where the scales do not apply the taxation is left unfettered.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule 1 of Order 8 of the rules of 1892 is founded on the lines of Order 65, rule 1, of the rules of the Supreme Court. It provides that, subject to the provisions of section 11 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857, and of section 117 of the County Courts Act, 1888, costs of proceedings in the Court shall be in the discretion of the Court. This is followed by a proviso as to the costs of trustees and by a proviso that where the action is tried with a jury "the costs" shall follow the event unless the Judge shall for good cause otherwise order. The costs in the second proviso means costs according to the scales where they apply. The references to section 11 of the Act of 1857 and to section 117 of the County Courts Act, 1888, subject to which the discretion over costs is exercisable, are material. The provisions of these enactments were plainly within the view of the authorities who framed and sanctioned the rules. As already pointed out, section 11 precludes the allowance of costs where the sum recovered does not exceed 40s. in the cases to which it applies; and it does not apply at all in the case of libel, even where the sum recovered is less than 40s. The other cases of tort excepted from section 11 are malicious prosecution, slander, criminal conversation, and seduction, so that in these cases as well as libel the Legislature thought fit to leave the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court wholly unfettered, although the amount recovered did not exceed 40s. The provisions of section 117 of the County Courts Act, 1888, do apply to the Mayor's Court, but they do not touch this case, because the action could not have been brought in a County Court, such Court having no jurisdiction to try a libel action. But section 11 and section 117 show that, where it is intended to take away a jurisdiction as to costs, plain and direct words are used. There are no such words in the rules of 1890 and 1892. It is difficult to suppose that the Mayor's Court in framing the existing rules, or the Rule Committee in sanctioning them, intended to take away the jurisdiction by inference; and it is on inference only that the respondent's arguments on the effect of the rules is founded. For these reasons I think that the argument cannot be sustained. It would seem advisable that the rules should be amended by providing a scale of costs to cover cases like the present. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

LEAD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment to the same effect.

BONNER AND ANOTHER v. THE TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON PERMANENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Mortgage by sub-demise.

A lessee having been compelled to pay the rent of premises the lease of which he had assigned, held that he could not recover it from persons to whom the assignee had mortgaged the premises by way of sub-demise.

This was an action by the lessees of certain premises to recover from the defendants, who were mortgagees of one Price to whom the plaintiffs had assigned their lease, ground-rent which the plaintiffs had been compelled to pay the lessor. The facts, which were not disputed, were shortly as follows. By lease dated April 3, 1882, Henry Moore demised the premises to the plaintiffs at the yearly rent of £20, payable quarterly, for a term of 99 years. On April 5, 1889, the plaintiffs assigned the remainder of the term to Price, who covenanted to pay the rent of £20 and to indemnify the plaintiffs. On October 18, 1889, Price mortgaged the premises to the defendants by a sub-demise of the whole term, except the last day, as security for certain advances. The indenture of mortgage also contained an agreement on the part of Price, on demand by the defendants, to do all things necessary for conveying and assuring to them the whole of the remainder of the term. The defendants also covenanted with Price that if they entered into possession of the premises, and received the rents and profits thereof, they would pay the rent of £20 per annum reserved by the lease of April 3, 1882. On November 13, 1891, Price became a bankrupt. About the same date the defendants entered into possession of the premises and remained in possession and in receipt of the rents and profits. The defendants having neglected to pay the rent of £20 reserved under the lease of April 3, 1882, the plaintiffs paid it to avoid a forfeiture.

Mr. BRAY, Q.C. (Mr. Tindal Atkinson with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that the plaintiffs having paid rent which the defendants could have been compelled to pay they could recover it back from the defendants. The damage arose through the default of the defendants, and the person who paid in consequence of the legal default of another was entitled to recover from the person by whose default the damage was occasioned the sum so paid. The defendants being in possession it was their duty to perform the covenants. "Moule v. Garrett" (L.R., 5 Exch., 132, and 7 Exch., 101). The payment by the plaintiffs preserved the lease, which otherwise would have been forfeited, and the benefit enured for the defendants. The mortgage contained in express terms an agreement to assign the last day upon demand being made by the defendants. He cited notes to "Lamplough v. Brathwait" (Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 1, page 139).

Mr. JELF, Q.C. (Mr. Spencer Bower with him), for the defendants, contended that the principle turned upon whether or not the defendants were under any liability to the lessor. There was no privity between the defendants and the lessor. The mortgagee, who was going to take the property by way of security from a person who had the leasehold interest, would naturally take a lesser estate which would create a privity of contract between himself and the person who actually let to him. There was no implied authority to pay. The case of "Moule v. Garrett" (supra) did not apply, as there was neither privity of contract or estate.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL, in giving judgment, said,—The case of "Moule v. Garrett" depended on the fact that the defendant in that case was liable, as assignee, to the lessor for rent. This was not like the case where both parties were directly liable to pay the rent, and one paid and had a remedy over against the other. First treating the defendants as mortgagees by sub-demise they would not be liable for the rent. The mortgagee by sub-demise had a sort of option and would sometimes let the security go. It was impossible to contend that a lessee being compelled to pay rent could recover against a mortgagee by sub-demise. He did not think the case was altered by the contract that if the defendants took possession they would pay the rent. The covenant with Price was only putting into express terms what he was liable for under the Conveyancing Act. The contract was between Price and the defendants. It seemed to him that when it was said that a person who paid could recover from the person ultimately liable that meant that the person ultimately liable was liable to pay the person whom the plaintiff had paid. It did not mean through a series of contracts. He thought this case was an endeavour to extend the principle laid down in "Moule v. Garrett."

Judgment for the defendants, with costs.

GREY V. BUTLER'S WHARF (LIMITED).*

Shipping—Discharge of cargo—Remuneration of lightermen—Overtime—Custom held not proved.

This action, the hearing of which commenced before his Lordship yesterday, raised a question of considerable importance as to the remuneration to be paid to lightermen in the Thames for overtime. The circumstances were as follows:—In July, 1897, the plaintiff, who is a master lighterman, was employed by the consignees of certain West Indian sugar in bags to take delivery of their goods into craft from the steamship Torgorm, which was discharging her cargo, brought from the West Indies, at Middleton's Wharf in the river Thames. The defendants are the owners of that wharf, and had undertaken to discharge the Torgorm on behalf of her owners. The vessel arrived in the Thames, and on July 28 and 29 discharged cargo at Churchhole Tiers. On July 30 she moved to Middleton's Wharf, where the plaintiff's lighters worked alongside the steamer until 7 p.m. The lightermen refused to work after that hour unless the defendants agreed to pay them a shilling an hour for overtime, in addition to the payment they received from their employers in accordance with the terms of Lord Brassey's award. The defendants declined to make such payment, and landed a certain portion of the sugar which the plaintiff had to receive on to the wharf. The plaintiff, in order to get delivery of the sugar so landed, paid under protest the defendants' landing charges, amounting to £20 12s. 6d. This sum was now sought to be recovered back. The plaintiff alleged that by the custom of the river Thames, where a "foreign" or "over-sea" cargo of sugar or similar heavy goods was discharged into lighters, the lightermen were entitled to receive a shilling an hour for all time over and above the usual working hours, from the persons who got the benefit of the overtime. Witnesses were called in support of the alleged custom. They stated that the custom did not apply to vessels trading from the Continent of Europe. Witnesses for the defendants denied the existence of the custom.

Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., and Mr. Lacy Smith appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Boyd, Q.C., and Mr. Bremner for the defendants.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, after stating the facts, said that it was clear law that in the absence of any custom the shipowner was bound to deliver into lighters; he was not entitled, apart from custom, to insist on discharging into warehouses or other place so as to involve the consignee in the expense of warehouse or landing charges. It had been alleged that the defendants had wrongfully landed 700 of these bags of sugar on to their wharf during the day. That was denied. That was not the question at issue in this case. The question related solely to goods landed after 7 p.m. It appeared that the plaintiff and his men were bound by their contract with the consignees to take delivery during the night. The men were paid for overtime in accordance with Lord Brassey's award, and the consignees would have to pay for that overtime. There was no question that, as between the ship and the consignees, the consignees were bound to take delivery during the night. All parties were willing that discharge should go on during the night except the lightermen. It appeared to be usual in the Thames to go on working till 10 p.m. or even later. That was contemplated in Lord Brassey's award, which laid down a scale of payment for overtime. The plaintiff was really trying to establish a custom to pay a gratuity to lightermen for doing work which they were bound by contract to do. Such a custom appeared to him to be unreasonable. Moreover, it was too vague, as it did not clearly appear as to what goods it was said to apply or who was to make the payment. On the evidence before him he had come to the conclusion that no such custom as was alleged in fact existed. There would be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

MARSHALL V. ROGERS AND CO.*

Company—Debentures—Charge on "the undertaking"—Effect of—Debentureholders and judgment creditor.

This was an interpleader issue to try the title to the stock-in-trade, plant, furniture, and machinery at 65, Banner-street, Golden-square, which had been seized by the sheriff as the result of a judgment obtained against Thomas and Co. (Limited) by Stephen Rogers and Co. The claimant (and plaintiff) was Mr. J. S. Marshall, a receiver appointed by Colonel C. N. Kidd, the debentureholder of Thomas and Co. (Limited). The question raised in the case was as to the meaning of the word "undertaking" in a debenture. In the series of debentures in this case the words of charge, after specifying certain payments, were as follows:—"The company hereby charges all the said payments, its undertaking, and all its profits, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital, if any, for the time being." The receiver was appointed on October 25, 1897, and took possession on the morning of the next day, under a power given by the debenture to take possession of the property charged thereby. Later, on the 26th, the sheriff carried out the seizure. The question was whether the receiver had a good title to the effects as against the defendants, the execution creditors.

MR. A. H. SPOKES, for the plaintiff, said that the effect of inserting the word "undertaking" was a floating charge on all the assets of the company, though it did not become a specific charge until a receiver was appointed or there was a winding-up order. The case of "In re Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company" (L.R., 5 Ch. Appls, 318) showed that the word "undertaking" had reference to all the property of the company, including that acquired after the date of the debenture. The effect of debentures that were a charge on the undertaking was that the debentureholders had a charge on what should be the property of the company at the time when they realized their security, i.e., when they appointed the receiver—"In re Mersey Wood Working Company" (1 The Times Law Reports, 566). The word "undertaking" was equivalent to

*Reported by R. H. BALLOCH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by J. F. WALKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"estate, property, and effects"—"In re Florence Land and Public Works Company" (10 Ch.D., 546). The floating charge became a specific charge when a receiver was appointed or there was a winding up—"Brunton v. Electrical Engineering Corporation" ([1892] 1 Ch., 439). Until a sale by the sheriff the security of the debentureholder prevailed over that of the execution creditor—"Taunton v. Sheriff of Warwick" ([1895] 2 Ch., 321). The execution creditor took subject to all equities—"In re Standard Manufacturing Company" ([1891] 1 Ch., 641). The fact that the receiver was appointed by the debentureholder and not by the Court made no difference.

Mr. JOHN ROSKILL, for the defendants, said that in "In re Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company" and "In re Florence Land and Public Works Company" other words were used besides "undertaking." There was no such thing as a general definition of undertaking apart from the particular case. The debentureholder and not the receiver should be the plaintiff in the interpleader issue. The debentures were not properly secured, as they only charged the property generally.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the question was whether Mr. Marshall had a right as against the sheriff. He had such a right if he was in as receiver for the debentureholder and if the debentureholder had a right as against the sheriff. The question turned on the meaning of the word "undertaking." As to that he must follow the decided cases. These effects were the property of the debentureholder, who by the appointment and possession of the receiver had perfected his title to them. There must therefore be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

IN RE ANGLO-CONTINENTAL CORPORATION OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Surplus assets—Distribution by direction of the Court—Articles of association, construction of.

This was an application by the liquidator for the direction of the Court as to the distribution of the surplus assets of the company in its winding up. Clause 129 of the articles of association was as follows:—"If upon the winding up of the company the surplus assets shall be more than sufficient to repay the whole of the paid up capital, the excess shall be distributed among the members in proportion to the capital paid or which ought to have been paid on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. If the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid, or which ought to have been paid, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up, other than amounts paid in advance of calls. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions." The company was registered with a capital of 500,000 shares of £1 each. One hundred thousand shares were issued with 5s. per share paid up, and 25,000 further shares were issued to persons who paid for them in full. After providing for debts and expenses, there was not enough surplus in the hands of the liquidator to return in full the capital paid up, and the question arose how the surplus was to be distributed.

Mr. Kirby was for the liquidator, Mr. A. Beddall for the fully-paid shareholders, and Mr. Arthur J. Chitty for the partly-paid shareholders.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said the case raised a question of importance as to the proper construction of a form of surplus assets clause which had been adopted with variations since the decision of the House of Lords in "Birch v. Cropper" (L.R., 14 App. Cas., 525) with the view of avoiding the effect of that decision. After stating the effect of that case and of "Ex parte Maude" (L.R., 6 Ch., 51), and pointing out that in neither of those cases was there a provision in the articles for regulating the distribution of the surplus assets, his Lordship said that there was in the present case such a provision in article 129. Under the circumstances there was no room for the application of "Birch v. Cropper." Had there been a real surplus after returning the paid up capital, it would, by the express terms of the contract, have been divisible, not according to the nominal amounts of the shares, but according to the amounts which had been paid up (subject to correction in respect of any arrears or advances), and which, therefore, had presumably had the principal merit in earning the profit. But there being no surplus, but a deficit on the whole adventure, there still remained an equity to be satisfied in order to equalize the loss, and the uncalled capital ought on general principles to be called up or treated as called up so far as was necessary for that purpose, unless the contract had otherwise provided. It had not otherwise provided. What was the meaning of "capital paid"? According to "Ex parte Lowenfeld" (70 L.T., 3) the term did not mean merely capital paid before the liquidation or called up in the liquidation for payment of debts and expenses, but included capital called up or treated as called up for the purpose of satisfying equities in the repayment of capital. And in the present case there was in truth no surplus, but a mitigation of loss. The loss and the mitigation of it were to be distributed equally, but subject to equalization of the capital account, and not irrespectively of such equalization, and a call (actual or in account) was necessary for that equalization which was an essential part of a winding up unless excluded by the contract; and the amount of that call must be included in the words "capital paid or which ought to have been paid." The liquidator must therefore proceed to make a call (either actual or imaginary, as the case might be) on the 100,000 shares sufficient to equalize the capital account. If all the shareholders were solvent the call would in this case be one of 3s. per share on the 100,000 shares, making them 8s. paid. The amount so obtained would be sufficient to repay to the holders of the 25,000 shares 12s. per share, leaving them also with 8s. paid. The assets in hand would then be divisible equally amongst the whole 125,000 shares, and the ultimate loss of each shareholder would be the difference between the 8s. and the dividend so paid. Assuming the moneys in hand to be £25,000, then each of the holders of the 100,000 shares would as a result of the whole have received back 1s. per share, and each of the holders of the 25,000 shares 16s. per share, and every shareholder would have lost 4s. per share.

THE RIPON CITY*

Ship—Mortgage—Mortgage of eight shares—Claims on ship paid off by owners of remaining shares—Sale of ship—Distribution of proceeds.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Registrar of the Court as to the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the steamship Ripon City. The facts of the case appear in the judgment.

Mr. F. Laing appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Dawson Miller for the interveners.

THE PRESIDENT said,—It is necessary to state the circumstances which led up to this sale so far as they are relevant to the questions now raised. Before October 10, 1895, 60 shares in the Ripon City belonged to Furness, Withy, and Co., and on that day an agreement was entered into with Niel M'Lean and Co. to purchase the Ripon City. Under this agreement Niel M'Lean and Co. received possession of the vessel, and proceeded to work her, and on payment of part of the purchase money in October, 1896, eight shares were transferred to them. In November Niel M'Lean and Co. mortgaged four of their eight shares, and in February, 1897, these shares were transferred to Robert K. Donald, a plaintiff in the present action, and the remaining four shares were mortgaged to Mrs. Elizabeth Balls, another of the plaintiffs. On February 2, Niel M'Lean and Co. suspended payment, and Thomas M'Clintoch, a plaintiff, was appointed sequestrator. On February 5, Furness, Withy, and Co. took possession of the ship. When Furness, Withy, and Co. took possession there were certain claims against the ship incurred during the management of Niel M'Lean and Co. For these claims proceedings were taken and were decided by Mr. Justice Barnes on May 6, 1897 ([1897] P., 226). Furness, Withy, and Co. paid these claims. They also paid £325 for the cancellation of the charter and repaired the ship. On April 17, 1897, Furness, Withy, and Co. sold the ship to an Italian for £8,650. On July 20 the plaintiffs brought an action in this Court claiming a declaration that the sale of the ship was void. Furness, Withy, and Co. intervened and counter-claimed. The case came before me, and by consent a decree was made that judgment should be entered against the interveners for £1,081 6s., being one-eighth of £8,650 plus interest, less such deductions as the interveners might be able in law to establish as proper from the respective shares. It was referred to the Registrar and merchants to determine the amount of these deductions. The deductions in question are divisible under four heads:—First.—A sum of £216 6s. claimed as brokerage at 2½ per cent. of the purchase money. This sum has been allowed by the learned Registrar, and I think rightly. The effect of the decree by consent was, in my opinion, that the plaintiffs are to be treated as acquiescing in the sale as a sale, but with a reservation of all rights as to distribution of the proceeds, the gross sum realized being £8,650. It was argued before me that the plaintiffs as mortgagees could on a sale add their costs of it to their claim on the purchase money, and should be permitted to do so now. No doubt the plaintiffs could do this as against their mortgagor, but not as against the owners of the other shares in the ship. Secondly.—The learned Registrar has allowed the deduction of the amounts secured by lien which were paid by the interveners to Messrs. Cory in consequence of the decision of Mr. Justice Barnes, and also of Messrs. Cory's costs, on the ground that this lien was in existence at the time of the sale to the Italian purchaser. But there appears to me to be no distinction between the different maritime liens imposed by the conduct of Niel M'Lean and Co., and the case is the same as if the interveners had, instead of giving bail, then paid all such liens. There is thus but one question of law involved. Mr. Aspinall addressed to me his main argument on this question. He contended that, on the true construction of the transaction between the interveners and Niel M'Lean and Co., the interveners ceased to be owners, and became either mortgagees, or, at least, unpaid vendors with a security for payment of the purchase money, that they took possession in order to enforce their security, that they could not enforce their security by sale without clearing off the maritime liens on the ship, and so, having not indeed relieved the mortgagees of the eight shares from personal liability, but, having relieved their property from a prior encumbrance, they were entitled to deduct what they had paid in respect of the liens from the purchase money received by them before dividing it. I have considered the agreement of October 10, and it appears to me clear that the property in the vessel never passed to Niel M'Lean and Co., nor could specific performance ever have been enforced as the interveners were never in a position to sell the whole ship. The position of things I think was that for the original intention of the whole ship being transferred to Niel M'Lean and Co. and the interveners becoming mortgagees for the unpaid purchase money there was substituted an arrangement under which the interveners until they acquired all the shares remained the owners, except in so far as on proportionate payment there was a transfer of shares, Niel M'Lean and Co. being meantime allowed to work the vessel. It confirms this view to find that in their pleadings in the present action the interveners describe themselves as at all times owners of the vessel, and their argument before Mr. Justice Barnes in the "Ripon City" ([1897] P., 226) proceeded on the basis of them and not Niel M'Lean and Co. being the owners. It was contended before me that Mr. Justice Barnes ("Ripon City" [1897] P., 226) held that the interveners were the mortgagees and Niel M'Lean and Co. the owners of the ship. But it is clear to me that the language of the learned Judge has been misapprehended on this point. For the purposes of this case, however, it does not appear to me material whether the interveners are to be regarded as mortgagees or as owners in the position I have described. In one view, they may be regarded as owners of the equity of redemption in regard to the plaintiffs' mortgagees because they had a claim against Niel M'Lean and Co. for any surplus after discharge of those mortgages. But they may also be regarded as having rights resembling those of a mortgagee and so being in a somewhat similar position to that of the plaintiffs. Their legal position cannot, I think, be put higher than that. Further, it is clear that they were not personally liable on the liens discharged by them, and that to free their interests in the ship from these liens it was necessary to free the plaintiffs' interests as well, but that the plaintiffs did not expressly request them to discharge these liens. The question is, Have they, under these circumstances, on any legal principle, a right to claim that the amount of the liens paid off by them shall be deducted from the purchase money before division, and so a proportion of the expense incurred by them thrown on the plaintiffs? The argument of Mr. Aspinall was based on a contention that this payment might be treated as a payment at the implied request of the plaintiffs, and he relied on the authorities of "Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company" (3 L.R., P.C., 38) and the "Orchis" (15 P.D., 38). [The President then discussed these cases.] But what was, I think, an essential feature in those cases, the personal liability of the defendant to pay the sum which the plaintiff was considered to be compelled to pay and did pay, is wanting in the present instance. It is true that, by the satisfaction of a maritime lien, the property of every mortgagee is relieved from what, so long as it remains, is a prior charge, but a request by the mortgagee for the payment off of the lien is not to be inferred for that reason. It may be reasonable enough if there be personal liability for a debt to infer that the person under it desires, and impliedly requests, its discharge. But it is a further step, and one, I believe, erroneous, to contend that where there is no liability but only the bare fact of benefit to property a similar request is to be implied. People cannot be forced to buy even certain benefits against their will. In the present case, too, the benefit was doubtful. If the ship had sold for enough to provide for the lien and the mortgages—and there is evidence to show this was at least contemplated as possible—the plaintiffs as mortgagees would have gained nothing by the discharge of the lien. I have considered whether the satisfaction of this lien might not be treated as money paid to keep the property in existence, like the payment of premiums on policies of insurance. The analogy, however, seems to me imperfect, because different considerations may arise in the case of a payment necessary to preserve a property in existence from one which only relieves it of a burden. But were the analogy more complete than it is, I think that the decision of the Court of Appeal in “Falcke v. Scottish Insurance Company” (34 Chan. Div., 234) has finally dispelled the inferences connected with the employment of the term salvage in earlier cases, and decided that the payment of premiums by the owner of the equity of redemption in a mortgaged policy gives him no prior right, and that payment of premiums confers such a right only on one or other of the principles enumerated by Lord Justice Fry in the previous case of “In re Leslie” (25 Ch. Div., 552)—principles which have no application in the present instance. Nor does the practice of the Admiralty Court appear to me to afford any guide in the matter. It has always been held that a person advancing money to the master to pay wages has been allowed to claim in priority for his advance, but this is, I think, because he is considered to be identified with the master. It is true also that a bottomry bondholder who discharges a claim for wages becomes entitled to priority in respect of such payment; but this is only when he has been allowed by the Court to make it. I have also endeavoured to see whether the present case may not be considered as analogous to that of the holder of an equity of redemption who pays off a first mortgage with the intention of keeping it alive as against mesne encumbrances. I take the general principle of equity to be as laid down by Jessel, M. R., in “Adams v. Angell” (5 Ch. Div., 634, 645), the decision of which case was afterwards approved by the House of Lords in “Thorne v. Cann” (App. Cas., [1896] p. 11). [The President then read lines 18 to 32 of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the case of “Adams v. Angell” (5 Ch. D., 645). In the present case there was, no doubt, strong reason on the part of the interveners for keeping alive the charge enforceable by lien, and no doubt also the interveners could have taken an assignment of the rights of the lienholders, whom they paid off to a trustee, or even perhaps to themselves. But is there enough, or indeed anything beyond the fact of the payment off, to show that the interveners in giving bail, which I have treated as equivalent to paying off the maritime liens, intended to keep them alive for the purpose of maintaining a priority for such payment as against the mortgagees? I cannot think that there is. The interveners when they gave bail probably did not believe in the validity of the arrest, but, in determining to put an end to it, I think that their real, or at least an obvious and sufficient, object was to keep the conduct of the sale of the ship in their own hands, and so certainly obtain the brokerage, and probably get a better price for the vessel, instead of allowing her to run the risk of being condemned by the Court, and sold by auction; and they did this, no doubt, prudently enough for their own benefit, partly as holders of at least 52-64ths of her, and partly as entitled to claim against Niel M’Lean and Co. anything their equity of redemption of the eight shares might produce. It would be a mere fiction, I think, to suppose that it was intended to keep the liens alive for any purpose. I can, therefore, discover no ground on which the interveners can claim a priority over the mortgagees for any of their payments in discharge of liens. Thirdly.—With regard to the charterparty, for which the interveners paid £325 for its cancellation on April 9, 1897, it was contended that before that date both Mrs. Balls and Mr. Donald had become mortgagees in possession. This turns on certain correspondence. I do not think the cancellation of the charterparty was consented to, and I do not think that the interests of either of them can be held liable. Fourthly.—The remaining point turns on the claim to make deductions in respect of the repairs to the vessel. This clearly must be limited to the costs of any repairs done in consequence of the promise in the agreement for sale to the Italian purchaser. I think such costs should be deducted if it could be proved that they were incurred after and in pursuance of the agreement for sale. But I agree with the finding of the learned Registrar that no such proof has been given; and I have no doubt that the repairs were practically completed before the agreement for sale. I am of opinion, therefore, that the only deduction to be allowed is the claim for brokerage (£216 5s.), and the account must be reformed accordingly. The plaintiffs, of course, cannot have more than the amount of their mortgages and interest. I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the action, of the reference before the Registrar, and of these objections.

ROBEY V. ARNOLD AND ANOTHER.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Music-hall agency—Commission on “re-engagements.”

On appeal from a judgment of Darling, J. (ante, p. 39), Semble, that it was a question for the jury whether certain engagements were “re-engagements” within the meaning of the contract.

This was an application by the plaintiff for a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Darling and a common jury. The case is reported ante, p. 39. The plaintiff was a music-hall artist, and the defendants were the receivers, in a partnership action, of the property and business of the firm of Hugh J. Didcott and Co., a firm which consisted of two partners, the partnership having been dissolved in 1894. Messrs. Didcott and Co. were theatrical agents, and in November, 1892, they obtained for the plaintiff engagements for 1894 and 1895 at the Oxford, Pavilion, and Tivoli Music-halls. On November 15, 1892, the plaintiff made three contracts in writing with Didcott and Co., each being in the same form, and relating respectively to the engagements at the Oxford, Pavilion, and Tivoli Music-halls. The contract relating to the Oxford Music-hall stated that the plaintiff agreed to accept through Hugh J. Didcott and Co., his agents, an engagement to appear at the Oxford Music-hall, Mr. Ibbetson, having instructed Didcott and Co. to engage the plaintiff at a certain salary for a certain period; time to be mutually arranged. The contract contained the following clause:—"I agree to pay to you, or your heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, 10 per cent. commission on all moneys accruing from this engagement; and I hereby authorize Mr. Ibbetson to deduct and pay Hugh J. Didcott and Co., or order, the same from my salary in any manner Hugh J. Didcott and Co. may deem expedient. I also agree to pay you, your heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the same rate of commission on all my re-engagements at the above establishment or with Mr. Ibbetson. . . . (Signed) GEORGE ROBEY." On December 15, 1893, the plaintiff made an engagement, without the intervention of Didcott and Co., with the Pavilion Music-hall, to come into operation in April, 1896. On October 4, 1895, the plaintiff was indebted to Didcott and Co. in the sum of £48 15s. 7d. for commission, and by an indenture of that date he covenanted with the defendants, as receivers of the late firm of Hugh J. Didcott and Co., to pay to them £48 15s. 7d. for commission accrued due, and also such further sums as had been accrued due or were accruing due, by instalments of £10 per week, and as security he assigned his present and future salaries at music-halls or theatres at which he should be performing during the continuance of the security; and there was a proviso that if the plaintiff paid the said instalments the defendants would not give notice of the security, and, further, that when the defendants did give notice they might at their option give notice at any of the halls or theatres at which the plaintiff might be performing, and might request the proprietors to pay to them part of the salary that the plaintiff might be earning. On October 23, 1895, the plaintiff obtained for himself engagements with the Oxford and Tivoli Music-halls, to come into operation in May, 1896, on similar terms to the Pavilion engagement. It was admitted that the sum of £48 15s. 7d. and all commissions due up to December 31, 1895, had been paid by the plaintiff, but the defendants contended that they were entitled to 10 per cent. commission upon the salary the plaintiff received from the engagements at the three music-halls in question in 1896, upon the ground that they were "re-engagements" within the meaning of the agreements of November 15, 1892. In January, 1897, the defendants accordingly wrote to the manager of the Theatre Royal, Birmingham, where the plaintiff was performing in the Christmas pantomime for 1896-97, requesting him to pay one-half of the plaintiff's salary, which was £45 a week, to them. The plaintiff on the other hand contended that the agreements of November 15, 1892, only covered commission due upon the engagements for 1894 and 1895 obtained through Didcott and Co. The plaintiff brought this action (1) for a declaration that the mortgage of October 4, 1895, was no longer a subsisting or continuing security, and that all moneys secured thereby had been duly paid; and (2) for an injunction to restrain the defendants from serving notices as above on the managers or proprietors of any music-hall or theatre at which the plaintiff might be performing. The defendants counter-claimed for commission on the plaintiff's engagements at the Oxford, Pavilion, and Tivoli Music-halls for 1896. Mr. Justice Darling, without leaving any question to the jury, gave judgment for the defendants on the counter-claim, holding that there had been "re-engagements" within the meaning of the contract; but granted an injunction as claimed by the plaintiff upon the ground that the commissions due under the re-engagements were not included in the mortgage deed so as to entitle the defendants to give notice. The plaintiff appealed, and the defendants gave cross-notice of appeal.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. COCK, Q.C., and Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendants' contention would make the plaintiff liable to pay commission whenever he at any future time obtained an engagement at any one of the music-halls in question. A "re-engagement" meant a renewal of the engagement brought about by the agent. It could not include the case of an artiste obtaining an engagement by his own efforts. The question whether the engagements for 1896 were "re-engagements" ought to have been left to the jury. That question depended upon whether the terms were the same and upon other circumstances. As regards the mortgage of October 4, 1895, that came to an end when the commission due on the 1894 and 1895 engagements were paid.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, for the defendants, contended that the engagements for 1896 were "re-engagements." That term implied a renewal, a carrying on. Here, upon the facts, the engagements for 1896 were practically continuous upon those for 1894-95, and were therefore re-engagements. There was no question for the jury, as the terms of the various engagements were substantially the same. If the question were left to the jury they could only come to one conclusion—namely, that these were re-engagements. They referred to "Bilbee v. Hasse and Co." (5 The Times L.R., 677). As regards the mortgage deed of October 4, 1895, that deed covered the claim for commissions on re-engagements, and the defendants were entitled to give the notice as the security was a subsisting and continuing security.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, in reply, cited "Morris v. Hunt and Co." (12 The Times L.R., 187).

The COURT allowed the plaintiff's appeal and dismissed the defendants' cross-appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, though it was not necessary to decide the point, yet as there were other contracts similar to this he desired to say that, in his opinion, the question whether the engagements of 1896 were fresh engagements or re-engagements would be a question for the jury. He further thought that the word "re-engagements" in the contracts of November 15, 1892, could not be read as meaning re-engagements through Didcott and Co. The defendants' counter-claim, however, depended upon the mortgage deed of October 4, 1895. If the deed was satisfied, the defendants had no claim. That depended upon whether the deed covered commissions on salaries earned by the plaintiff on new engagements or re-engagements, whatever they might be called, or only upon the original engagements brought about by Didcott and Co. In his opinion, the deed only covered commissions due on the original engagements, and did not cover commissions on new engagements or re-engagements. The terms "accrued due" and "accruing due" in the deed meant commissions accrued due or accruing due under the original engagements obtained through Didcott and Co. Those commissions had been paid. The defendants therefore failed upon their counter-claim. The plaintiff was, consequently, right in his claim for an injunction. The plaintiff's appeal would be allowed, and the defendants' appeal would be dismissed with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

SMITH AND SCARAMANGA V. FENNING AND OTHERS.*

Insurance—Marine—Policy on freight—Construction—"Difference of freight"—Policy against total loss.

This action was brought to recover a total loss under a policy of marine insurance on "difference of freight" underwritten by the defendants. The plaintiffs are merchants in London and are large importers of grain from Southern Russia, and in June, 1896, being of opinion that freights from the Black Sea were likely to advance by the autumn of that year, they entered into a contract with certain ship-owners, which was embodied in a "berth note," dated June 12, 1896, whereby the owners "engaged with the plaintiffs for a steamer, to be named thereafter, the following full cargo, viz.:—maximum 4,800 tons of wheat and for other grain, to be loaded at a safe port in the Sea of Azoff for United Kingdom or Continent, at 12s. per unit. If steamer did not arrive at port of loading (to be named) on or before midnight of November 10, the shippers were to have the option to cancel the engagement. Ten lay days, Sundays and holidays excepted, were allowed for loading. The conditions of 1890 Azoff charterparty to apply until cargo should be on board and thereafter general produce bill of lading." The material clauses of the 1890 Azoff charterparty are as follows:—"The freighters have the option of cancelling this charter if the steamer does not arrive at port of loading, and be ready to load, on or before midnight of next (new style)." "B. In the event of ice (except in the spring) preventing the steamer entering the port of loading, or ice in the Azoff on steamer's arrival (except in the spring) preventing the cargo from being sent alongside, this charter shall be null and void. Should frost ensue (except in the spring) after steamer has arrived at port of loading, and the vessel is compelled to leave to avoid being frozen in, the master is at liberty to leave without cargo, in which cases the charter shall be null and void, or with part cargo, and to fill up for steamer's benefit at any open Black Sea, Azoff, or Mediterranean port for United Kingdom, Continent, or Mediterranean, but in case of leaving with part cargo the steamer shall complete the voyage as if a full cargo had been loaded, or shall forward such part cargo to its destination, provided that no extra expense be thereby caused to the receivers, freight being paid on quantity delivered under this charter." By October, 1896, freights had risen to 24s. and the plaintiffs were in a position to make large profits on the Berth Note Contract. The steamship Gladys Royle was named by the owners as the vessel which should fulfil the contract, and Taganrog chosen by the plaintiffs as the port of loading. On October 23 it was doubtful whether the Gladys Royle would arrive at Taganrog before November 10, the cancelling date. On October 23 the plaintiffs effected with the defendants the policy now sued on, which was in the following terms, so far as material:—"Cardiff to Port Said while there and thence to Taganrog upon the Gladys Royle steamship." "The said ship &c., are and shall be valued at—on difference of freight—to pay a total loss in the event of steamer being unable to fulfil her charter through non-arrival or inability to load by November 20 from any cause whatever. Policy £150." The Gladys Royle arrived at Taganrog on November 8, and commenced to load. In ordinary course her loading would have been completed by November 20, but was delayed by ice in the harbour. On November 20 she had loaded half, and on November 24 four-fifths of her cargo, when she was compelled by ice to leave the port. She afterwards filled up at Novorossisk for steamer's benefit.

Mr. H. F. BOYD, Q.C. (Mr. F. Laing with him), contended for the plaintiffs that the policy was a contract to pay £150 if certain events happened. One of those events was being unable to fulfil her charter by inability to load by November 20. On November 20 she had not loaded, and had not fulfilled her charter. The plaintiffs had lost some difference of freight; whether they could recover a partial loss was doubtful.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and LORD ROBERT CECIL for the defendants contended that the policy was against total loss and there had been no total loss. The risk was a voyage to Taganrog and prima facie no loss after arrival would be covered. The vessel must either not arrive or not be in a condition to load by November 20. In either of those cases the charter would be entirely lost. Such a loss would be covered by the policy. To constitute a loss she must have been unable to fulfil her charter by reason of one of the two causes named. Looking at clause B of the Azoff charterparty she had fulfilled her charter.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said the point was a difficult one and not free from doubt, but the defendants' view appeared to him to be the more reasonable one. The plaintiffs wanted protection against a total loss of freight from inability to fulfil the charter within the meaning of clause B. November 20 was a date on which ice might reasonably be expected to interfere with the adventure. The meaning of the policy was that if by that date she did not arrive or was unable to load so that the plaintiffs got no profit out of the adventure, then a total loss was to be paid. The fact that the risk insured was a voyage to Taganrog made for that view. As the claim had been put forward on the basis of there being a total loss or nothing, judgment would be for the defendants with costs as far as total loss was concerned, with liberty to apply, in case it should be determined to put forward a claim for a partial loss.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL V. THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.*

Telegraph (Post Office)—Telephone—Corporation of London—Power to impose conditions—Telegraph Act, 1863, sec. 5, subs. 3.

In this case the Court sat to determine a difference which had arisen between the parties within the meaning of the Telegraph Act, 1878. By a Treasury minute dated May 23, 1892, the respective rights and duties of the Post Office and of the National Telephone Company had been defined, and subsequently an agreement had been entered into, upon the basis of the minute, by which the main trunk lines of wires used for telephonic purposes were to be laid down by the Post Office and to be the property of that department, while local systems of exchange were to be constructed by the company and to be worked for their benefit. By the Telegraph Act of 1863 a highway authority might sanction the placing of telegraph wires under a street or road. Section 5, subsection 3, provides:—"Any consent may be given on such pecuniary or other terms or conditions (being in themselves lawful), or subject to such stipulations as to the time or mode of execution of any work, or as to the removal or alteration in any event of any work, or as to any other thing connected with or relative to any work, as the person or body giving consent thinks fit." By the Telegraph Act, 1878, in the case of the withholding of a consent to the Postmaster-General or of the attaching to the consent any terms, conditions, or stipulations to which the Postmaster-General objects, the difference so arising falls to be determined ultimately by the Railway Commission. In the early part of 1897 the Post Office authorities decided to make various changes in the working of the exchange system in London, and applied for consent to open up the streets in order to do the necessary work. The Commissioners of Sewers (now succeeded by the Corporation), as the highway authority, desired to attach to their consent the condition "that the pipes in question were to be used for public purposes only by the Post Office authorities, and that they would not be let or handed over to others." Later on the Post Office were informed by letter "that the Commission do not object to the opening of streets by the Post Office authorities for laying underground telegraph wires for their own purposes, but that the Commission still objects to giving any consent to wires being laid for the use of the National Telephone Company unless the telephone company are prepared to provide an improved service at a reduced cost, in accordance with the evidence given on behalf of the Commission to the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1895."

*Reported by R. H. BALLOCH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by T. WAGHORN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C. (Mr. Lyttelton Chubb with him), contended that in laying down wires to be subsequently rented and solely used by the telephone company the Postmaster-General was not acting in his official capacity but was virtually the agent of the telephone company, and as regards these subsidiary lines the work to be performed was subject to the right of absolute veto by the Corporation, and that the pecuniary terms and conditions mentioned in the Act of 1863 were wide enough to cover the claim of the Corporation to attach to their consent stipulations involving the reduction of the telephone tariff.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Mr. Casserley with him) was stopped by the Court.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that the Corporation, in seeking to restrict the consent given to the Post Office, had no doubt been actuated by no capacious or unfriendly spirit, but had striven to give effect to their view that when companies were making a profit by using streets for public purposes they should be compelled to give good value in return for concessions allowed to them. But the question arose as to whether they had the right of control which they claimed. It was clear that the stipulations mentioned in the latter part of subsection 3 had reference merely to matters in connexion with the construction of the work, and, reading the whole section together, it was clear also that the "pecuniary" terms and conditions mentioned were intended to be of a class with which the authorities could concern themselves in their character of road authorities. Even if it were open to them to seek to impose such conditions as were in question in this case, the Court were of opinion that they were not reasonable, and would, according to the terms of the Act, "consent" that the streets should be opened by the post-office authorized under the conditions usually imposed in such cases.

BIRMINGHAM BREWERIES (LIMITED) v. JAMESON.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant by lessee to buy beer of landlord or his assigns—Assignment of lease and reversion—Construction of agreement.

This was a case of some interest and importance to the tenants and owners of "tied" houses. By a lease dated November 5, 1889, and made between Alfred Hood, therein described as of "The Brewery, Nechells, Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, brewer (hereinafter called 'the lessor')," of the one part, and John S. Nock, therein described as of "100, Nechells-park-road, Nechells, Aston-juxta-Birmingham, beer retailer (hereinafter called 'the lessee')," of the other part, the lessor demised unto the lessee a beerhouse at 82, Guildford-street, Lozells, for 14 years from June 21, 1889. The lease contained the following covenant:—"And the lessee hereby covenants with the lessor . . . that he, the lessee, his executors, administrators, lessees, tenants, and assigns, and all other persons for the time being carrying on the business of a beer retailer or publican upon the said premises will and shall during the said term of years hereby granted deal exclusively with the lessor or his firm of Messrs. Hood and Sons or his or their successors in business for all beers, ales, porter, stout (except bottled stout), and other like articles which shall be sold or consumed upon the said hereby demised premises, or shall be brought thereon to be so sold or consumed; and will not nor shall during the said term on any pretence whatsoever purchase, take in, or receive, or have in his or their possession, or directly or indirectly sell or dispose of, or permit the sale, disposal, or consumption, in or upon the said premises of any such articles other than such as shall have been purchased or taken of the lessor or his firm or his or their successors in business, provided that he or they shall be willing to supply the same at the price and terms usually charged by the lessor or his firm to his or their tenants." The lease also contained a declaration that "where the context allows the expressions 'the lessor' and 'the lessee' used in these premises include besides the said Alfred Hood his executors, administrators, and assigns, besides the said John Sidney Nock his executors, administrators, and assigns." The lease was afterwards assigned to the defendant, John Jameson, who carried on on the premises the business of a beer retailer and publican. A. Hood, in 1894, assigned the reversion expectant on the lease to a company, which, in 1896, assigned such reversion to the plaintiff company; Messrs. Hood and Sons were still carrying on their business at the brewery at Nechells. The defendant had refused to deal exclusively with the plaintiff company for his beers, whereupon that company brought the present action for an injunction to restrain him from buying his beers elsewhere. He was willing to buy his beers from Messrs. Hood and Sons. The question in dispute was whether the covenant compelled him to deal only with the plaintiff company.

Mr. Dunham was for the plaintiff company; and Mr. Douglas for the defendant.

Mr. JUSTICE BYRNE, in delivering judgment, said no question was raised as to whether the plaintiff company could sue on the covenant or whether the benefit of the covenant ran with the reversion. As Lord Justice Cotton said in "Clegg v. Hands" (L.R., 44 Ch.D., 503, 517), cases, so far as they gave us a rule of construction, were very useful, but it was very seldom that a case upon the construction of one particular document told much about the construction of another document unless it laid down some principle to guide us; and accordingly the Lord Justice had proceeded to distinguish the case before him from "Doe v. Reid" (10 B. and C., 849), which had been cited by Mr. Douglas in the present case, pointing out that the lease in that case contained different words and that no rule was thereby laid down which he was bound to follow. The question here was, Had his Lordship, throughout the lease, to use the words "executors, administrators, and assigns"? He must do so where the context allowed this to be done. At first he had been struck with the contention that it would be reasonable to say that the context of the covenant did not allow the interpretation clause to apply to that part of the lease. The covenant was by the lessee, and was that he, "his executors, administrators, lessees, tenants, and assigns, and all other persons for the time being carrying on the business," would purchase the beers. These words were inserted to show that underlessees and others were to fulfil the obligations under the lease. That being so, the covenant would, as explained by the interpretation clause, run so as to relate to dealing with the lessor, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or his firm, and it was said that although the lessor, his executors, administrators, or assigns were the only persons who could sue on the covenant, yet the obligation was fulfilled if the lessee traded with Hood, or with his firm even if Hood had left the firm. Lord Justice Lindley in "Clegg v. Hands" said:—"I agree with Mr. Collins in thinking that this case is one of very great importance both to brewers and tenants who take tied houses, because it certainly is rather a startling thing to anybody to be told that when you have agreed to buy beer of a particular brewer you may find yourself bound to take beer from somebody else. Whether you are or are not depends upon the agreement into which you have entered. The whole question here turns upon the true construction of this agreement, and the only difficulty that I think serious is to find out whether this agreement is or is not assignable—that is to say, whether the tenant here entered into a contract with certain persons, relying upon their personal skill and reputation, and agreed to buy beer of them and them alone, or whether he did not enter into a very much wider contract and agree to buy beer from them or anybody to whom they might assign the business or the publichouse. The answer to the question whether this is a personal unassignable contract or not must be gathered from the instrument itself, having regard of course to the position of both parties." The argument as presented by one side was that it was startling that a man who knew the quality of one person's beers might be obliged to take other persons' beers. But that argument could only prevail on ambiguities and could not affect the words of the covenant. In the present case there was a covenant with the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, which they might enforce, that they were to be the persons to dictate to the tenant as to the beers which he was to take, and his Lordship might point out that the tenant was not to take beer which had been brewed at a particular place, but which was to be supplied only. The contract was for the benefit of the lessor, and not for the benefit of his firm except in so far as he was a member of that firm. The injunction must therefore be granted and the defendant must pay the costs. His Lordship suspended the injunction in the event of notice of appeal being given within a fortnight.

THE MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT, 1882. IN THE MATTER OF AN ELECTION PETITION TOUCHING THE ELECTION FOR THE OFFICE OF MEMBERS OF THE SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON—LORD MONKSWELL AND OTHERS V. THOMPSON.*

Election Law—School Board—Recount—Voting papers—Validity.

After a school-board election for five seats, there being eight candidates, the sixth on the poll petitioned for a recount as between himself and the fifth. The recount resulted in his favour.

Held, that to unseat the respondent it was not necessary for the petitioner further to show that the respondent was not among the first five.

This was a special case stated under an order made by Mr. Justice Kennedy on December 21, 1897, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (see ante, p. 163), in the matter of an election petition presented by Lord Monkswell and other persons against the return of Mr. William Whitaker Thompson, the respondent, in the election of members of the Chelsea Division of the School Board of London, held on November 25, 1897. The petition further prayed that Mr. Leslie Morton Johnson might be declared duly elected.

Mr. S. Day and Mr. Kenrick appeared for the petitioners; and Mr. Yarborough Anderson for the respondent.

There were eight candidates for election, and five seats. The respondent was fifth on the poll, with 13,221 votes, and Mr. Johnson was sixth, with 13,218. The fourth candidate, Viscount Morpeth, polled 13,292 votes. A recount as between Mr. Johnson and the respondent was called for on behalf of Mr. Johnson, the result of which was to show that Mr. Johnson had polled 13,183 votes and the respondent 13,176, giving Mr. Johnson a majority of seven votes over the respondent. Twenty-three ballot papers remained in dispute. Of these, Mr. Johnson claimed 11, as recording in the aggregate 23 votes in his favour, and the respondent the remainder as recording 22 votes in his favour. The Court were asked to decide upon the disputed ballot papers. The respondent contended, in addition, that even if Mr. Johnson should retain his majority over the respondent he was not entitled to either of the prayers prayed for in the petition, because he failed to show that the respondent was not among the first five candidates. It was decided to adjudicate upon the ballot papers before discussing the point of law. The result of the adjudications was to give Mr. Johnson 14 additional votes and the respondent 16, so that Mr. Johnson still retained a majority of five over the respondent. The first voting paper had a mark opposite the name of Mr. Johnson, which might have been either a 3 or a 5. There were no other marks on the paper.

Mr. ANDERSON claimed that the paper was void for uncertainty, but the mark was held to be a 5.

In the second paper the voter had given two votes to Johnson, two to Howard, and one to Maitland. Opposite the name of Thompson (the respondent), but outside the parallelogram provided for votes, and to the right of it, he had placed a cross and a line.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said that the cross and line, under the circumstances, afforded no indication that the voter intended to vote for Thompson, and, it not having been suggested that the mark was intended to be an indication of the name of the voter, the voting paper was allowed. A voting paper in which the voter had placed the figure 1 against three names and against the fourth had put 1 2, was held to be bad, because as the figures stood the voter appeared to have recorded 15 votes, being only entitled to five. Another paper had a cross opposite the name of Mr. Johnson, and opposite that of another candidate the figures 1 2 3. It was suggested that the voter intended to record three votes for that candidate, but the paper was disallowed. Another paper had, opposite the name of Mr. Johnson, two crosses, and over them was written the figure 3, two votes being recorded for Maitland. This paper was held to be good, as recording three votes for Mr. Johnson, their Lordships considering that the voter had intended in the first instance to vote by means of crosses, but, changing his mind before he had completed his vote, voted by means of a figure. An incomplete 5 with a cross over it was held to be one vote for Mr. Johnson. A paper containing a cross, over which the figure 2 had been placed, was held to confer two votes on Mr. Johnson, but where a 2 opposite Mr. Johnson's name was superseded by a cross, three other votes being recorded on the paper, the votes for Mr. Johnson were held to have been cancelled. Three papers, containing votes for the respondent, contained other votes, by figures, up to the number of five, but opposite the names of the remaining candidates crosses were inserted. It was held that the papers were good, no votes being intended to be recorded by means of the crosses.

All the voting papers having been disposed of, Mr. ANDERSON proceeded to argue the point of law. He said that the petition was filed under section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and the election was questioned therein, on the ground that the respondent was "not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes." That was the same thing as to say that the respondent was not among the first five candidates. The question, therefore, was whether there should be a recount of the votes of all the candidates or whether the recount should be limited to the votes of Mr. Johnson and the respondent, the fifth and sixth candidates. When the matter came before Mr. Justice Kennedy the respondent offered to abandon a recount as to the first three candidates provided the recount were granted as to the fourth, fifth, and sixth candidates. But Mr. Justice Kennedy's order limited the recount to the votes of the fifth and sixth candidates. The Court of Appeal affirmed that order, saying that it would be open to the respondent to raise the point of law he now raised in the High Court. Counsel put the case of a candidate, sixth on the return, there being five seats, who petitioned against that candidate only who was first on the return, and on the recount, owing to the discovery of a large number of votes which ought to have been counted in favour of the first-named candidate, it was found that he himself was entitled to occupy the first place. If the petitioners were right the first-named candidate would be entitled to turn out the candidate lately at the head of the poll, even though such last-named candidate retained a sufficient number of votes to entitle him to the second place. He would not, at any rate, have the right to turn out the fifth candidate, because ex hypothesi no petition was presented against him.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL.—But the candidate who was beaten on the recount would still have the right to petition against the remaining candidates.

Mr. ANDERSON, continuing, said that a petitioner undertook to proceed against the right man. A candidate who was in ought not to be compelled to petition against the other candidates.

Mr. Willoughby Williams, for the petitioners, was not called upon to argue.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS said that he was of opinion that the application of the respondent to have a recount of the votes of all the candidates must fail. The Ballot Act, 1872, section 2, set forth the manner in which the election was to be held. After the close of the poll the ballot-boxes were to be sealed up and taken in charge by the returning officer, and such officer, in the presence of the representatives of the candidates, was to open the boxes and count the votes and was forthwith to declare the candidate or candidates to be elected for whom the largest number of votes had been polled, and he was to declare their names to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery. It was declared that the decision of the returning officer should be final, subject to its reversal on a petition questioning the election or return. On the returning officer's original return the respondent was three votes ahead of Mr. Johnson. As regarded the first four candidates, the 21 days had elapsed during which petitions might have been presented, and nobody suggested that any question arose as to their votes, so that the decision of the returning officer, so far as regards the votes of these candidates, was final. But the respondent's votes were attacked. The result of the recount was to show that the name of Mr. Johnson ought to have been in front of that of the respondent. His Lordship doubted whether they had any power to interfere. But supposing they had, he was of opinion that the Legislature intended that there should be finality as regarded the votes not petitioned against within 21 days.

Mr. ANDERSON.—I do not ask now for a recount. I ask that the petition should be dismissed for want of proof.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS.—Then the question is much easier. Continuing, he said that the person who asserted a fact must prove it. Mr. Johnson had shown that he was above the respondent. Therefore, unless the respondent could show some ground for saying that by means of further inquiry it would be found that he himself had polled more votes than Lord Morpeth or some others of the candidates placed above him on the return, his objection failed. But there was no suggestion or complaint of any error with regard to the votes of the first four candidates. The figures in the return had remained unchallenged. Nothing appeared in the case to show that any good would come to any one from a recount of those votes. The returning officer's return was prima facie evidence of the number of those votes. The return as regards them being unchallenged the numbers stated therein were prima facie correct. There was no suggestion of any particular mischief. There was nothing but the merest surmise that if they were recounted they might possibly be found not to exceed the votes of the respondent. The judgment of the Court, therefore, was in favour of the petitioners, because on the recount it had been shown that there was an error in the former count putting the respondent in a majority over the candidate on whose behalf the petition was presented, and no ground was shown why the petitioners should go to the expense of challenging the return as regards the votes of the other candidates.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said, I am of the same opinion. The respondent ought to be unseated, and Mr. Johnson ought to be seated in his place. The facts we go on are that, as it is now ascertained, Mr. Johnson had a few more votes than the respondent and that there were four other candidates with considerably more votes, according to the return. I think we ought to take the figures appearing in the return as the basis of our judgment. It is the duty of the returning officer to count the votes, and unless an error is shown the figures returned by him must be taken to be correct. If a person makes an allegation, the burden of proving it is on him. We start with the returning officer's figures. Who says they are wrong? The petitioners do not. They have shown that the figures denoting the number of votes polled by the fifth and sixth candidates were wrong. But they do not challenge the figures in the case of the first four candidates, nor does the respondent show that the figures in the case of the first four candidates are wrong. If he had done so, and had succeeded in showing that any one of the four had polled a less number of votes than he himself had polled, subject to his having adopted the proper proceeding, the result would follow that he could not have been unseated. But it is not sufficient for him to show that he may have had more votes than one of the candidates placed above him. That disposes of the dilemma put by the learned counsel in this case, suggested by him, of a petition in which the petitioners proceeded against the candidate who was head of the poll. If such a petition were presented, and no petition were presented against the other successful candidates, and the result of a recount were that the votes of the candidates lately at the head of the poll were reduced so that he was no longer among the first five candidates, he would have to go out. But if he retained his place as regards the remainder of the successful candidates, he would have the right to petition against any of those candidates. There would then be no difficulty about the judgment. The only difficulty here is to understand what the Court of Appeal intended to do in this case. That Court seem to have understood Mr. Anderson to be raising the point he raises here—namely, that it was necessary for the petitioners to go into the number of votes polled by the other successful candidates. But Mr. Anderson states that he intended to make a separate application for a recount of the votes of the other candidates. We accept that statement. Still, there are passages in the judgments of the Court of Appeal which clearly show they were dealing with the other proposition. If they decided that the respondent ought not to have the recount he asked for, they were, no doubt, right. It may be that he ought not to have the recount because he failed to present a petition within the proper time. It is true he might not have the opportunity of presenting such a petition if the petition against himself were deferred until the last moment. But that would be his misfortune. It is sufficient to say that it has not been shown that there is any error in the figures in the return, and the presumption is that they are correct. The first four figures are correct, and the fifth and sixth have been altered so as to reverse the position of the candidates. Mr. Johnson, therefore, must be seated, and the respondent unseated.

Mr. WILLOUGHBY WILLIAMS asked for costs.

Mr. ANDERSON opposed the application on the ground that neither party were to blame.

Costs were granted against the respondent.

Leave to appeal was also granted, after some demur, on the question whether it was the duty of the petitioner to show that the result of the recount was that the respondent was not among the first five candidates, taking into consideration the votes polled by all the candidates.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that he thought there ought to be leave to appeal, not because he entertained any doubts, but because he may have misunderstood the views of the Court of Appeal.

THE LOWER RHINE AND WÜRTTEMBERG INSURANCE ASSOCIATION V. SEDGWICK.*

Insurance—Marine—Re-insurance—Lapse of original policies—Fresh policies.

Defendant re-insured certain risks with plaintiffs. Of the two original policies covering these risks one lapsed and the other was cancelled, the defendants issuing a fresh policy to the assured which contained provisions differing from those in the two original policies. No notice of these facts was sent to plaintiffs.

Held, that defendants having paid a total loss were entitled to recover from the plaintiffs.

This was an action brought to recover back money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant under a mistake of fact. The circumstances were as follows:—The defendant, who is an underwriter at Lloyd's, subscribed, together with other underwriters, certain policies of marine insurance upon the steamship Collynie—namely, (1) a policy running from noon on February 20, 1896, until noon on February 20, 1897, upon steamer valued at, hull £3,600, machinery £2,000—total, £5,600. The amount insured was £350, of which the defendant's "line" was £50, the remaining £300 being subscribed by his six other "names." The premium was nine guineas per cent. The policy included the conditions of time clauses as attached. (2) A policy running from June 20, 1896, until June 20, 1897. The valuation and provision as to time clauses were the same as in the first policy. The amount insured was £850, of which the defendant's line was £25, the line taken by his names being £150. The premium was nine guineas per cent. The "time clauses" attached to the two original policies provided that "the insured value should be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss," and made provision for the return of a certain portion of premium in certain events. On November 27, 1896, the defendant and his six other names effected with the plaintiffs a policy of re-insurance upon the Collynie running from November 4, 1896, until June 20, 1897. The valuation of hull and machinery was £5,600. The amount insured was £250. The policy contained the following clause:—"Being a re-insurance of policy or policies, and subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses, as original policy or policies, whether re-insurance or otherwise, and to pay as may be paid thereon." This clause was stamped on the margin with a rubber stamp, and is known as one of the rubber clauses. The slip was in these terms:—"4 Nov. to 20 June, '97. On hull, &c., valued at £5,600. Time clauses as original. 10 guineas. £250 Lower Rhine, 4-11. In the event of any inaccuracy in description of voyage, interest, name of vessel, clauses, or conditions, it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium to be arranged." The defendant's original policies were not asked for or shown to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs themselves again re-insured, under a policy dated November 12, 1896, against total loss only. On February 20, 1897, the first of the original policies expired and the second was cancelled, and their place was taken by a fresh policy dated February 20, 1897, and running from noon on February 20, 1897, to noon on February 20, 1898. The valuation of hull and machinery was reduced to £5,000; the premium was 10 guineas per cent. without discount. The amount insured was £1,040, of which the line of the defendant was £50, and of his other names £50 each, or £350 in all. No notice of the cancellation and expiration of the first two policies and of the issue of a fresh policy was sent to the plaintiffs. On May 3, 1897, the Collynie became a total loss, and the defendant paid his assured for a total loss. The plaintiffs paid the defendant and his other "names" a total loss on the policy of November 27, 1896, without asking for production of original policies. When the plaintiffs sought to recover from their re-insurers, their re-insurers required to be shown the original policies, whereupon the plaintiffs ascertained the facts relating to the cancellation of the policy dated June 20 and the substitution of the policy of February 20, 1897, and this action was brought to recover back the moneys paid to the defendant.

Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. Joseph Hurst appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendant.

Mr. HARRISON, Q.C., argued that the terms of the re-insurance policy showed that it was based on the existence at the date of that re-insurance of some actual policy or policies and only covered the risks insured by such policy or policies. The original policies came to an end on February 20, 1897, and the defendant had no right to impose a new risk on the plaintiffs, certainly not a more onerous risk, as the risk under the policy of February 20, 1897, was.

Mr. SCRUTTON said that no point would be made of payment having been made by the plaintiffs; the only question was, Was the defendant entitled to recover on his re-insurance? All he had to show was that at the time of the loss he was interested in the subject-matter of insurance to the amount insured, and that the loss came within the policy. The defendant was interested as re-insurer. An assured might change his interest during the currency of the policy. He was entitled to recover if he had paid a loss, provided there was no term in the re-insurance policy to prevent him from recovering.

The case was argued on February 8 and 10, and at the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship reserved judgment.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, having stated the facts, said that the only question was whether the defendant could have legally claimed against the plaintiffs on the policy of re-insurance. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to recover back the moneys they had paid on the following grounds:—(1) They said that their re-insurance policy was only effectual in respect of payments made by the defendant under policies which were in existence at the time the re-insurance policy was effected, and there was no doubt that neither of the policies underwritten by the defendant before the date of the re-insurance policy was in existence at the time of the loss; (2) they said that the policy which was in existence at the date of the loss, and under which the defendant had paid, contained provisions differing from those contained in the first two policies and from those which appeared to be embodied in the re-insurance policy, the main points of difference being the amount of the valuation, the rate of premium, and the amounts to be returned in case the vessel should be laid up. They contended that, even if the defendant could claim upon a policy effected after the date of the re-insurance policy, he could only do so if his new policy contained no such points of difference from his original policies. In the opinion of the learned Judge these contentions were not well founded. If this were treated as an action in which the defendant was seeking to recover from the plaintiffs, how could a good legal plea be framed in answer to the defendant's claim? He had an insurable interest as insurer in the subject-matter of insurance at the time of the loss. That was sufficient. It was unnecessary to aver interest at the time of effecting the policy. Even if that were not so, and it was necessary for him to show an insurable interest as insurer at the time of effecting the policy of re-insurance, the defendant had such an interest under the first two policies. It was immaterial that such an interest should have increased or diminished by the time of the loss; he was interested at both times, and if there had been any change it was a change which only affected his relations with his own assured, and did not affect his insurable interest. The reference in the re-insurance policy to the original policy was, in his Lordship's opinion, a reference to such policy as might happen to be in existence at the date of the loss, and the stipulation that it was to be "subject to the same clauses" and "to pay as may be paid" meant that whatever claims the defendant paid as original insurer the plaintiffs would pay as re-insurers, unless there was something in the terms of the re-insurance policy to diminish or qualify their liability. Great stress has been laid on the differences in valuation and its possible effect in the case of a claim for constructive total loss, and no doubt difficult questions might arise, but in this case there was an actual total loss, and no such difficulty arose. There was nothing in the slip to alter the relations of the parties. The rate of premium and of return of premium was not a matter which concerned the plaintiffs at all. The learned Judge said that in his opinion it would have been impossible to frame a good plea in answer to the defendant's claim. There would be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

ASHWORTH V. WELLS.*

Damages—Measure of—Sale of orchid—Breach of warranty.

The plaintiff bought at a sale an orchid, which was warranted by the defendant as a Cattleya Aclandiae alba, for 20 guineas. After two years' cultivation by the plaintiff it flowered, and turned out to be an ordinary purple one, which was worth about 7s. 6d. In an action for breach of warranty the County Court Judge found that if the plant had been an alba it would have been worth £50 at the time of sale, but that until it showed its real nature there was no probability that any orchid grower would give more than 20 guineas for it.

Held, that the true meaning of the warranty was that if and when the orchid flowered it would flower white, that there had been no breach of the warranty until two years after the sale, and that the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to judgment for £50 damages.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 170) varied.

This was an appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence) on an appeal from the Manchester County Court (reported ante, p. 170). The plaintiff, an amateur orchid-grower, bought an orchid at a sale of the defendant's collection of orchids in June, 1895. It was warranted by the defendant as a "Cattleya Aclandiae alba, seven bulbs and three leaves, the only known plant," and it was knocked down to the plaintiff for 20 guineas. It had never flowered while in the possession of the defendant, and it turned out after two years' cultivation by the plaintiff to be not an alba or white Cattleya, but the ordinary purple one, which was worth only 7s. 6d. The plaintiff having brought this action for damages, the defendant admitted liability and paid into Court £23 2s. The County Court Judge held that if the plant had been an alba it would have been worth more than £50 at the time of the sale, but that until it showed its real nature there was no probability that any orchid-grower would give more than 20 guineas for it. He thought that the sum paid in was enough and gave judgment for the defendant. The Divisional Court thought that the case ought to be tried again, and sent it back to the County Court Judge. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the defendant; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Tweedale for the plaintiff.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiff for £50. There had been a public sale by auction of a collection of orchids belonging to the defendant. It was admitted by the defendant that one of the entries in the catalogue constituted a warranty with regard to a certain orchid. It was as follows:—“Cattleya Aclandiae alba, seven bulbs and three leaves, the only known plant.” The purple Cattleya was a common plant; the white Cattleya was exceedingly rare, or rather, if the catalogue was correct, unknown. The plaintiff attended the sale and bought this orchid on the faith of the warranty for 20 guineas. If it was purple it was only worth 7s. 6d. Now what was the nature of the warranty? In his judgment, according to the true reading of the clause in the catalogue, it was a warranty by the defendant that this orchid, when it flowered, would flower white. There was no warranty that it would flower, or even that it would live. The plaintiff therefore had to wait the ordinary course of events for the plant to flower, and in two years’ time it did flower, not, however, according to the warranty, but it flowered purple. The plaintiff complained that there had been a breach of the warranty, and brought this action in the County Court for £50. The defendant paid into Court the sum of 20 guineas, the price which the plaintiff had paid for the orchid, and a sum of two guineas for interest, and a further small sum to cover the costs of the plaint. The real question in the case was whether the plaintiff was in law entitled to any damages beyond the 20 guineas which he had paid for the plant on the faith of the warranty. The County Court Judge thought that the plaintiff was not entitled to any further damages, and he gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that the sum which he had paid into Court was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff’s claim. The Divisional Court had made an order that the case should be sent back for a new trial. In his opinion it should not go back for a new trial, but judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for £50. At the trial there had been abundant evidence, which was uncontradicted, that the orchid, if it was white, was worth 100 guineas. But no one could possibly tell at the time of the sale whether it was white or not. The plaintiff had to wait to find that out, and after waiting he found that the warranty was broken. Under those circumstances, What were the damages to which the plaintiff was entitled? It was said that he was only entitled to such damages as he could show that he had suffered at the time when the article was delivered. In the great majority of cases that was the proper rule, the market value being the chief factor to be considered. But the plaintiff in this case was, in his opinion, entitled to prove that he had suffered special damages, and he might wait a reasonable time to see what those damages were. This orchid could not properly be said to have any market value at all. The County Court Judge found as a fact that, if it was an alba, it was at the time of the sale worth more than £50. The evidence showed that it would have been worth more than £100, but with regard to the jurisdiction of the County Court it was sufficient to say it was worth more than £50. That finding seemed to him to dispose of the case, and he thought that the County Court Judge ought thereupon to have given judgment for the plaintiff for £50. But he went on, and proceeded to find further that until the plant showed its real nature there was no probability that any orchid grower would give more than 20 guineas for it. He thought that the County Court Judge, in coming to this further finding, had misdirected himself. The warranty was that, when the plant flowered, it would flower white. The plaintiff was entitled to wait until it did flower, which did not happen for two years, and it was a mistake to say, when it did flower and the warranty proved to be broken, that the measure of damages was to be regulated by what the plaintiff had given for the plant two years before. The price which he gave was no criterion of the loss which he sustained. In his opinion, therefore, the appeal failed, and judgment must be entered as he had stated.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said it had been argued that the only damages which had been sustained were represented by the difference between the value of the plant at the time of the sale and what would have been its value if it had answered to the warranty at the time of the sale. He thought that this was not a case in which that general principle could be applied. This was a special kind of warranty, and, in his opinion, the plaintiff had shown special damage. He thought that the first part of the finding of the County Court Judge settled the question, and that what followed gave rise to the difficulty which had been felt in the case. The plaintiff could not bring his action until he had ascertained that the orchid bore a purple flower. He therefore agreed with the judgment which had been delivered by Lord Justice A. L. Smith.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he agreed in the main with his learned brethren, but he felt some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the County Court Judge, in whose hands the question of damages rested, and who had found £20 to be the sum to which the plaintiff was entitled, had misdirected himself. The general principle seemed clear enough—that in cases of breach of warranty the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price of the thing sold with the warranty and the market price or real value if it could be ascertained, and any special damages following from the buyer acting on the warranty might be added. Here the distinction seemed to be between the value of the plant with the contingency that it might flower and the value of the plant when it had flowered. If the County Court Judge meant that, and came to the conclusion that the true value of the plant with that uncertainty was no more than the money paid into Court, he felt a difficulty in saying that he was wrong. But he was satisfied that they were not giving the plaintiff too much, and he would not differ from the judgments which had been delivered.

TAYLOR V. BURGER.*

Ship—Collision at entrance to harbour—Duty of outgoing and incoming ships.

This was an appeal from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session in conjoined actions in the Court of Session, in the first of which the respondents, shipowners of Rotterdam, registered owners of the steamship Talisman, of Rotterdam, were pursuers, and the appellant, registered owner of the steam tug Tyne, of Grangemouth, was defender; and in the second, the latter was pursuer and the former defenders. The actions were for damages sustained by the Talisman and the Tyne respectively in consequence of a collision between the two vessels at or near the entrance into the Albert Basin, Leith. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Stormonth Darling) found that the collision was not caused by the fault of any one for whom the owner of the Tyne was responsible, and he was therefore assolized in the action at the instance of the owner of the Talisman; and he was held entitled to have decree in his own action for the damage, which the Lord Ordinary assessed at £86 16s. 8d. In the Second Division a majority of their Lordships—the Lord Justice Clerk (Lord Macdonald) and Lords Young and Trayner, Lord Moncreiff dissenting, reversed the decision of the Lord Ordinary, and held that the Tyne was liable for the damage done to the Talisman.

Mr. Pyke, Q.C., and Mr. Henry Aitken (of the Scottish Bar) were for the appellant; Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Ure, Q.C., for the respondents.

The arguments lasted the whole of yesterday, and were concluded this morning.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the decision of the Second Division should be reversed and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored, said that the decision appealed from was based on a misapprehension of the place where the accident happened and the proximity of the vessels. The two vessels which were in collision were respectively of 28ft. and of 36ft. beam. The passage through which they were expected to pass was only 60ft. across. The question therefore arose which was to give way to the other. The universal rule was that an outgoing vessel should get clear of a dock or harbour before the incomer entered. In addition to this general rule there was to be considered the harbour-master's conduct. He called out to the Fiery Cross, another tug then in the harbour, and to the Tyne, "Why don't you go out?" Both vessels did their best to obey the order. The Fiery Cross cleared the Talisman without collision, but the Tyne was not able to do so. It was the primary duty of the master of the Tyne to obey the order, and not to exercise his own judgment as to its expediency, and any other view would be fatal to the authority of a harbour-master. An order was also given to the Talisman to go astern, which order was not fully obeyed, as it could not be said that merely bringing the vessel into a stationary position was a compliance with it. In a sense the responsibility lay with the harbour-master, who gave the order to the several vessels. But in his Lordship's view the harbour-master had acted rightly. In a question of this kind greater weight ought to be attached to the judgment of the learned Judge, who saw and heard the witnesses, than had been attributed to it by the Lords of the Second Division. The Tyne, in his opinion, was in no way to blame, and the Talisman had created the whole difficulty by not fully obeying the order to go astern.

LORD WATSON said that the master of the Tyne was ordered, or at least invited, to leave the dock. He was justified in obeying that order or invitation even if the space were insufficient to enable him to get clear, and in circumstances in which, if he had acted on his own responsibility, he would have been guilty of negligence. In point of fact there was not sufficient room left for the Tyne to pass out of the lock into the basin, and it was possible that the harbour-master was mistaken as to the available space. He did not agree with Lord Young that the harbour-master's evidence ought to be accepted simply because he was an official. The Talisman, without any direction from the harbour-master, advanced so near to the west end of the lock as to become a possible source of danger. There was a weak tide, and the Fiery Cross passed, contrary to the usual regulations, and after she had passed the order was given to the Talisman to go astern. The master of the Talisman gave his engines a backward touch which stopped her way, so that she became stationary. When the harbour-master invited the Tyne to proceed he had not the opportunity of observing any forward movement of the Talisman, whose position had not necessarily remained unchanged by wind and tide. He concurred with the motion of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD HERSCHELL said that the question was which of the vessels was to blame or whether both of them were in fault. The Talisman was in a position which she ought not to have occupied; and thus the initial blame, at all events, rested with her. It had been said that she was in that position with the approval of the harbour-master, and that such approval was equivalent to an order. He could not accept that argument. The Talisman's duty was clearly to leave room for the Tyne to pass, and the only order she received was to go astern. The master of the Tyne had acted with care and prudence, and even if he had been guilty of any error of detail or management, of which his Lordship believed him guiltless, the blame would still rest with the Talisman, which was in a wrong position, and had not obeyed the order to go astern.

LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND said that the Talisman had clearly advanced too close to the dock, and there was a wind driving her in that direction. Ordinary prudence and care for others should have held her back, apart from the harbour-master's order to go astern which had not been obeyed. He agreed that the Tyne was not in any way to blame.

LORD JAMES OF HERFORD concurred.

REG. V. MOORE.

Criminal Law—Manslaughter—Deceased killed in football match—Violence causing death—Proper direction to jury.

At Leicester, on Feb. 15, before Mr. Justice Hawkins, Henry Moore was indicted for the manslaughter of John Briggs. The deceased was killed in a football match, and a strange feature of the case was that a young man named Veasey who was playing in the same match, and who had given strong evidence against the prisoner before the magistrates, was himself killed a few weeks later in another football match. A large number of witnesses were called for the prosecution and their evidence showed that in a match between Aylestone and Enderby, the prisoner was playing back for Enderby and the deceased was playing forward for Aylestone. The ball had been passed to Briggs and he dribbled it past Moore. Moore ran after Briggs, who kicked the ball rather hard towards the Enderby goal. The goalkeeper ran forward to kick the ball and save his goal. Just as he kicked, Moore jumped with his knees up against Briggs's back, and threw him violently forward against the knee of the goalkeeper. Briggs fell to the ground, but Moore was said not to have fallen at all. Briggs was seriously injured internally and died a few days afterwards. The witnesses for the defence gave a different version of what had occurred. They said that Briggs ran against the goalkeeper's knee before Moore touched him at all, that Briggs then fell to the ground, and while he was on the ground Moore tripped over him and also fell.

The learned JUDGE, in summing up, said that the rules of the game were quite immaterial, and it did not matter whether the prisoner broke the rules or not. Football was a lawful game, but it was a rough one, and persons who played it must be careful to restrain themselves so as not to do bodily harm to any other person. No one had a right to use force which was likely to injure another, and if he did use such force and death resulted the crime of manslaughter had been committed. If a blow were struck recklessly which caused a man to fall, and if in falling he struck against something, and was injured and died, the person who struck the blow was guilty of manslaughter, even though the blow itself would not have caused injury. The Judge, having commented upon the discrepancies in the evidence and of the roughness of the game (upon which a strong light was thrown by the fact that a player in the same club had been since killed) asked the jury whether or not the prisoner had used illegal violence.

The jury found a verdict of Guilty. The vicar of Enderby gave the convicted young man a most excellent character, and the Judge postponed sentence. Mr. Garrett and Mr. Disney were counsel for the Crown; and Mr. Buszard, Q.C., and Mr. Hugo Young were for the prisoner. It is remarkable that the only other case which is reported of a trial for manslaughter because of violence in the football field was a Leicester case. This was "Reg. v. Bradshaw" (14 Cox, C.C., 83) tried in the year 1878 before Baron Bramwell. In that case the learned Judge gave directions to the jury very similar to those given in the present case, but the accused was acquitted.

County Court—Practice—Appeal—Stamp—Ruling of Judge.

There is no appeal from the decision of a County Court Judge on the sufficiency of a stamp affixed to a document tendered in evidence.

This was an appeal from a County Court, and the question was raised whether there was any right of appeal from the decision of a County Court Judge on the sufficiency of a stamp affixed to a document. The Judge had held that a certain document was properly stamped. This was an appeal against his decision.

Mr. WILLIAM GRAHAM appeared for the defendant, and contended that such an appeal existed.

Mr. Macaskie appeared on the other side.

Mr. GRAHAM said there was a general right of appeal given by section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1889, with certain exceptions, of which this was not one; therefore then a right of appeal existed.

Mr. MACASKIE contended that there was no appeal. There was no authority in support of any such right though County Courts had been established 50 years. It was clear that there was no appeal in the High Court. It would be very remarkable if it could be done in cases of very minor importance and not in High Court cases. He cited "Siordet v. Kuczynski" (17 C.B., 251), and "Blewitt v. Tritton" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 327), which showed that when a Judge trying an action in the High Court ruled that the stamp was sufficient his decision was final. Section 164 of the County Court Act provided that the principles of the High Court practice should be applied to County Courts where no rule or statute was applicable.

The COURT held that there was no appeal.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW said section 164 of the County Courts Act applied the principles of the High Court to the County Court in matters not provided for otherwise. The County Court Judge here had decided that the document was properly stamped. In the High Court such a decision would be final; therefore it was final in the County Court, and there was, therefore, no right of appeal.

COLBECK V. ASHFORD.*

Fishery—Nets—Bye-law—North-Eastern Sea
Fisheries district—Trawl net.

This was a special case stated by justices for the East Riding of Yorkshire, sitting at Bridlington, who had convicted the appellant, a solicitor, of breaking a bye-law, made in 1894, of the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries district in fishing with a trawl net on August 4 eastward of the south landing at Flamborough. The question was whether the particular net which was used by him was within the words of the bye-law, which is as follows:—"A person shall not use in fishing for sea fish any trawl or trawl net, or any net having a beam which is pulled or pushed or otherwise propelled along or over the bottom of or in the sea or along or over the seashore, or any seine net, sand-eel net, spurling net, baffle net or offal net." Certain exceptions not material in this case followed.

Mr. R. D. Isaacs appeared for the appellant; Mr. H. T. Kemp for the respondent.

It appeared that the appellant was engaged off the pier with a steam yacht about 50ft. long experimenting and catching fish with an "otter" trawl net of a new construction. It was stated that the inventor, who had just been through a course of litigation in support of his patent, was on board. This particular net was one which had no beam across from side to side as in the usual form of trawl net, but two "otter" boards, fixed by a new mechanical system and kept apart by their motion through the water, held a line across instead of a beam. The justices, notwithstanding the absence of a beam, convicted the appellant, fined him £10, and confiscated his gear.

Mr. ISAACS contended that the words of the bye-law only applied to a trawl net with a beam. This was a new invention as applied to a trawl net. He cited dictionary definitions to show that a beam was always a part of a trawl net.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW referred to the words of the bye-law and said the Court was asked to say that this net was not within those words. The bye-laws, however, were made in 1894, and this kind of net was probably known then. They must be construed in their natural sense. He was not satisfied that a beam was an essential part of a trawl net. The conviction must be affirmed. A severe penalty had been inflicted, but with that this Court had nothing to do.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT concurred. He thought that perhaps the authority to whom the fine went might be induced to consider favourably an application for remission of some part of the fine.

THE GLENGYLE—THE NEPTUNE SALVAGE COMPANY OF STOCKHOLM AND OTHERS V. THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP GLENGYLE.*

Ship—Salvage—Award—Vessels specially built and equipped for salvage services—Award confirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes in an action of salvage, reported in The Times of December 7. The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were two foreign companies, as the owners of the salvage steamers Hermes and Newa, and by the masters and crews of the steamers, to recover salvage for services rendered to the steamship Glengyle, her cargo and freight, in August, 1897. The Hermes was a screw steamer of 394 tons register, fitted with engines working up to 750 indicated horse power with a pumping capacity of 2,750 tons per hour and manned by a crew of 23 hands, and of the value of £22,000. The Newa was a screw steamer of 459 tons register, fitted with engines working up to 750 indicated horse power with a pumping capacity of 5,000 tons per hour and manned by a crew of 21 hands, and of the value of £20,000. Both the said steamers were specially built for and solely employed in rendering salvage services, and were equipped with divers and diving apparatus and powerful engines and pumps and other salving appliances. On August 26 the steamship Glengyle, of 3,455 tons gross register, on her voyage with passengers and cargo from London to China, came into collision with the steamship Coronet in the Straits of Gibraltar, and sustained serious damage in the way of the engine-room and commenced to sink. The Hermes and the Newa were lying at Gibraltar with steam up, and shortly after 3 a.m., in response to signals from the signal-station at Gibraltar, they proceeded to sea and found the Glengyle several miles away to the southwest with her engine-room full of water, her fires drowned out, large quantities of water in her holds, and no one on board of her. She was gradually settling down. They arrived at the Glengyle at 4 10 a.m. The master of the Glengyle from a boat requested that his vessel should be towed to Gibraltar if she would keep afloat long enough. The Hermes and Newa were made fast, the former ahead and the latter lashed to the starboard side of the Glengyle. As it appeared improbable that the Glengyle could reach Gibraltar, it was arranged to steer for Getares Bay, the nearest shore with a sandy bottom, where the Glengyle could be beached. The steering of the Glengyle caused the Hermes to break adrift twice, and the Glengyle was eventually beached in Getares Bay at 6 a.m. on the 26th. The holes in her sides were patched by divers, the pumping gear of the salving steamers set to work, and at night the Glengyle was floated and on the 27th was taken to Gibraltar Bay, where further work was done by the divers to the damaged places, and the pumping was continued until the 28th, when the Glengyle was able to keep down the water with her donkey-pump. The value of the Glengyle and of her cargo and freight, when salved, was agreed at £76,596. Mr. Justice Barnes, in giving judgment, said that the establishment and maintenance of salvage steamers such as the Hermes and Newa were for the general benefit of owners and underwriters and others interested in sea-going vessels and their cargoes and the crews and passengers of such vessels, and the Admiralty Court would be liberal in its awards in respect of services rendered by salvage steamers, even though the awards might fall somewhat heavily on individual owners. He accordingly awarded the sum of £19,000 to the owners, masters, and crews of the Hermes and Newa in equal moieties to each ship. He also awarded £300 to the owners, masters, and crews of two tugs, the Hercules and Nellie, who also came to the assistance of the Glengyle, and who were also plaintiffs in a salvage action. The defendants appealed and contended that the award was excessive.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Mr. Aspinall, Q.C. (Mr. Butler Aspinall with them), appeared for the defendants; Mr. F. W. Raikes, Q.C., and Mr. Dawson Miller appeared for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that his mind during the argument had fluctuated, but, in the result, he came to the conclusion that this salvage award, though large, must stand. It was said that this case was in the nature of a new departure, because the case of salvage vessels, built and kept exclusively for salvage purposes, had never before come up for consideration in the Admiralty Court. The facts here showed that these two salvage steamers, which were valued at £22,000 and £20,000 respectively, and which were specially built and equipped for salvage purposes, with a skilled crew, were kept at large expense at Gibraltar for salvage purposes. They came to the assistance of the Glengyle at 4 10 a.m. The sea was smooth, but the Glengyle was in such a moribund state that, if the salvage vessels had not come alongside the Glengyle, the latter would have sunk, and she and her cargo would have been lost. It was proved that both the salvage vessels incurred risk in getting the Glengyle ashore, and the crews of those vessels incurred considerable danger. The assessors had so advised them as to the risk run by the vessels. There was, therefore, imminent danger to and probable loss of the Glengyle, and danger to and possible loss of the two salvage vessels. The Glengyle was run ashore at 6 a.m. Further salvage services were subsequently rendered. In these circumstances the question was, what amount should be awarded to the plaintiffs? If this had been a case of ordinary salvage services rendered by ordinary tugs or by another vessel, speaking for himself he would have thought that upon the authorities £19,000 would be too much. Carrying out the rule of the Court, though it was not really a rule of the Court at all in the proper sense of that term, but merely a rule of thumb, in his opinion £19,000 would be too large. But in this case these salvage vessels were kept at great expense for salvage purposes exclusively, and he could not shut his eyes to the fact that unless these salvage vessels had been kept at Gibraltar for that purpose the Glengyle with her cargo and freight, valued at over £76,000, would have been lost. Taking all these circumstances into consideration he could not say that the learned Judge, who had taken all proper considerations into account in arriving at the sum, had awarded too large a sum.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. The question was, not whether they would have awarded the same sum, but whether they were satisfied that the sum was in excess, and largely in excess, of what should be awarded. In his opinion, there was no new departure in the principle upon which this case should be decided. There was merely an important new factor in this case. There were here two salvage vessels, valued at £42,000, fitted and kept exclusively for salvage purposes. It was, in his opinion, a matter of high importance to encourage persons to keep vessels of this kind at a port like Gibraltar. These salvage vessels had all the requisite appliances, and had divers on board and specially skilled crews. All that constituted an element to be taken into consideration, to which the learned

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judge in the Court below had not attributed too much importance. This Court could not say that the same award was excessive.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

Mr. ASPINALL, Q.C., asked for a stay of execution pending an appeal to the House of Lords, upon the ground that the plaintiffs were foreign companies.

The COURT granted a stay upon condition that the appeal was brought within three weeks.

IN RE THE PERRY ALMSHOUSES CHARITY.*

Charity—"Ecclesiastical charity," what is—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 70 (2) and 75 (2) (c)—Trust deed—Construction.

This was a petition by the present trustees of the above-named charity, which exists in the parish of Winterbourne, in Gloucestershire. The petition was presented under section 70, subsection 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, by way of appeal from a decision of the Charity Commissioners. The charity was founded by an indenture dated July 31, 1851, whereby Mrs. Mary Ann Jones conveyed to trustees a piece of land and ten cottages or dwelling-houses thereon, upon trust, that they should "from time to time, and at all times thereafter, permit and suffer such poor men and women of sound minds who should have attained the age of 60 years or be incapable of wholly maintaining themselves respectively by the manual labour of themselves respectively, and who, having been born within the limits of the original parish of Winterbourne aforesaid, should have resided within such limits for the last five years of their respective lives, or, having been born elsewhere, should have resided within the limits aforesaid for the last ten years of their respective lives, and who (not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause) should have attended Divine service at the church of the parish of their respective residences for the time being every Sunday for the last five years of their respective lives, and been partakers of the Holy Communion, and lived a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's holy name, as the trustees for the time being of the charity hereby established or any three of them shall from time to time select, to occupy the said cottages or dwelling-houses, with the appointments thereto respectively belonging, rent free during their respective lives if they respectively should so long conform to and abide by such rules and regulations as the trustees for the time being of the said charity or any three of them should from time to time make for their comfort and wellbeing." The deed also provided that all future trustees of the charity should be members of the United Church of England and Ireland. A question having arisen as to the appointment of trustees to the charity, the petitioners requested the Charity Commissioners to determine it in accordance with the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1894. The Commissioners decided that the charity was not an "ecclesiastical charity" within the meaning of that Act.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts were for the petitioners; and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the Charity Commissioners.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether the endowment of the charity was held for the benefit of any members, as such, of any particular Church or denomination within the meaning of section 75, subsection 2 (c), of the Local Government Act, 1894. That section provided that "the expression 'ecclesiastical charity' includes a charity the endowment whereof is held for some one or more of the following purposes:—

or (c) otherwise for the benefit of any particular Church or denomination, or of any members thereof as such." It might be remarked with reference to that section, first, that all Churches and denominations were for the purposes of it placed on the same footing, and consequently that the present case must be dealt with according to the same principles as would apply if the charity were for the benefit of any Church or denomination other than the Church of England; and, secondly, that the words "as such" were important, the meaning being that, in order to bring a charity within the definition of an ecclesiastical charity, those for whose benefit it was limited must be limited to a class of persons holding the status of members in a particular Church or denomination. The charity was eleemosynary in its nature, and the rules of law with reference to religious qualifications for the enjoyment of the benefit of such charities were laid down by Lord Romilly in the case of "A. G. v. Calvert" (23 Beav., 248), and were accepted by counsel on both sides as applicable to the present case. Having regard to those rules, therefore, the question was whether, upon the true construction of the instrument of foundation, there was found a clear expression of intention that the benefits of the charity should be limited to members of the Church of England. Although the deed prescribed that the trustees should be members of the Church of England it did not in terms declare that membership of that Church should be a necessary qualification of those who were to benefit under it. The religious qualification required was threefold—(1) regular attendance at the parish church; and (2), participation in the Holy Communion. The third was expressed in familiar words drawn from the Prayer Book—having lived "a godly, righteous, and sober life to the glory of God's holy name." It was therefore to be determined whether the possession of those qualifications did or did not involve membership of the Church of England; and, though regard must be paid to all three, the most important from this point of view was the second. It was contended on behalf of the Charity Commissioners that the requirements of the deed were satisfied by conformity to the Church of England without membership of it. If by conformity was meant a mere external conformity such as was the fruit of the legislation of the time of King Charles II., now repealed, his Lordship thought that such a construction was excluded by the third of the qualifications to which he had referred. The language in which that qualification was expressed appeared to show that the objects of the founder's bounty were intended to be not mere outward conformists but honest and sincere worshippers at the parish church. The argument, however, was mainly directed to show that the first and second of the religious qualifications might be truly possessed by persons who were not members of the Church of England. As regarded attendance at church, his Lordship thought that that might be so. By law, the parish church was open to every parishioner who desired to enter for the purpose of attending the ordinary services, "Taylor v. Timson" (L.R., 20 Q.B.D., 671). Those services had been so framed that members of other religious denominations could and did honestly and sincerely join in them from time to time, and might, under special circumstances, do so with regularity. Participation in the Holy Communion, on the other hand, was not open to all. The rubric at the end of the office for Confirmation in the Prayer Book prescribed that "there shall none be admitted to the Holy Communion until such time as he be confirmed, or be ready and desirous to be confirmed." The rubrics were incorporated in the Act of Uniformity, 13 and 14 Charles II., c. 4 (see "Escott v. Martin," 4 Moore P.C.C., 104), and, so far as that statute remained unrepealed, must be duly regarded by a Court of law. It seemed to his Lordship that the effect of that rubric was to prevent any one from claiming as of right to partake of the Communion in the Church of England unless he had been confirmed or was ready and desirous to be confirmed. Confirmation implied baptism, which, however (as was established by the case of "Escott v. Martin"), might validly be administered by a layman. Whatever difficulty there might be in giving a strict legal definition of what constituted legal membership of the Church of England his Lordship thought that a person who had been baptized, had been confirmed, or was ready and desirous so to do, and was an actual communicant, did hold the status of a member of that Church, and would be ordinarily regarded and spoken of as such. It was urged that a person not a member of the Church of England might honestly and sincerely partake of the Communion, although not confirmed nor ready nor desirous to be confirmed. It was said that as a matter of history persons who did not possess that qualification had been admitted to the Communion by clergymen who were well aware of the fact, and cases were put which were not of impossible occurrence with reference to persons who might seek the benefit of this charity. Still, even if that were admitted to the full, the participation would be granted as a matter of grace and not as of right. All such cases appeared to be in their nature of such an exceptional character that they could not fairly be regarded as within the contemplation of the framers of an instrument such as that with which the Court had now to deal. The partaking of the Communion here spoken of was, his Lordship thought, such as took place in the ordinary and rightful course, regard being had to the rules of the Church. The conclusion to which his Lordship came on the construction of the instrument was that the persons intended to take the benefit of the charity were to possess qualifications which implied that they should be members of the Church of England. On any other view he failed to see how the founder of a charity intending to confine its benefits to the members of any Church or denomination as such could do so, except by using these very words; and, indeed, the argument was carried to that extent. His Lordship could not think that this was a reasonable intention to ascribe to the Legislature. He understood that the Charity Commissioners rested their decision on a passage in the judgment of Lord Romilly in "Attorney-General v. Calvert." He did not differ from anything there laid down nor from the application made of it by Lord Romilly in that case. In the present case, however, the founders had gone much further than in the instruments which were considered in "Attorney-General v. Calvert," and had imposed on the trustees the duty of inquiring and determining (so far as human judgment would permit) whether the qualifications with which his Lordship had been dealing did or did not exist. For the reasons given his Lordship was unable, with the most sincere respect, to agree with the decision of the Charity Commissioners.

*Reported by W. W. KNOX, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Set-off against principal of debt due from agent —Custom held not proved.

This case raised a question of importance to persons engaged in the hop trade. The plaintiff was a hop grower and the defendants were hop merchants. The action was brought to recover £184, the balance due for 255 pockets of hops alleged to have been sold by the plaintiff to the defendants. It appeared that in November, 1896, the plaintiff instructed one Collard, a hop factor, to sell the hops on his behalf. Collard sold them to the defendants, who settled with Collard for them partly by a cash payment, partly by a bill, and partly by setting off a sum of £184 owing by Collard to the defendants on other transactions. Collard handed the cash and bill to the plaintiff and subsequently became bankrupt. The question in this case was whether the plaintiff could recover from the defendants the sum of £184 which had been treated as a set-off on the settlement of accounts between the defendants and Collard. The defence was that the defendants dealt with Collard as principal and had no notice that the plaintiff, and not Collard, was the owner of the hops, and further, that, if there was any contract between them and the plaintiff, the contract was subject to a custom of the hop trade whereby the purchaser of hops deals solely with the hop factor through whom the sale is made, as if the factor was the principal, and the defendants said that they had discharged their liability in respect of these hops by payment and set-off in account with Collard. A considerable body of conflicting evidence was given, the effect of which is stated in his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. G. F. Hohler appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. Eldon Bankes and Mr. Hugh Hole for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said that there was nothing on the face of the sale note which the factor gave to the defendants to inform the defendants that the hops were being sold by the factor on behalf of the plaintiff as principal. The note did, it was true, contain the words "Sold for and on account of," but no name of any principal was inserted, and these words only appeared in the sale note because factors sometimes sold on their own account, but more generally for a principal. The sale note did also contain the name and address of the plaintiff, but they were only put in as descriptive of the hops, and would not convey to a purchaser that the contract of sale was made on behalf of the plaintiff as owner of the hops. On that part of the case, and on that part only, his Lordship agreed with the defendants' view. Now Collard was a factor, and as such he had a right, in the absence of express instructions, to sell in his own name and also, having had the goods consigned to him, to receive payment for them; but he had no right, in the absence of any well-established custom, to effect a settlement with the purchaser by taking a set-off of a private debt. The only case in which a principal could be met by a set-off between the buyer and the agent was stated by Lord Halsbury in "Cooke v. Eschelby" (L.R., 12 App. Cas., at p. 275), where he said:—"The ground upon which all these cases have been decided is that the agent has been permitted by the principal to hold himself out as the principal, and that the person dealing with the agent has believed that the agent was the principal, and has acted on that belief." In the present case those conditions were not fulfilled. His Lordship was of opinion that defendants had not dealt with Collard in the belief that Collard was selling his own hops and not those of an undisclosed principal, because the defendants were in reality relying on the alleged custom that, in any case, they were entitled to the benefit of their set-off against the factor. That point was, however, immaterial, because his Lordship on the evidence came to the conclusion that Collard had in fact told the defendants that he was only selling on behalf of the real owner of the hops. It was a question of recollection of what passed at the interviews, and his Lordship, without impugning the honesty of the defendants, accepted the version given by Collard, which was, moreover, supported by the plaintiff's own evidence. Then the defendants relied on the custom which they said existed in the hop market, that where a merchant was dealing with a hop factor he had a right to treat the factor as the only principal, and to settle for hops bought by payment or composition with the factor only. One of the defendants went so far as to say that the custom prevailed even when the name of the real owner of the hops was expressly disclosed. His Lordship was of opinion that the custom had not been proved to exist, and, even if it had been, he thought that it would be far too wide to be reasonable. The truth seemed to be that business in the hop trade was carried on in accordance with the general law that where a factor sold in his own name he could not escape liability by saying that he was acting for an undisclosed principal. It was also true that, as was held in "Pike v. Ongley" (18 Q.B.D., 708), where a hop factor purported to act for a principal whose name was not disclosed, there was a remedy against the factor as well as against the principal. That really was the way in which business was carried on in the hop market. In this case the defendants knew that the plaintiff was the owner of the hops sold, and the result was that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the amount claimed with costs.

Feb. 17.

KELLY V. THE LONDON PAVILION (LIMITED)—SAME V. THE OXFORD (LIMITED)—SAME V. THE NEW TIVOLI (LIMITED).*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Music-hall artiste—Agreement not to "perform" elsewhere.

By the plaintiff's contract of engagement with the defendants she undertook not to perform elsewhere during the engagement.

Held, that this stipulation applied only to the days for which she was engaged by the contract, viz., weekdays, and did not apply to Sundays.

Decision of Hawkins, J. (13 The Times L.R., 584), affirmed.

These were three appeals from the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins in favour of the plaintiff, reported in 13 The Times Law Reports, 584. The plaintiff, a music-hall artiste, professionally known as Miss Sybil Arundale, claimed damages against the proprietors of three music-halls for wrongful dismissal and breach of contract. The defence was that the plaintiff had, while her engagement was running, in contravention of the terms of her contracts with the several music-halls, performed at an entertainment on a Sunday evening at the New Lyric Club. By the terms of the contracts the defendants had the option of cancelling the plaintiff's engagements if she committed a breach of her contracts in any respect. They therefore claimed they had a right to dismiss her. The learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for £32 in each case. The following facts are taken from the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins. On December 19, 1895, the plaintiff, a girl about 15 years of age, entered into a set of three separate contracts with each of the defendant companies. Each contract was in the same form, and each contained the same stipulation and conditions. By the contract the plaintiff agreed to perform at the music-hall mentioned in it for ten weeks certain, commencing on December 21, 1896 (that is, a year after the date of the contract), every evening at the time notified by the management, in "her usual entertainment as mimic" at the Pavilion and the New Tivoli, and as "singer and mimic" at the Oxford, at a salary of £8 per week in respect of each hall, subject (among others) to the following condition—viz., "That the said artiste shall not perform before or during this engagement at any theatre, music-hall, club, concert, or place of entertainment within one mile from the said music-halls respectively." Each contract concluded with this clause:—"In the event of the above-named artiste not observing these conditions in every respect the company shall have the option of cancelling this agreement." The two other contracts of each set were in the same language, but for later periods of time, one being for eight weeks commencing on June 7, 1897, the other for eight weeks commencing on November 1, 1897. The plaintiff entered upon her first engagement on December 21, 1896, and continued to fulfil them until and including the night of Saturday, January 9, 1897. On the evening of Sunday, January 10, accompanied by her mother, she accepted an invitation and went to a smoking concert at the New Lyric Club in Coventry-street, within a mile of each of the said halls. Other music-hall artistes were also present by similar invitations. The Lyric Club consists of over 1,000 members, some being professional, others being amateur actors, singers, and musicians. One of the objects of the club was the providing for its members periodical musical and dramatic entertainments. In all other respects it is a mere social club. Every member of it is at liberty to invite guests on any night selected for a soirée, and many avail themselves of this privilege, and, as such guests, many professional artistes, not members of the club, are so invited in the hope and expectation, but without any stipulation, that many of them will voluntarily, if requested, assist in the entertainments of the evening. Under no circumstances do they receive any remuneration for their assistance. Nobody except members and their guests is ever admitted to the club, and no admission money to the club or concert is paid by or for any member or guest. Sunday evenings are generally selected for these soirées or smoking concerts, which are usually held in the big concert-room in the club-house, in which a suitable platform or stage is fitted up, and those who are likely to take part in the entertainment are provided with seats conveniently arranged near the platform. Twice in 1896, after the making of the present contracts, whilst under engagements at the music-halls and before the commencement of her engagements under the present contracts, the plaintiff had been present at this club on Sundays as an invited guest, and had assisted at entertainments of a similar character to those of January 10 without any previous permission or subsequent complaint—viz., in May and October, 1896. Upon one occasion—on a weekday—during the year 1896, and just before the commencement of her engagement, she sang and acted at the Garrick Theatre, by permission of the managing director of the Tivoli, in a piece called Lord Tom

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Noddy, and in it she sang a little song, which had been expressly written for her, called "Darling 'ickle sweethearts," addressed to four little dolls, and danced in ordinary evening dress, without any make-up. To the concert in question on January 10 she had been invited by a member of the club. At this concert she merely sang the song "Darling 'ickle sweethearts" with her dolls and danced for a few minutes, but did not exhibit or perform as a mimic at all. She had no idea that in doing what she did she was violating the contract, being under the impression that Sundays were days for which no permission was needed to assist in such entertainments. On the evening of the following day, Monday, January 11, the plaintiff, accompanied by her mother, attended at each of the three music-halls to continue her usual performances under her contracts. Before performing at the Pavilion she saw Mr. Swanborough, the manager, who as such had signed her engagement contract for that hall. He asked her whether she had sung the night before at the Lyric Club; she replied that she had done so. Mr. Swanborough asked if she was aware that it was against the rules, to which her mother replied she was not, because it was Sunday night; whereupon he said she must not do it again. She then went through her usual performance. Nothing seems to have been said on that night by the managers of the Oxford or the Tivoli, but at those halls she was allowed to and did perform that night as usual, and no complaint of any sort was made to her until the following evening, when, on presenting herself for her performances at each of the three halls, a written letter, purporting to be signed by the manager of the hall (Mr. Swanborough signing for the Pavilion, Mr. Lundy, who had signed her contract, for the Oxford, and Mr. Dowsett for the Tivoli), was handed to her cancelling, by the desire of the directors as regards the Pavilion, all her contracts, and as regards the Tivoli and the Oxford the contract under which she was then performing. The managers of the Oxford and the Tivoli at the same time said they would have granted permission if it had been asked for. There was no contradiction to this evidence offered by the defendants, and neither of the three managers was called, but a Mr. Payue, the managing director of the halls, gave evidence to the effect that he alone, and not the managers, had authority to give permission to perform at other places of entertainment, and that such permission was sometimes given. The learned Judge held that the engagement to perform "every evening" must be interpreted as exclusive of Sundays; that, though the New Lyric Club was a "club" within the meaning of the condition in the contract, the plaintiff had not "performed" at the club within the meaning of the contract; and that, even if the plaintiff had broken the condition in the contract, the fact that the manager of the Pavilion allowed her to perform there on Monday, January 11, with knowledge of what she had done on the Sunday night, was some evidence of waiver of the breach in the case of the Pavilion, and the learned Judge came to the conclusion that there had been a waiver on the part of the managers of all the music-halls, and that the managers had authority to waive. He assessed the damages at £32 in each case, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., and Mr. REGINALD BROWN, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiff had "performed" at a "club" within the meaning of the contract, and the defendants had power to cancel her contracts. If an artiste were allowed to perform on Sunday evenings, the protection sought for by the contract would be rendered futile, as the artiste might sing at the club the very same songs which he or she was singing at the music-halls. A performance on Sunday was included in the contract. If the law were altered so as to allow performances on Sunday, the defendants could call upon the plaintiff to perform on Sunday under the contract. They also contended that there had been no waiver of the breach, the only real evidence of waiver being that the manager of the Pavilion allowed the plaintiff to perform there on the Monday. This was not sufficient evidence of waiver; and further, the evidence showed that the managing director alone, and not the manager, had power to waive breaches of contract.

Mr. J. LAWSON WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, for the plaintiff, contended, first, that this contract was not intended to interfere with the social recreations of the artiste, but merely to limit her professional engagements. Where at a social entertainment an artiste, who was a guest, sang for the purpose of entertaining the other guests, that would not be a "performance" within the meaning of this contract. The artiste would not be there in the capacity of an artiste, but for social purposes. If the gathering was for the purpose of mutual entertainment and social recreation, singing a song would not be a "performance." The case would be different where the performance was for the entertainment of the public. Secondly, the contract did not apply to Sunday and did not restrict the artiste's right to perform on Sundays. Thirdly, as regards the question of waiver, the managers of the halls were not called to give evidence as to whether they knew of the plaintiff having sung at the New Lyric Club, and therefore it was open to the Judge upon the evidence to find that they knew of and waived the breach, and that they had authority to do so.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that three questions had been argued. The first question was, What was the true construction of the contract? Secondly, Did the plaintiff commit a breach of the contract? And thirdly, Assuming that there was a breach, was there a waiver of it? At the time when these contracts were entered into, on December 19, 1895, theatres and music-halls were, to the knowledge of everybody, not opened for performances on Sundays. To what days of the week, then, did the contract apply? Did it apply to every day of the week including Sunday, on which latter day the artistes would have a day off as regards performances, or was Sunday excluded? Did the week include or exclude Sunday? In his opinion the true reading of the contract was that from first to last Sundays were not brought within the ambit of the contract, and only those days were brought within it upon which the entertainment could take place. It was said that the protection of the defendants would not be complete unless the artiste was prevented from performing on Sunday. That, however, could not affect the construction of the contract. In his opinion the words "every evening" meant that the plaintiff would perform from Monday to Saturday both inclusive in each week, and did not include Sunday. That part of the contract, therefore, did not include Sundays. Then there was the condition prohibiting the plaintiff from performing "before or during this engagement" at certain places. Did that condition mean that the plaintiff would not perform at any of those places during the entire week including Sundays? In his opinion the words "during this engagement" meant the engagement for "every evening". In the sense in which he had construed those words—that is, for every week day evening, not including Sunday. These remarks were also applicable to the time before the engagement. That clause therefore did not include Sundays. In his opinion the true construction of the contract was that Sunday was not brought in, and that the parties were dealing with a week in which Sunday was not included. That really concluded the case, but as the other questions were argued he would refer to them. The second question was whether the plaintiff had broken the contract. It was said that she had not done so because she had not "performed" within the meaning of the contract. Mr. Justice Hawkins came to the conclusion that what the plaintiff did was not a "performance" within the meaning of the contract. He (the Lord Justice) did not differ from him upon that point, but he did not base his judgment upon it. The last question was whether, assuming a breach, there was a waiver. Mr. Justice Hawkins came to the conclusion that there had been a waiver. He (the Lord Justice) thought that there was some evidence that what took place on the Monday amounted to a waiver on the part of the manager of the Pavilion. It was said that the manager had no authority to waive a breach. Mr. Justice Hawkins stated his reasons for saying that the manager had authority to waive. In his opinion there was evidence of waiver, but he did not rest his judgment upon this point. He rested his judgment upon the first point. The judgment of the learned Judge was therefore right.

LOED JUSTICE CHITTY concurred. With regard to the construction of the contract, they were entitled to look at the surrounding circumstances. It was common knowledge that music-halls were not open for entertainments on Sundays. In his opinion the engagement into which this young lady entered was to perform upon the ordinary days of the week, and the management could not have called upon her to perform on Sundays. She was entitled to have that day of rest. When once they arrived at the conclusion that Sundays were excluded from that part of the contract which dealt affirmatively with what the plaintiff undertook to do, it seemed to him to follow that the negative clause prohibiting her from performing at certain places only included and applied to a performance above referred to—namely, on a weekday and not on a Sunday. Therefore this last clause only covered performances at the places mentioned on a weekday. As regards the other points raised, he agreed with Lord Justice A. L. Smith, though it was unnecessary to decide them.

LOED JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

IN RE OLYMPIA (LIMITED) (REGISTERED 1893).*

Company—Directors—Liability—Misfeasance summons.

Application dismissed on the ground that the respondent was not in fact a promoter and did not occupy any fiduciary position.

This was the hearing of a summons taken out by the official receiver and liquidator asking for a declaration that Mr. Montague Gluckstein was guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust, in that he and Messrs. Joseph Lyons, John Hart, and Harold Thomas Hartley, being promoters and directors of the company, had secretly obtained and retained for their own use out of the purchase-money paid by the company for Olympia the sum of £6,341, which was alleged to have been divided among them; and that Mr. Gluckstein might be ordered to pay the whole amount, with interest. In 1892 Olympia was the property of the National Agricultural-hall Company (Limited), then in liquidation, subject to debentures for £100,000 and a second mortgage for £10,000. A syndicate of 33 persons, afterwards called the Freehold Syndicate, was formed, of which Mr. Gluckstein and the other persons mentioned in the summons were the founders and trustees, as well as members, and this syndicate, by purchasing the debentures and the mortgage, was alleged to have made a profit of about £20,000. The £6,341 named in the summons was said to be the share of Gluckstein and the other trustees in this profit. A form of agreement, dated January 19, 1893, was drawn up for signature, each on a separate print, by the 33 members of the syndicate. This agreement recited that the syndicate "proposes to purchase Olympia, Kensington, Middlesex, with a view to the resale thereof either to a company to be registered under the Companies Acts, or to some other purchaser." Each subscriber was to subscribe a certain amount, paying a deposit on signing the agreement, and the trustees were to do their best to purchase Olympia on behalf of the syndicate and to resell it at such reasonable advance in price as would cover the charges and expenses and yield a bonus for division amongst the subscribers to the agreement. The trustees had also power to purchase as an interim investment any first mortgage bonds of the National Agricultural-hall Company (Limited). In February, 1893, the Olympia property was sold by auction by the chief clerk in the debenture-holders' action against the National Agricultural-hall Company for £140,000 to Mr. John Hart, acting for the trustees of the syndicate, and this sum was sufficient to pay the expenses of the liquidation and to pay in respect of the debentures and the mortgage a sum sufficient to give the profit of about £20,000 above mentioned. On March 20, 1893, the syndicate trustees entered into an agreement with Mr. Charles Close, as trustee for an intended company (afterwards registered in 1893 as Olympia, Limited), for the sale of the Olympia property to the company for £180,000, made up of (a) £20,000 paid into Court as deposit under the agreement for sale with the liquidator of the National Agricultural-hall Company; (b) as to £120,000 paid into Court or as might be directed by the Judge; and (c) as to the balance of about £40,000 paid to the vendors, the trustees of the syndicate. Clause 7 provided that the vendors were to pay the preliminary expenses, and that "the validity of this agreement shall not be impeached on the ground that the vendors parties hereto, as promoters or otherwise, stand in a fiduciary relation to the company, nor shall the vendors parties hereto be required to account for any profit made or to be made by them by the purchase of any debentures of the National Agricultural-hall Company (Limited), or of any other charges upon any of the property of the last-mentioned company, which are to be satisfied wholly or in part out of the fund paid or to be paid into Court in the said action." Olympia (Limited) was registered shortly afterwards with a capital of £155,000 in £5 shares, one of the objects of the company, as stated in its memorandum of association, being to adopt and carry into effect the agreement of March 20, 1893. The agreement was afterwards adopted by the company. In March the company issued a prospectus to the public inviting subscriptions for shares and debentures. The directors were stated to be Messrs. Joseph Lyons, John Hart, H. T. Hartley, and Montague Gluckstein, and the prospectus disclosed the fact that the directors were also the vendors and that £140,000 had been paid for the property, and also the price to be paid by Olympia (Limited). It did not, however, state the profit made out of the debentures and mortgage, but it stated the date of and the names of parties to the agreement of March 20, 1893.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Kirby were for the official receiver and liquidator; and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Mr. Muir Mackenzie, and Mr. Cassell for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said it was impossible to say what would have been the result if the respondent had been a promoter of the company, but in his judgment he was not a promoter. The position of the parties in February, 1893, was that Mr. Gluckstein and the other persons named in the summons had out of their own moneys bought up the debentures and mortgage in the old company and had contracted to buy the property of the old company. Probably their idea was to form a company, but up to that time they were perfectly free to do what they liked with the property, and they were not in a fiduciary position. If they had been promoters his Lordship would be sorry to say that the provision in the agreement of March 20, 1893, would have been sufficient to protect them, having regard to the fact that the agreement was only made with their nominee. The application must be dismissed.

CARR BROTHERS V. DOUGHERTY.*

Practice—Costs—Arbitration—No award by arbitrator of costs—Costs following the event.

This was a summons adjourned into Court. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant to recover £33 4s. 5d., the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendant paid £30 into Court, with a denial of liability, and counter-claimed for damages for defective work and delay in the execution thereof by the plaintiffs. The action was referred to an arbitrator under section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, by an order which was silent as to costs. In his award the arbitrator did not deal with the costs. The plaintiffs took out a summons asking for the costs of the action, reference, and award, the arbitrator having awarded the plaintiffs £47 1s. in addition to the £30 paid into Court by the defendant and the defendant £17 5s. on his counter-claim.

Mr. T. W. Chitty appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE held that, as by section 15, subsection 2, of the Arbitration Act, 1889, the award was equivalent to the verdict of a jury and the arbitrator had not exercised his discretion as to costs under R.S.C. Order 36, rules 55a and 55b, the costs followed the event, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to the costs of the action, reference, and award and the defendant to the costs of the counter-claim.

RAO BALWANT SINGH V. RANI KISHORI.†

Privy Council Appeals—Hindu law—Mitakshara—Self-acquired immovable property—Power of alienation.

By the law of the Mitakshara a Hindu has power to dispose of his self-acquired property, whether movable or immovable, according to his own pleasure.

These were consolidated appeals from judgments of the High Court for the North-West Provinces of India of August 14, 1893, reviewing a decree of the District Judge of Mainpuri.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross appeared for the appellant; Mr. Mayne and Mr. Herbert Cowell for the respondent.

The arguments were heard in December last before a Board consisting of Lord Hobhouse, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Davey, and Sir Richard Couch, when judgment was reserved.

LORD HOBHOUSE, in giving their Lordships' judgment, said in the suit which gave rise to the appeal the plaintiff (now appellant) claimed as heir-at-law of Rajah Jaswant Rao to be entitled to properties valued at 40 lakhs of rupees, of which Jaswant's widow, Kishori, the defendant below and the respondent here, had become possessed. As regarded the larger portion of the property, principally movable, the plaintiff had failed in both Courts below, and raised no further question. He still claimed—(1) the proprietary right in five villages conveyed as a gift by Jaswant to Kishori by deed dated September 4, 1875; (2) the proprietary right in two other villages purchased by the defendant after Jaswant's death; and (3) a perpetual charge by way of malikana amounting to 10 per cent. of the revenue of seven other villages, which were the subject of a grant by the Government of India to Jaswant dated April 6, 1861. The District Judge decided against the plaintiff as to all these properties except one of the five villages, named Bakewar. As to that village the District Judge held that it was ancestral property which Jaswant had no power to alienate by way of gift, and he decreed possession of it to the plaintiff. Both parties appealed to the High Court. The plaintiff's appeal was dismissed; the defendant's was allowed; so that the plaintiff's suit stood dismissed as to all his claims. The plaintiff had appealed from both orders. Except as regards the village of Bakewar, which had been the subject of difference between the two Courts below, the facts of the case might be briefly stated:—All the villages in suit were at one time the estate of Khaman Singh, the father of Jaswant. Through extravagance or misfortune Khaman fell into poverty, and he parted with the villages; whether in fact or only in appearance was matter of dispute in the suit. Jaswant became a successful man of business, and he also rendered active and valuable services to the Government at the time of the Sepoy mutiny. Thus he became able to repurchase himself of the estates which Khaman had enjoyed, and the Government acknowledged his services by the grant in question. Khaman died in December, 1844. His eldest son, Lal Barian, married Adhar Kuuwar, a lady of considerable private fortune, and died without issue. Jaswant was the only other son, and he married Kishori as his third wife. He died in August, 1879. The plaintiff's claim under the grant stood on an entirely different footing from his other claims, and it might be disposed of at once. The Sanad of April, 1861, recited the services of Jaswant and that they had been recognized by the bestowal of the title of "Rajah," and were worthy of further recognition by the grant of a jagir. It then continued:—"Be it known that the possession and revenue of the five villages granted for generation after generation shall for ever be given up and remitted, and that the revenue of the seven villages granted for lifetime shall remain under remission till his lifetime—to wit, their zemindars, who now pay the revenue to British Government, shall pay it to him, and after him they shall ever pay 10 per cent. as malikana allowance to his heir, after the deduction of Government revenue, for generation after generation." The five villages were the five villages before mentioned as contained in the deed of gift. Mr. Ross did not contend that the words "generation after generation" conferred any interest less than absolute ownership, nor did he sustain the contention urged in the lower Courts that the revenue of the five villages did not pass to Jaswant in absolute ownership. His contention was that as regards the seven villages there were two distinct gifts—one to Jaswant for his life and the other after his death, and that at his death the malikana was given in absolute ownership to the person who might then happen to be his heir. That would attribute to the Government the strange intention of acknowledging the personal merits of Jaswant by conferring a benefit on some unknown heir for whom he might or might not have a regard. The construction also appeared to their Lordships to be as strained as it was impossible. They thought that the obvious meaning of the expression "his heir for generation after generation" was that the malikana was to form part of his heritable property, and that, whereas he took the whole income for his life only, he was to take the 10 per cent. malikana in absolute ownership. Both the Courts below had taken substantially the same view, and the appeal failed on that point. The next question was whether Jaswant could lawfully give the property in question to his wife. The district Judge stated that the point was one on which there had been a great conflict of opinion, and, without discussing it further, he said that he followed the latest rulings in holding that if the property comprised in the gift was Jaswant's self-acquired property he could deal with it as he saw fit. The High Court had given no opinion on the point except so far as an opinion was involved in their affirmation of the district Judge's decree, nor did they hear argument upon it. It was one point of appeal by the plaintiff, but his counsel did not open it till at the very end of his reply, when the Court ruled that it was not competent for him to argue it. In delivering judgment, they stated their opinion that the plaintiff by not addressing to them any remarks in support of that argument must be taken virtually to have abandoned it. Mr. Ross had raised the question again in the appeal, and had addressed to their Lordships a serious argument which required consideration. His proposition was that a member of an undivided family subject to Mitakshara law had not the power of disposition over self-acquired immovable property at his will. The Indian Courts had differed on that question, and there was no decision of that Board which after examination of the authorities affirmed the power in unqualified terms. It was not surprising that conflicts of opinion should have arisen, seeing that the texts of the Mitakshara itself, as translated by Colebrooke, whose translation had long been accepted as correct, were apparently and literally in conflict with one another. The passage cited by Mr. Ross was found in chapter I, section 1, clause 27, and was as follows:—"Speaking of the father of a family, it says that 'he is subject to the control of his sons and the rest in regard to the immovable estate, whether acquired by himself or inherited from his father or other predecessor. Since it is ordained 'though immovables or bipeds have been acquired by a man himself, a gift or sale of them should not be made without convening all the sons. They who are born, and they who are yet unborn, and they who are still in the womb, require the means of support. No gift or sale should therefore be made.' " And immediately below the commentator insisted on a man's duty not to leave his family without means of support. Mr. Ross further pointed out that the rule so stated as to immovable property was accepted as law by Sir Thomas Strange (see vol. i., p. 261, vol. ii., pp. 436 and following). On the other hand, they found in the same source of law quite opposite precepts. In clause 21 of the same chapter and section the commentator quotes two texts, one from Yajñavalkya himself, to the same effect with clause 27, and then adds:—"They both relate to immovables which have descended from the paternal grandfather." In section 5 of the same chapter, clause 9, the commentator, speaking of a donation made by a father, says:—"The son has no right of interference if the effects were acquired by the father." And in clause 10 the same precept was repeated with more particularity. So in section 4, where the commentator appeared to be dealing with the principle which lay at the root of the system of joint family property. He there explained what might not be divided, and in clause 1 he said:—"Whatever else is acquired by the coparcener himself . . . does not appertain to the heirs, . . . nor shall he who recovers hereditary property which had been taken away give it up to the parceners." Pausing there to consider the authorities apart from decisions, their Lordships observed that the rule laid down in section I, clause 27 of the Mitakshara rested upon an ulterior reason, "since it is ordained," and so forth, and the reason ranged so far beyond the rule as seriously to weaken its support of a positive rule. The necessity of support to children applied in principle to the alienation of movable property as well as immovable. And the assertion of rights in those who were unbegotten conflicted with the principle uncontradicted, as their Lordships understood, by any decision that a man might alienate even his descended estate if he had no child, or at least if he had no coparcener, in existence (Mayne's Hindu Law, section 315). All those old text-books and commentaries were apt to mingle religious and moral considerations, not being positive laws, with rules intended for positive laws. In the preface to his valuable work on Hindu law Sir W. Macnaghten says:—"It by no means follows that because an act has been prohibited it should therefore be considered as illegal. The distinction between the vinculum juris and the vinculum pudoris is not always discernible" (Hindu Law, Principles and Precedents, p. 6 of preliminary remarks). He illustrated that position by the example of the very subject of the present discussion. It was, as their Lordships thought, the most reasonable inference that the passage in section I, belonged to the former class of precepts and those of sections IV. and V. to the latter. As regarded the authority of Sir T. Strange, which undoubtedly was great, their Lordships observed that though he did not bring the conflicting texts of the Mitakshara into comparison with one another, he introduced similar contradictions into the body of his own work. In his Addenda he corrected his own opinions by the authority of Sir Francis Macnaghten's work "Considerations on Hindu Law," which he had seen after he had written his own. He said that he had used Macnaghten's work for supplementing, for correcting, or for confirming his own. (Addenda, p. 4.) Among the passages which he adopted was the following:—"It is desirable that the extent to which a Hindu in his lifetime may give or make an unequal distribution of his property should be ascertained. I think it clear that he has a right to dispose of his self-acquired property, whether movable or immovable, according to his own pleasure, and that he has the same right as to ancestral movable property." (Addenda, p. 8.) It seemed then that Strange intended to accept for Madras the opinion of Macnaghten who, though a Pengu Judge, wrote of the Benares as well as the Bengal school. Macnaghten's opinion, clearly applying to the Mitakshara law, was that the father of a family, with regard to all kinds of property acquired by himself, was at liberty to make any alienation he might think fit, subject only to spiritual responsibility. To turn to the decided cases, there was no decision of the Judicial Committee which was adverse to the power of alienation claimed by the defendant. Mr. Ross referred to the language of the board in the Hunsapore case (12 Moore, I.A., p. 38) decided in 1867. Sir James Colville, after showing that by that time testamentary powers long disputed had been established in Hindu law, spoke thus :—"Accordingly it has been settled that even in those parts of India which are governed by the stricter law of the Mitakshara a Hindu without male descendants may dispose by will of his separate and self-acquired property whether movable or immovable; and that one having male descendants may so dispose of self-acquired property if movable; subject, perhaps, to the restriction that he cannot wholly disinherit any one of such descendants." It was argued that that passage showed that in the opinion of the board the power of disposition by will did not extend to land, and did not exist if there were male descendants. In that case, however, the board gave no judicial opinion upon the point, because they held that the property in dispute was an indivisible Raj, subject to the custom of primogeniture, and that, as the heir was a consenting party to the disposition in dispute, the question of the testator's power did not arise. It was true that they did not affirm the proposition now contended for by the defendant. In the Bithoor case (9 Moo., I. A., p. 96, A.D. 1862) there came into question the validity of a will devising self-acquired property. There was a long and intricate discussion as to the genuineness of the will, which was ultimately established. It appeared also that objection was taken to the legal power of the testator, but it did not appear on what grounds that point was argued. The only passage in the judgment bearing on that question was as follows :—"The rest of the evidence consists of the testimony of Pundits, who say that the Soobadar was always obedient to the Shasters, and that the Shasters forbid a father who has several sons to appropriate by will to one the property which by law ought to be equally divided amongst all. It is clear that in this district a strong feeling prevails among the Brahmins upon the subject of testamentary disposition, which, though at length established by law as to self-acquired property, is opposed to the ancient usages and feelings of the country." There was a decision in favour of the power to make such a will, but the grounds of it did not appear; the attention of the Board would seem to have been directed to the general question of testamentary power, rather than to distinctions between ancestral and self-acquired estate; and in the Hunsapore case the present proposition was treated by this Board as still open to argument and to qualifications. Their Lordships did not think it necessary to go through the series of Indian decisions bearing on that point, but they would refer to some of the most important and of the latest date. It appeared to them that the subject was one of those in which from the earliest times there had been two conflicting principles of law, one favouring the perpetual integrity and the fixed succession of family property, and the other the free use of such property for the circumstances of the day. The controversies and conflicting decisions in the father's powers of mortgage and sale, on the payment of his debts out of the inheritance and on the testamentary power, would occur to everybody who was familiar with Indian litigations of the past half century or so. On each of these subjects there had been a growing tendency, coincident with the growth of commerce, to give more effect to the latter of the two principles—viz., the use of property by the living generation or its living heads. This their Lordships conceived was the kind of change referred to by Lord Kingsdown in the Bithoor case. The earliest case in which their lordships had found any exact comparison of the texts of the Mitakshara was decided by a division of the High Court of Calcutta in the year 1863. "Mudhu Gopal v. Rani Buksh" (6 W.R., p. 71). In that case the plaintiff's father had sold to the defendant property which was held to be self-acquired. The learned Judges carefully compared the texts of the Mitakshara. They treated those of sections IV. and V. as the governing ones. They conclude :—"We must hold that, according to the law as laid down in the Mitakshara, a father is not incompetent to sell immovable property acquired by himself." In 1872 the question was discussed before a full Bench in Calcutta (10 Beng. L.R., 192). A son disputed his father's disposition of property inherited by the father from a cousin, and not from the grandfather. Sir Richard Couch compared the texts and quoted cases which, as he said, exhibit the better opinion among commentators. His conclusion was this :—"It is only in respect of property not liable to obstruction that the wealth of the father or grandfather becomes the property of his sons or grandsons by virtue of birth." In that case the property, being inherited by the father from a cousin, was held to be obstructed as to inheritance. As regarded the North-West Provinces the question was carefully considered in 1877 by two experienced civilian Judges, "Sital v. Madho" (1 All., p. 394). Those learned Judges did not consider themselves bound by a previous decision of the High Court in 1869, which negatived the father's power to alienate, but without citing the authorities. In their elaborate judgment they made more than one suggestion for reconciling the conflicting texts. They said that the Courts had recognized the principle that the prohibition of certain acts might be implied, yet where it was not declared that there was absolutely no power to do them those acts, if done, were not necessarily void. And in the end they adopted Sir William Macnaghten's view "that, with respect to personal property, whether ancestral or acquired, and with respect to real property acquired or recovered by the occupant, he (the father) is at liberty to make any alienation which he may think fit, subject only to spiritual responsibility." (See "Principles," p. 3.) That was the same view as was expressed by Sir Francis Macnaghten and adopted by Sir T. Strange in the passage already quoted. Their Lordships fully assent to the reasoning contained in the judgment they had cited, and they found that in India there was a decided preponderance of judicial authority in favour of the power claimed for Jaswant in this case. It remained to mention a decision of the Board in 1873, which, though it fell under the Mithila law, appeared to their Lordships to bear closely on the present case. It was reported in 12 Bengal L.R., p. 430, "Rajah Bishen v. Bour Misser." The Mithila differed in some respects from that of the Mitakshara, but on the subject in question followed it very closely. The leading text-book was the Vivada Chintamani, and their Lordships quoted from the translation made in 1863. In page 76 and again in page 229 were passages giving a free hand to the owners of self-acquired property. In page 229 it was written :—"Such property as is acquired or recovered by the father without the aid of the ancestral estate shall be divided equally or unequally or not divided at all, at his pleasure. The father has full dominion over . . . that property which is gained by him through skill, valour, or the like, he may give it away at his pleasure," and so forth. In page 309 occurred the passage :—"It is declared in the work called Prakasa that immovable and bined property, even if it be self-acquired, cannot be sold or given away without the consent of the sons. They who are born . . . even they who are not yet conceived, require paternal property for their maintenance, therefore it is improper to deprive them of it." The decision of the Judicial Committee was in accordance with the first set of texts. It was true that page 309 was not referred to in the judgment, but it could hardly be supposed that in a case fought up to the highest tribunal it was overlooked. For the foregoing reasons their Lordships had no hesitation in laying it down that the law of the Mitakshara was shown, after long conflicts of opinion due to the conflicting nature of the original texts, to be that which had been adopted from Sir William Macnaghten by the Courts of Calcutta and Allahabad. Such being the law it remained to apply it to this case. The plaintiff contended that the property in question was ancestral. As regarded the four villages the dispute turned on matters of fact, and the Courts below were agreed in finding them against the plaintiff. That dispute could not be reopened there. As regarded Bakewar they had differed, and the plaintiff asked their Lordships to say that the High Court was wrong in finding that that village was the self-acquired property of Jaswant. The question turned on transactions which took place in 1852. In 1836 Khaman, the father of Jaswant, executed a simple mortgage of Bakewar to Luchmandas. In 1839 he executed a second mortgage by way of conditional sale to the father of Kunjbehari. Disputes arose between the two mortgagees, who, under an award, were put into possession each of a moiety. In 1847 Kunjbehari bought out Luchman and was placed in sole possession. In 1852 one Hurbans Rai, a creditor of Jaswant, who had then succeeded to the property, got a decree against him. In the same year Kunjbehari applied for foreclosure under Regulation 17 of 1806. The year of grace expired, and the foreclosure became absolute. Hurbans endeavoured to execute his decree against Bakewar, but was opposed by Kunjbehari, who brought a suit against both Jaswant and Hurbans to assert his title. The First Court decided against him, apparently on the ground that his title was no better than that of Luchman, whose simple mortgage did not carry the right to foreclosure or to possession. The Zillah Judge thought differently, and held that the mortgage had been finally foreclosed. Hurbans appealed to the Sudder Dewani Adawlat, who upheld the Zillah Judge's decree, and granted Kunjbehari's claim to have the sale of the estate of Bakewar made absolute by expungement of the name of Jaswant and the entry of his own name. That final decree bore date February 14, 1856. Kunjbehari was then in possession, and he remained in possession, but he did not procure any mutation of name. The subsequent events were involved in some obscurity. It seemed that Kunjbehari got into trouble during the Mutiny, that he was charged with serious offences, and was in great danger of being hung, that Jaswant took up his cause, saved his life, and even gave him compensation to the amount of some thousands of rupees for injuries done to his estate. On Kunjbehari's part they found that in an irregular way, by endorsement on the decree of February, 1856, he purported to annul that decree in favour of Adhar Kunwar. The consideration stated was the sum of 4,526 rupees, apparently less than a year's revenue. That endorsement was dated June 22, 1858. The defendant alleged that soon afterwards Adhar Kunwar, also in an irregular way, made a verbal gift of the property to Jaswant. The certain thing was that about this time Jaswant regained possession and remained in possession until his death. How far his title depended on Adhar Kunwar's gift, how far on Kunjbehari's relinquishment of possession and practical reconveyance, and how far Kunjbehari's acceptance of the small sum given for purchase money was influenced by Jaswant's services to him, or why he took so small a sum were questions which were not, and which need not be, cleared up. In 1868 Kunjbehari sued to establish his right to Bakewar. The defendants were Jaswant and Sheo Narain, to whom it was stated that Jaswant had sold the property. Kunjbehari alleged that the endorsement on the decree was a forgery, and gave a different account of his transactions with Adhar Kunwar, admitting, however, that he took the money from her, and that he, as he called it, annulled the decree. The subordinate Judge held that the arrangement of June 22, 1858, was a bona fide one, and that Jaswant got actual proprietary possession. On one of the issues he found that the foreclosure of the decree of February, 1856, and the other previous transactions between Kunjbehari and Jaswant were wholly fictitious and collusive. It was impossible to accept such a finding as of any value. Nobody disputed that Kunjbehari had a genuine mortgage from Khaman or that the estate and the liability devolved on Jaswant. And the subordinate Judge himself pointed out that the validity of the foreclosure was challenged by Hurbans who had a strong interest to upset it; but he added, "unfortunately these objections were not entertained by any Court." There was also another finding on a separate issue, of a most extraordinary character. The subordinate Judge found that because Kunjbehari did not effect a mutation of name, therefore his foreclosure decree became void and that he remained in possession as a mortgagee. It was mainly on account of those two findings, on which Mr. Ross dwelt at great length, that that voluminous, intricate, and confused judgment of the subordinate Judge of 1869 had been put in. Of course they had no legal force as between the heir and the grantee of Jaswant. Nor had they any result as between the parties to that suit, seeing that it was dismissed with costs. The decision of the District Judge in the case was apparently founded on the last-mentioned finding of the subordinate Judge of 1869, which he quoted as though it were conclusive. Their Lordships thought it clear that the point of time and the event to look at was the foreclosure of 1853. If that were a mere sham, the conclusion that the mortgage continued and that on its payment Jaswant only redeemed the estate he had inherited from Khaman might have some colour. But in the suit of 1853 the two appellate Courts held that the foreclosure was genuine and valid. That was held against the appeal of the execution creditor whose claim was defeated by it. It was not a decision between the present parties, but it was strong evidence, and their Lordships could not find any substantial evidence for disputing it. If the foreclosure took place the former title of Bakewar was broken and its ancestral character destroyed. The exact mode of its reacquisition by Adhar Kunwar and Jaswant was not material. For money or for services, it passed from Kunjbehari to Jaswant and so was acquired by him. For the above reasons their Lordships agreed with the High Court on this point. The only other point taken for the appellant was one of a very unusual character. It was alleged that the decree of the High Court was void, because one of the Judges, Mr. Burkitt, was not properly appointed. The point was not taken in the Court below, nor was the nature of it explained in the printed case of the appellant. Their Lordships understood that the appointment was questioned on the ground that it was not made immediately upon or within a reasonable time after the occurrence of the vacancy which it supplied. Their Lordships could not discover any ground for the objection. Under the High Court Act, the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Province had power to appoint an acting Judge upon the happening of a vacancy among the Puisne Judges of the Court. No limit of time was mentioned within which the appointment should be made. That was left to the discretion of the Lieutenant-Governor and it was not competent to a Court of Law to invent a restriction not contemplated by the Legislature. The result was that the appeals failed on all points and their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty to dismiss them. The appellant must pay the costs.

GREENWOOD V. THE LEATHER-SHOD WHEEL COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Contempt of Court—Comments while action pending—Article in newspaper.

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. T. Harrison Lambert, who was a defendant in the above action, asking that the editor of a newspaper called the Stock Exchange Gazette might be committed to prison for contempt of Court. The action was brought against the company and five directors, of whom Mr. Lambert was one, claiming, as against the company, rescission of a contract by the plaintiff to take shares therein on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation, and, as against the directors, claiming damages for such fraudulent misrepresentation. The action was one of a great number which had been instituted in consequence of a series of articles published in the Stock Exchange Gazette and containing criticisms on the Leather-Shod Wheel Company. These other actions, however, had been stayed pending the decision of the present action, which was taken as a test case. The statement of claim in this action was delivered on January 19 last. On January 29 there appeared in the Stock Exchange Gazette a leading article, to which attention was attracted by a notice on the outside of the paper. The article contained comments on the existence of the action and upon the steps which had been taken in it, and Mr. Lambert was mentioned by name and his conduct was commented on in somewhat strong terms. It was contended on behalf of the applicant that this article constituted a gross contempt of Court, inasmuch as it was calculated seriously to interfere with the course of justice and to prejudice and embarrass the defendant Lambert in his defence to the action. The respondent appeared by counsel, and tendered an apology to the Court, urging in mitigation that he was a young man and had had very little experience in the management of newspapers.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. E. Ford appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Lightwood for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that this was one of a class of motions with which he always felt most reluctant to deal. It was a motion to commit to prison the editor of a newspaper for commenting upon the proceedings in a pending action, on the ground that such comments constituted an interference with the course of justice. No doubt the Court was vested with full powers of preventing and punishing such offences, but it could not be denied that applications were sometimes made on slight grounds, and comments which were only technical offences were brought before the Court with a view to the punishment of the offenders. His Lordship desired to subscribe to the views of the Court of Appeal as expressed in the case of "Hunt v. Clarke" (37 W.R., 724), and to adopt in the fullest sense the language of Sir G. Jessel there cited, in which he said:—"It seems to me that this jurisdiction of committing for contempt, being practically arbitrary and unlimited, should be most jealously and carefully watched, and exercised, if I may say so, with the greatest reluctance and the greatest anxiety on the part of the Judges to see whether there is no other mode which is not open to the objection of arbitrariness and which can be brought to bear upon the subject. I say that a Judge should be most careful to see that the cause cannot be fairly prosecuted to a hearing unless this extreme mode of dealing with persons brought before him on accusations of contempt should be adopted." His Lordship then stated the facts giving rise to the motion, and said that the article complained of was a great deal more than a technical breach of the rule. An article of this character might interfere with the trial of the action both by deterring witnesses from giving evidence which they would otherwise have been willing and ready to give, and also by affecting the mind of the jury before whom it was possible that the case might hereafter come. The respondent now expressed his regret both by affidavit and through his counsel for having committed the contempt of Court. One thing in his favour was that he had no direct interest in the prosecution of the action; moreover, he had only been editor of the paper since the commencement of the present year. He also informed the Court that he was a young man and had had but little experience in the management of newspapers. At the suggestion of the Court he now offered to publish an apology in his paper and to undertake to abstain in future from commenting on the matter during the pendency of the action. Having regard to the seriousness of the offence, however, his Lordship could not entirely exonerate the respondent from all punishment, and, after serious consideration of the circumstances of the case, he came to the conclusion that the respondent must pay a fine of £20 and the costs of the application.

HOBSON V. TULLOCH.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenants—"Not to use premises otherwise than as residence."

The parties to this action were owners of houses on the Colton estate, West Hampstead, the neighbourhood being a residential one. Each house was subject to a covenant not to use and occupy the same for the purpose of any trade or manufacture, or for any other purpose than a private residence. The defendant's house, which was called Whitefriars, was the largest house on the estate, containing 19 bed-rooms and seven reception-rooms. The defendant carried on a large girls' school in another house on another property some half-mile distant. The defendant proposed to live herself with her relations at Whitefriars, and also that the governesses should live there, and such pupils as might be sent to stay there with the object of attending her school. She did not propose in any sense of the word to carry on her school at Whitefriars, nor in any way to advertise Whitefriars as connected with her school. The action was a test action by residents in the neighbourhood, and the question was whether the proposed user of Whitefriars would be a breach of the covenant.

Mr. FARWELL, Q.C., and Mr. T. F. HOBSON, for the plaintiff, cited "German v. Chapman" (L.R., 7 Ch. D. 271); and "Rolls v. Miller" (L.R., 27 Ch. D. 71).

Mr. NEVILLE, Q.C., and Mr. GOLLAN, for the defendant, submitted that her proposed user was strictly residential, and to hold that it was not so because persons were brought there for the purposes of a business carried on elsewhere was too remote. The question was one of degree.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER said that the defendant's proposed user of the house was not a user of the house as a private residence within the ordinary acceptance of the term. That the house was not to be advertised as connected with the defendant's school was unimportant. What the defendant proposed to do was to carry on a business, or a species of business. He held that the proposed user would constitute a breach of the covenant.

IN RE CRONMIRE—EX PARTE WAUD.*

Stock Exchange—Gaming and wagering contract —Payment of differences—Deposit of money as cover—Recovery of.

This was an appeal by Mr. A. E. Waud against the decision of the Official Receiver rejecting his proof against the estate of H. Cronmire on the ground that the claim arose on contracts which were gambling transactions. H. Cronmire had carried on a very large business as an outside stock and share dealer under the style of Gregory and Co. He died insolvent in April, 1897, and his estate was now being administered in bankruptcy. The other material facts and the arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment below.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Israel Davis appeared for Mr. Waud; Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Macaskie appeared for the trustee under the administration order.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT.—During a part of 1896 and in January, 1897, there had been transactions between Cronmire, carrying on business, not as brokers, but as outside dealers, under the name of Gregory and Co., and Mr. Waud. In form these transactions purported to be sales and purchases of stocks or shares, but in substance, as the jury have found, they were contracts merely for differences. On February 1, 1897, Cronmire rendered an account showing himself debtor to Waud for about £220. On February 8 Waud gave an order to buy for investment £200 Great Eastern stock, and on the same day Cronmire answered by telegraph—"Sold you 200 Eastons, 113½, investment"; and he sent to Waud a contract note of the same date stating that he had sold to Waud for the account, February 12, £200 Great Eastern stock for £228 12s. 6d., "to be taken up." No cover was given or asked for in respect of this stock. By the seventh of the conditions endorsed on the back of the contract note the vendor states that he is prepared to deliver the stock to which the contract refers, if demanded, but requires in that event cash on the first day of the account in payment of the stock. On the next day, February 9, Waud wrote as follows:—"With regard to the £200 Great Eastern stock, would you please take it off the market to-morrow and place it in the name of A. E. Waud, &c., and forward the transfer to me when ready for signature? As I have now only one stock open, there is ample balance in hand for payment of the Great Eastern stock, which please use for that purpose, &c." Cronmire made no objection to this proposal, but acted on it by debiting Waud with the price of the stock and the stamp and fees and promising to send transfers, and from time to time Waud pressed for delivery and Cronmire continued to promise it until his death on April 16. The jury have found, and no doubt rightly, that this was a real transaction—i.e., that both parties intended an actual purchase and sale of the £200 Great Eastern stock for delivery. After Cronmire's death Waud put in a proof in the administration for the balance appearing to be due to him on his general account with Cronmire, but he now asks to substitute a claim for damages for the non-delivery of the Great Eastern stock, and it is agreed that, subject to the question of cost, the proof is to be treated as amended in that sense. The objection raised by the trustee is that, as he contends, there was no consideration for Cronmire's promise to deliver the stock, because Cronmire was not to get anything for it except a discharge from or set-off of a claim for gambling differences, the payment of which Waud could not have enforced. And it seems to me that the trustee's contention ought to prevail if, as Mr. Waud in his affidavit says was the case, the bargain for the Great Eastern stock was at the time when it was made a bargain that the stock should be paid for in that way. In that view Mr. Waud's claim would in reality be a claim to enforce payment of gambling differences, not indeed in specie, but in the form of their equivalent in stock. But Mr. Waud ought not to be held to that view if it clearly appears that he, or rather the person who drew his affidavit, has mistaken the facts. I think that does appear. Cronmire's telegram and contract note of February 8, show a written and real agreement made on that day by which Waud became bound to take up and pay in cash on the first day of the account, and Cronmire became bound to deliver on such payment being made, and so the jury have found. There was, then, a contract free from any objection, though conditional on the money being provided by Waud. This condition could have been waived by Cronmire, and in that case he could have sued Waud for not accepting, as Waud on performing the condition could have sued him for not delivering, the stock. The next day, as appears by Waud's letter of the 9th, Waud for the first time proposed that, instead of cash passing, the payment should be made out of the balance due to him, and Cronmire assented. That relieved Waud of the necessity for performing the condition of payment in cash, but did not otherwise alter Cronmire's conditional contract to deliver, which was a good contract when it was made. If a contract is made for good consideration I cannot see that it can become invalidated merely because a party afterwards consents to accept in lieu of the good consideration, which he could have enforced, a different consideration which is of uncertain value or even of no value. A further claim is made by Mr. Waud for damages for non-delivery of stock known as Dover "A's" which were sold to him by Cronmire on April 3. The material facts are the same as in the first claim, except that, as appears by Cronmire's letter of April 5, this second transaction was from the first intended to be on the terms that payment should be made partly by setting off the gambling balance due to Waud. This intention, however, was not expressed in the contract. Moreover, a material part of the consideration—namely, £81 17s. 3d., was to be paid by Waud in cash, and there was, therefore, at any rate to this extent, consideration for Cronmire's promise, and the result appears to me to be the same, though for a different reason. A third claim is also made by Mr. Waud for the repayment of moneys amounting to about £60, which were advanced by him in separate sums at different times by way of specific "cover" on specific and separate gambling orders. These sums have never been appropriated or required for covering losses. The return of them was never demanded until after the administration order, nor was any notice given revoking the authority to apply them as cover. But as regards the sums now in question, the events in respect of which they had respectively been deposited had resulted in Waud's favour, and there was no longer any reason for the retention of them by Cronmire. The trustee contends that these sums are irrecoverable as being within the meaning of the Gaming Act (8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, section 18) sums "which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made." Apart from the statute these moneys would have been recoverable as moneys of Waud in Cronmire's hands. They had been deposited to cover contingent debts which might become due from Waud in certain events, but those events had before Cronmire's death been determined in Waud's favour, and there was no ground for the further detention of them by Cronmire. It was the intention of both parties that when the dealings were closed the depositor should retain his ownership of what should remain unappropriated. Then does the statute prevent recovery? Apart from authority I should have thought that the moneys so deposited by way of security were not within the language of the statute "deposited to abide the events" on which the wagers were made. And this was the view of the Court of Appeal and of the House of Lords in the first case of "Strachan v. the Universal Stock Exchange" ([1896] A.C., 166) in relation to a deposit of shares as cover; but in the second case of the same name ([1896] 2 Q.B., 697) a deposit of money for a similar purpose was regarded in the Court of Appeal as made "to abide the event" within the meaning of the statute, and on that point I can see no distinction between that case and the present one, and I must, therefore, hold that the statute in that respect is applicable. Then, what is the effect of the statute in such a case? The decisions have not been uniform, and perhaps none is precisely in point. (His Lordship then reviewed the authorities at length, and continued.) These authorities seem to show that the statute is to be construed as interfering only with an action brought on the contract to enforce the contractual claim for winnings on the wager. In the present case the cover was not in any natural sense won by Waud, nor was the present application brought on the wagering contract or to enforce performance of it. On the old system of pleading no reference to the contract need have been made in the declaration. If, indeed, the depositor had sued for the joint deposit as winner of the wager, that would have been a claim to enforce the contract, and he could not, in reply to a plea of the statute, have assigned his real claim to be for recovery of his own deposit; but that does not show that he could not have sued to recover the deposit on particulars proper to the claim. In the present case, if this money had been deposited with a stakeholder, it is clearly settled by the cases above cited that it could have been recovered at any time before it had been paid over. The authority to pay over could at any time be revoked, and it is revoked by bringing an action. ("Strachan's Case, No. 1.") The same enactment applies to both cases equally so far as it applies at all; and, if it is no bar to recovery in the one case, it can hardly of itself be a bar in the other; and the obstacle to recovery, if there be one, must be found in the common law. There would have been such an obstacle by the common law if the events had been determined in Cronmire's favour, because the money being in his hands on the terms that it should become his on the event being so determined, and the event being supposed to have been so determined, title and possession would have been conjoined in him, and there would have been the equivalent of a voluntary and unconditional payment, which is always a bar to recovery, even when payment has been made without any consideration. Nor, as has often been pointed out, is a wager such a "delict" as to admit the application of the rule, Potior est conditio possidentis, as applied in such cases as "Taylor v. Chester" (L.R., 4 Q.B., 318); "Kearley v. Thomson" (24 Q.B.D., 742); "Herman v. Jeuchner" (15 Q.B.D., 561). I should add that Lord Justice A. L. Smith in "Strachan's Case, No. 2," seems to have considered that the defendants there, under similar circumstances, were in the position of stakeholders. If that be so, there would be no doubt as to the claimant's right to recover in the present case. Then, if that was the law before "Strachan's Case, No. 2," has that case altered it? The actual decision was entirely consonant with the former cases, and it does not seem even to have required any reference to the statute, for in that case the event had been determined in the defendant's favour, and the money had been actually appropriated by him in accordance with the contract in settlement of the differences, and so there had been in effect a payment voluntarily and unconditionally made by the depositor. But, although the decision raises no difficulty, a dictum attributed to one of the Lords Justices raises a difficulty. Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, is reported as having said that money so deposited by one party with the other can never be recovered unless the wager has been repudiated before the event of it has determined. This opinion seems not to be in accordance with what is laid down in "Varney v. Hickman" (5 C.B., 271), "Hampden v. Walsh" (1 Q.B.D., 189), and "Diggle v. Higgs" (2 Ex.D., 422) (which does not appear to have been cited), and is opposed to the opinion of Lord Justice A. L. Smith. In these circumstances it does not seem to me that the previous authorities are affected by Strachan's case. If this conclusion is well founded, it does not need the support of "Reggio v. Stevens" (4 The Times L.R., 326), on which reliance was placed by the counsel for the claimant. If it is not well founded, "Reggio v. Stevens" does not advance his case, for the cover was deposited, not, as here, in respect of each particular transaction, but generally, and that case decides no more than that a person who has deposited "cover" generally for future transactions can at any time decline to gamble further and recover the unexhausted deposit. As regards the contention that notice to Cronmire repudiating the wagering contract ought to have been given before these proceedings or before the administration order, I have said that this point appears to be concluded against the trustee by the case of Strachan, No. 1. And, even if that decision is not applicable, it seems to me on principle that an action is a sufficient assertion of the depositor's right to recover where the event has not been determined against him, or, at any rate, where, as here, it has been determined in his favour. Under the circumstances there will be no order as to costs.

HERMOUX V. HARBOLD.*

Bankruptcy—Proof—Fraudulent preference—
Mortgage—Transaction held not to be a fraudulent preference.

*Reported by R. BARBER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action by a creditor against the trustee of the estate of Sutton and Co., a firm of stockbrokers, claiming a declaration that he is entitled to prove against the joint estate of Sutton and Co. for the sum of £2,954 15s. 10d. By agreement dated March 7, 1890, James Sutton, W. N. Morrison, and A. R. W. Powles, members of the firm of Sutton and Co., bought from the plaintiff the lease of 22, Royal Exchange, for £2,500, to be paid for £1,250 by Morrison, £625 by Powles, and £625 by Sutton, and a bond was to be given to secure the payments in the proportions mentioned. On June 6, 1890, Morrison, Powles, and Sutton deposited the lease with the plaintiff, and by a memorandum of agreement of even date it was agreed as follows:—"That they the said J. Sutton, W. N. Morrison, and A. R. W. Powles, and each of them, will at his own cost and at the request of the said C. Hermoux, execute a legal mortgage of the said lease and premises, to be prepared by the solicitors of the said C. Hermoux, and to contain all such powers and provisions as their counsel should advise." On July 24, 1893, negotiations were commenced by and on behalf of Sutton and Co. for the purpose of administering their affairs under a deed of arrangement. On September 16, 1893, Sutton, Morrison, and Powles executed a legal mortgage of the lease to the plaintiff, in which they jointly and severally covenanted to pay the plaintiff £2,500. On November 16, 1893, a deed of arrangement was executed between Sutton, Morrison, and Powles and their creditors. It was contended by the defendant, the trustee, that the mortgage covenants were made by Sutton, Morrison, and Powles voluntarily, with a view to giving the plaintiff a preference over the other creditors, and were a fraud upon the creditors.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that according to the latest authority, "The Trustee of the Property of New France, and Garrard v. Hunting" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 19), he could not hold it to be a fraudulent preference, because the correspondence showed that the parties intended to carry out their obligations under the agreement of equitable deposit. It was clear by the operating words of the document of June 6, 1890, that a joint charge was given upon all the members of the firm, coupled with an undertaking that they would execute a legal mortgage. The fair interpretation was that there should be a joint liability.

Judgment in accordance with declaration prayed for.

MR. DICKENS, Q.C., and MR. RUFUS ISAACS were for the plaintiff; MR. ENGLISH HARRISON, Q.C., and MR. ATKIN for the defendant.

THE VICTOR PRETOT.*

Contempt of Court—Salvage suit—Foreign ship —Arrest by Admiralty Court—Moving ship without sanction of the Court.

This was a motion brought by some of the salvors of the ship Victor Pretot to commit Captain Lewis, dockmaster at Southampton, and Mr. John Horn, the ship's broker, for contempt of Court. The Victor Pretot is a foreign ship under arrest by the Admiralty Court for salvage. She had been placed, with the permission of the Court, in the wet dock at Southampton, to enable her cargo to be discharged. Whilst the cargo was being discharged, the ship, which was in a waterlogged condition owing to damage to her hull, showed signs of capsizing. The dockmaster at once had the vessel removed into a dry dock leading out of the wet dock and repaired, so that she would float in safety. After the repairs the ship was taken back into the wet dock and the rest of the cargo was discharged. The moving of the ship into dry dock without the sanction of the Court was the contempt of Court complained of.

MR. BADEN-POWELL, Q.C., and MR. A. E. NELSON appeared for the salvors of the Victor Pretot.

MR. ASPINALL, Q.C., on behalf of Mr. John Horn, and MR. BUTLER ASPINALL, for Captain Lewis, stated that their clients did not know they were acting contrary to the orders of the Court. What they had done had been absolutely necessary for the safety of the ship and the freeing of the dock from danger, and they therefore craved the indulgence of the Court.

THE PRESIDENT said that technically a contempt had been committed. It was admittedly necessary to put the ship promptly into dry dock, but the proper course before moving the ship would have been to have communicated at once to the collector of Customs, who was acting as agent for the marshal of this Court. As it was not, in his opinion, a serious contempt, he did not propose to punish Captain Lewis or Mr. Horn in any way.

KAYE V. CROYDON TRAMWAYS COMPANY.*

Company—Extraordinary meeting—Notice of—Insufficiency—Companies Clauses Act, 1845,
sec. 71.

Order of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 158), varied.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, reported ante, p. 158. The action was brought by a shareholder in the above-named company on behalf of himself and other shareholders for an injunction to restrain the company and the directors from carrying out an agreement for the sale of the company's undertaking to the British Electric Traction Company. The agreement was dated November 25, 1897, and was made between the Tramways Company of the one part, and the Traction Company of the other part. After providing for the sale of the undertaking, the agreement continued as follows:—Clause 2. "In consideration of the said sale the Traction Company shall on the completion thereof pay to the Tramways Company the sum of £30,543. The Traction Company shall also pay the sum of £500 to each of the present directors other than Mr. W. J. Carruthers Wain, to whom the sum of £1,250 shall be paid, and £500 to the secretary of the Tramways Company as compensation for loss of office." Clause 6 provided as follows:—"This agreement and all the provisions hereof are conditional upon the same being adopted by the shareholders of the Tramways Company, and in case of non-adoption it shall be lawful for the Traction Company, by notice in writing to the Tramways Company, to determine this agreement." On November 26, 1897, notice was given by the Tramways Company of an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders of the company to be held on December 14 at 12 o'clock at noon "for the purpose of considering, and, if thought advisable, of approving, the terms of an agreement to be made between the Croydon Tramways

Company of the one part, and the British Electric Traction Company (Limited) of the other part, being an agreement for sale of the undertaking and assets of the Croydon Tramways Company to the British Electric Traction Company (Limited).'' This notice was followed by a circular dated December 1, and issued to the shareholders, which stated that the object of the agreement was to carry out a sale of the undertaking and assets of the company to the British Electric Traction Company (Limited) at a price sufficient to pay off the preference capital at par and return 60 per cent. to the holders of the ordinary stock, and the circular continued, ''The Traction Company in addition assume the responsibility for the debentures and other liabilities of the company, and as they are desirous of having the management in their own hands the directors and secretary have agreed to retire on being paid a lump sum as compensation for their loss of office. The circular then gave certain reasons for showing that the terms were fairly satisfactory, and enclosed a form of proxy. At the extraordinary general meeting a resolution confirming the agreement was passed by a large majority notwithstanding the opposition of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's case was, first, that the stipulation in favour of the officers of the company rendered the agreement ultra vires, and secondly, that neither the notice nor the circular sufficiently disclosed the real nature of the agreement, and the meeting was, therefore, not duly summoned. This question turned upon the construction of section 71 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, which was incorporated in the special Act of the Tramways Company. That section provided that every notice of an extraordinary meeting should specify the purpose for which the meeting was called. The case came on before Mr. Justice Kekewich on January 11, upon motion for injunction. His Lordship held that, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the notice was insufficient, and he also came to the conclusion that the company could not as against a dissentient shareholder pass a valid resolution sanctioning an agreement which gave to officers of the company large sums by way of compensation which would not bring any benefit to the company. He therefore granted the injunction. The Tramways Company appealed. After the appeal was opened on February 9 it was arranged that the plaintiff should bring in the Traction Company as defendants, and the case stood over till to-day to enable that to be done.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Rowden were for the Tramways Company; Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Bradford were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the Traction Company.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after referring to the terms of the agreement and calling attention to the unusual character of the clause relating to the remuneration of the officers of the selling company, was not prepared to say that this agreement was ultra vires, or that the shareholders could not carry it out if they chose. The case of ''Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society'' (6 Chan., 614) showed the contrary. But by the terms of the agreement there was no contract until it had been approved by the shareholders. That gave rise to the question whether the notice of November 26 was a sufficient compliance with section 71 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. Any one who read that notice would understand that the meeting was convened to sanction an agreement for the sale of the undertaking to the Traction Company and would assume as a matter of course that, whatever the purchase money was to be, it was to be paid to the vendors; but that was not true, because a very considerable portion of it was payable to the officers of the selling company. Then, could it be said that this notice specified the purpose for which the meeting was called? In his Lordship's opinion the notice had been artfully framed to mislead the shareholders. It was playing with words to tell them that the meeting was convened for the purpose of approving the sale of the undertaking and to conceal from them that a large portion of the purchase money was not to be paid to the vendors. This was not a notice which disclosed the real purpose of the transaction. It followed that, though this contract was one which the parties could lawfully enter into, it was one which the selling company had not yet adopted so as to be binding on absent or dissentient members. The circular which followed the notice was sent out as much for the purpose of getting proxies as to give information, and it was not a full and fair disclosure to the shareholders of what was to be done. The real nature of the transaction had never been properly brought to the notice of the shareholders. The result was that the appeal succeeded to a certain extent and failed to a certain extent. The order of Mr. Justice Kekewich would be discharged, and an order substituted to restrain the company from carrying this agreement into effect until it had been duly sanctioned by a meeting of the company properly convened for the purpose.

LOBDS JUSTICES RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS gave judgment to the like effect.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1898.
Chitty, and Collins, L.J.J.) } Feb. 23.

SPOONER V. T. AND W. BROWNING.*

Principal and Agent—Authority of agent—Evidence of holding out—Stockbroker's clerk—Commission on business introduced—Authority of clerk to accept orders.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mr. Justice Hawkins at the trial of the action with a special jury. The appeal was argued on February 2, when the Court reserved judgment. The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith:—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, who is a farmer, against a firm of stockbrokers in substance to recover moneys paid by the plaintiff to a person named Dennis on account, as the plaintiff supposed, of the price of shares purchased by the defendants for him, which shares have not been delivered by the defendants to him. The case came to trial before Mr. Justice Hawkins and a special jury, when the learned Judge, doubting whether he should do so, left the following questions to the jury:—(1) Had Dennis express authority to enter into the contracts? Answer.—No. (2) Did the defendants hold him out or permit him to represent himself as possessed of such authority—that is, to enter into contracts on the defendants' behalf? Answer.—Yes. Mr. Justice Hawkins subsequently, after argument, entered judgment for the defendants, upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the second finding of the jury. The question is whether the learned Judge was right in so doing. The evidence, so far as material to the point under consideration, shows this—Dennis was a junior clerk of the defendants, who received a commission upon business introduced by him to them. Dennis was known to the plaintiff as a friend. Upon February 11, 1895, the plaintiff gave him an order to take to the defendants to be executed by them. It was an order to purchase for the plaintiff five Wolhuter shares. This order Dennis took to the defendants, who executed it, and the plaintiff afterwards received from the defendants a bought note signed by them showing the purchase of these shares by them for him. This note was sent by the defendants to the plaintiff by Dennis. On the same day the plaintiff gave a similar order through Dennis for the purchase by the defendants for the plaintiff of ten Mainland Consolidated shares. This order Dennis took to the defendants, who executed it, and the plaintiff afterwards received through Dennis a bought note signed by the defendants showing the purchase of these shares by the defendants for the plaintiff. After the receipt of these notes from the defendants the plaintiff, upon February 25, 1895, drew his cheque in favour of the defendants for the price of these two lots of shares, amounting to £35 8s. 6d., which cheque he gave to Dennis to be handed by him to the defendants. This Dennis did, and these two transactions are duly entered in the defendants' ledger. Upon March 8, 1895, the plaintiff gave a third order to Dennis to be taken to the defendants for them to purchase for the plaintiff 100 Idaho shares. This order Dennis also took to the defendants, who executed it, and afterwards sent through Dennis to the plaintiff a bought note signed by them showing the shares purchased by them for him. Upon March 19, 1895, the plaintiff drew his cheque for the amount of these shares—viz., £17 16s. 2d.—in favour of Dennis to be handed by him to the defendants, which he did. This transaction was also entered in the defendants' books, and these matters thus became closed. After these three transactions and throughout the year 1895 the plaintiff gave Dennis, who still remained the defendants' clerk, orders for the purchase of other shares to be taken by him to the defendants for execution. Dennis took none of these orders to the defendants. What he did was this. He made out notes purporting to be signed by the defendants and handed them to the plaintiff. These were forgeries of Dennis. The plaintiff, upon receipt of these forged bought notes, drew cheques for the different amounts supposed by him to be due to the defendants and handed them to Dennis to be taken to the defendants. These cheques Dennis misapplied to his own use. The defendants knew nothing of these orders of the plaintiff or of what Dennis was doing till the beginning of the year 1896. These were the shares in respect of which the question in this action arose.

Mr. Crump, Q.C., and Mr. J. Eldon Bankes appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. A. G. McIntyre appeared for the defendants.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment to-day dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice Collins dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read a judgment in which, after stating the facts as above set out, he said that it was not suggested that the plaintiff was guilty of any negligence in not finding out that the bought notes he received from Dennis from time to time did not bear the genuine signatures of the defendants, nor that the defendants were guilty of any negligence in not discovering Dennis's frauds. Both the plaintiff and the defendants were equally cheated by Dennis. The question was narrowed to this—Did the fact of a principal allowing an agent to obtain orders for him which he might or might not execute as he pleased, as the person giving the order well knew, afford any evidence either that he held out the agent as having authority to bind him by contracts or as representing that he, the principal, would execute the orders brought to him by the agent? It was clear that upon receipt of the first order the defendants would have been entitled to refuse to execute it, and they would have been under no obligation whatever to communicate to the plaintiff whether they would execute the order or not. If they had not executed this order the above remark would have applied to the second or any subsequent order, assuming that they had not executed any of the orders. It was said, however, that because they executed the first and two subsequent orders their position became altered, and they thereby held out the agent as having authority as regards subsequent orders to bind them by contracts, or, at any rate, held him out as representing that they would execute the orders thereafter brought to them by him, unless they communicated to the plaintiff that they would not execute the order so brought. When did the legal obligation upon the principal to communicate to the customer that he would not execute an order first arise? After the first, second, or third, or later order? If it arose at all it seemed to him to arise after the first order executed, and this, in his Lordship's judgment, was not so any more than after a second or a third order executed. The defendants knew nothing of the orders given to Dennis after the first three, and yet it was said that by not communicating to the plaintiff that they would not execute orders of which they knew nothing they were liable to the customer. His Lordship could not agree with that. Nor did the fact that the defendants accepted a cheque drawn by the plaintiff in favour of Dennis and brought to them by Dennis show that the defendants held out Dennis as having authority to receive payment. That cheque was taken in payment of an order executed, but that did not show that they held out Dennis as having authority to receive payment for orders which they had never heard of and did not execute. It seemed to him that, although there was evidence fit to be left to the jury that the defendants held out Dennis as their agent to receive orders, which they might or might not execute, there was no evidence that he was held out by the defendants as their agent either to make contracts on their behalf or to bind them to accept orders when brought by Dennis to them, and that they were not estopped by their conduct from asserting against the plaintiff what was the truth—namely, that they had not executed for the plaintiff the bought notes forged by Dennis. For these reasons there was, in his opinion, no evidence to support the second finding of the jury, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read a judgment in agreement with the above.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment in which he expressed his dissent from the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the Court. His Lordship said that there was no principle of law involved in the case, and, in his opinion, there was evidence to go to the jury in support of their finding.

IN RE PERKINS—POYSER V. REYFUS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Assignment—Covenant to indemnify assignor against liability for rent—Sub-assignment—Breach of covenant—Claim against executors of sub-assignee.

This was an originating summons to assert the right of Mr. Poyser, the original lessee of a house and stabling, No. 11, Hanover-terrace, Regent's-park, to an indemnity from the estate of the late Mr. G. F. Perkins, who at the time of his death was the holder of the lease, in respect of rent paid and other liabilities of Mr. Poyser to the lessor, under peculiar circumstances. The lease was granted by a Mr. Coster in the year 1891 to Mr. Poyser for a term of nine years. In 1893 the lease was assigned to one Plaistow, the assignee expressly covenanting to indemnify the assignor against liability for rent and other obligations to the lessor. In 1895 Mr. Plaistow assigned to Mr. Perkins; Mr. Perkins covenanted to indemnify Mr. Plaistow against liabilities under the lease and the first assignment. In November, 1895, Mr. Perkins died; in the following month Mr. Plaistow became bankrupt. In June, 1897, the executors of Mr. Perkins assigned to a man of straw, thus getting rid of direct liability on the part of their testator's estate to the lessor. Mr. Poyser was called on to pay rent, and did pay rent to the lessor. Mr. Poyser carried in a large claim in the bankruptcy of Plaistow on the covenant for indemnity. A compromise was arrived at between the trustee in the bankruptcy of Plaistow and Poyser, under which the trustee, in consideration of a release of all claim by Poyser and the payment of £5, assigned to Poyser the benefit of the covenant by Perkins to indemnify Plaistow. It was now contended on the part of the claimant Poyser that he was entitled to be indemnified out of the estate of Perkins the full amount he could have got out of Plaistow, and Plaistow could have recovered over from Perkins had Plaistow been solvent. It was contended on the part of the executors that their testator's contract with Plaistow, being one of indemnity, they were only liable for the loss the bankrupt's estate had actually sustained, which, under the circumstances, was nothing.

Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Wace were for the claimant; Mr. Everitt, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Ford for the executors.

Mr. Justice North considered himself bound by the decisions, particularly the case of "Ashdown v. Ingamells" (5 Ex. D., 280), and held that the claimant was entitled to be repaid out of the testator's estate rent already paid, and to a declaration that he ought to be indemnified against future payments of rent and loss in respect of breach of covenants in the lease, including liability for dilapidations at the end of the term.

IN RE LORD MONSON'S SETTLED ESTATES.*
Settled Land—Tenant for life—Other estates brought into settlement—Mortgages.

A tenant for life of settled lands brought into the settlement other estates of which he was tenant in fee, but which were mortgaged. These mortgages having been called in he obtained an order declaring that he had power to raise upon both sets of hereditaments the sums required to meet the mortgages.

This was a summons under the Settled Land Acts, which raised a general question on those Acts. It appeared that the applicant, Viscount Oxenbridge, was tenant for life of settled lands under the will (dated 1841) of the fifth Baron Monson and a conveyance to the uses of the will dated 1889, and that the applicant had by a deed made in 1892 brought into the settlement of 1841 other estates of which he was tenant in fee, but which were subject to considerable mortgages. These mortgages having been called in, the applicant asked for an order declaring that he had power to raise upon the hereditaments comprised in both settlements the sums required to meet the mortgages.

*Reported by E. B. SCHOMBURG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. F. C. Wright appeared for the applicant; Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Ribton for trustees; and Mr. Onslow for remaindermen.

Mr. Justice Romer said that in his opinion it would be clearly beneficial to the settled estates as a whole that the application should be complied with. The legal point was whether, under the Settled Land Act, where estate A is first settled, if later on by a separate instrument the equity of redemption in estate B is settled in a similar although not identical way, and then owing to subsequent events estate B, subject to its mortgage, comes to be settled in identically the same way as estate A, and then a mortgage on estate B has to be paid off by means of a fresh mortgage, the fresh mortgage may not be charged upon both estates A and B, such a course being advantageous to all persons interested under the settlements. The cases of "In re Mundy's Settled Estates" ([1891], 1 Ch., 399) and "In re Byng's Settled Estates" ([1892] 2 Ch., 219) were decisions that two instruments could constitute one settlement under section 2, subsection 1 of the Act, and that if estate A had been subject to the mortgage the fresh mortgage might have been on estate B. He saw no reason why there should be any distinction in the present and converse case. The only ground suggested for making a distinction was that to allow that a second estate might be settled in the same way as a prior estate, so as to become one with it for all purposes under the Settled Land Act, might lead to acts of fraud. It was suggested that the mortgagor of estate B, who was tenant for life of the settled estate A, might settle the worthless equity of redemption of B and then free himself from his personal liability as mortgagor by getting estate A to pay the mortgage debt. But in reality such a case of fraud could not practically be carried out, for, apart from the difficulty of getting trustees appointed or to accept office on the settlement of a worthless property like B, before any mortgage of estate A could be made notice would have to be given to the trustees under section 45 of the Act, and they would at once put a stop to the attempted fraud by obtaining an injunction as in "Hampden v. Earl of Buckinghamshire" ([1893] 2 Ch., 531). The utility of the decision in "In re Mundy's Settled Estates" ought not to be interfered with by mere suggestions that fraud might possibly be attempted. Frauds might be attempted in many ways by tenants for life under the ordinary provisions of the Settled Land Act, but that consideration did not prevent the Act being passed or being useful. In ordinary cases when two estates were settled in the same way it was most useful to the beneficiaries that the two should be treated together for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and it would impair the usefulness of the Act to limit it so as to exclude an application in the way contended for by the respondents to the summons. He held that what was proposed to be done could be lawfully done, and he therefore and for the reasons given made an order as prayed.

CRAWLEY V. WHITE.*
Gaming—Speculating in iron market—Paying differences—8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, sec. 18.

This case, in which two actions between the same parties had been consolidated, was tried by Mr. Justice Kennedy without a jury at the last autumn assizes at

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Leeds. In the first action the plaintiff claimed £251 10s. 5d. for goods sold, or, alternatively, for refusal to accept delivery of goods sold. In the second action the plaintiff's claim was against the defendant as acceptor of two bills of exchange for £184 10s. 9d. and for £184 10s. In both actions the substantial defence was that the plaintiff's claim arose out of certain gambling transactions in respect of differences in speculations in the rise and fall in the market price of pig iron, and that such transactions were contracts by way of gaming and wagering within 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, s. 18. In the second action the defendant counter-claimed on a bill of exchange drawn by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant, and endorsed by him to a bank. The defendant had paid the bank the amount of the bill, and now alleged that the bill was accepted by him in respect of the same gambling transactions, and that he was therefore entitled to recover the amount from the plaintiff. The case was adjourned to town for further argument, and judgment was reserved.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Bairstow appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Boyd, Q.C., and Mr. H. F. Manisty appeared for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered judgment. In the course of his judgment his Lordship said that on January 13, 1897, the defendant entered into certain dealings with the plaintiff, the purport of which was that the defendant bought from the plaintiff storekeeper's warrants for 1,000 tons of hematite pig iron, payment to be by cash in Glasgow on March 12 or before in buyer's option on giving three days' notice against documents. These storekeeper's warrants were documents issued by the storekeeper, and in buying hematite it was sometimes described as storekeeper's warrants for so many tons. The price in this case was 52s. 3d. per ton. The defendant bought from the plaintiff on the same day another 1,000 tons at 52s. 3½d. per ton. In both cases on the sale note there was added, "Commission ¼ per cent.," but according to the plaintiff this was not, strictly speaking, commission, but represented his profit, and was added to what he calculated was the fair Glasgow price to a seller in order to prevent the defendant from thinking the price too high. On January 20 a similar transaction was entered into in respect of storekeeper's warrants for 2,000 tons. In March the three months elapsed in regard to the first two transactions and the plaintiff called upon the defendant to pay him the difference between the sale price and the then price on the Glasgow market, the price having fallen. The defendant made difficulties as to paying, and the matter was settled as to all three transactions by the defendant accepting three bills of exchange for the amount of the differences, two of which were the bills sued on by the plaintiff in the second action and the third bill was the subject of the defendant's counter-claim. It was also part of the same arrangement that the plaintiff should "continue," or "carry over," the transactions for two months, which was carried out by a formal repurchase from the defendant and the issue of a fresh sale note made out for the same warrants at current prices. Under this arrangement the date for completion would be May 18. The market continued to fall, and on May 18 the defendant failed to pay the differences and the plaintiff closed the transaction. In the first action the plaintiff claimed the amount of the differences. The main defence raised was that the transactions were really contracts by way of gaming and wagering within 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, s. 18, and the question which his Lordship had to decide was whether as Lord Herschell put it in "The Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan" ([1896] A.C., 173), these were real transactions of commerce or mere gambling for differences. After a careful consideration of the evidence and of the above-mentioned authority, and also the cases of "Forget v. Ostigny" ([1895] A.C., 318) and "Thacker v. Hardy" (4 Q.B.D., 685), his Lordship felt himself compelled to come to the conclusion that the statutory defence set up by the defendant in both actions had been made out. The plaintiff, who said that he was an iron merchant, appeared to be so only in the sense that he bought and sold warrants for future dates. He sold to his clients, as he called them, and also speculated as a buyer on the Glasgow iron market, "carrying over," or "continuing," and paying or receiving differences. The defendant in these transactions was an oil merchant, and he also was dealing as a speculator. Transactions between the parties had been going on for seven years, covering 200,000 tons of iron. In every one of these transactions differences only had been paid; no demand for delivery of warrants or of iron was ever made. The plaintiff said that he always intended to deliver if delivery was asked for. His Lordship could not accept that statement. The well-understood intention was to pay and receive differences only, and neither of these contracts were intended to be executed by delivery according to the obligation expressed upon the face of them. Lord Halsbury in "Forget v. Ostigny," after pointing out that a contract could not be properly described as a gaming contract merely because it is entered into in furtherance of a speculation, said, at p. 323:—"The question whether a contract is intended to be executed by delivery, according to the obligations expressed upon the face of it, is no doubt an important test for determining whether it is a real one or only a gambling arrangement under the guise of a commercial contract." Counsel for the plaintiff sought to establish that the plaintiff had entered into certain contracts on the Glasgow Exchange which, although not made specifically for the purpose, would have enabled him to fulfil his contracts with the defendant, so that he stood to make nothing on the contracts beyond the ¼ per cent. commission or profit. If that could have been made good, it would have been an important point in the plaintiff's favour, for as Lord Justice Cotton said in "Thacker v. Hardy" (4 Q.B.D., 695):—"The essence of gaming and wagering is that one party is to win and another to lose upon a future event which at the time of the contract is of an uncertain nature—that is to say, if the event turns out one way, A will lose; but if it turns out the other way he will win." The result of the evidence was that the plaintiff failed to make good this point. It did not appear that the plaintiff had open contracts of purchase representing more than half the amount of iron which it would be requisite to deliver if the defendant called for delivery. These Glasgow transactions were in the nature of "hedging" contracts entered into with a view of preventing a heavy loss in the event of a sudden fall in prices, but this "hedging" did not establish the plaintiff in such a position that he did not stand either to win or lose by a fall. On these facts his Lordship held that the transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant were mere gambling, and therefore the plaintiff's claim in both actions failed. With regard to the defendant's counter-claim, it was said that the statute 4 and 5, Will. IV., c. 41, s. 2, entitled him to recover the amount which he had paid on the bill. That section, in his Lordship's opinion, did not apply to transactions such as these, and on the counter-claim the defendant's case failed.

HIS LORDSHIP granted a stay, if notice of appeal was given within seven days.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., } 1898.

 OPPERT v. THE BROWN HILL GREAT SOUTHERN (LIMITED)—THE SAME COMPANY v. COPELAND.*

Company—Meeting—Resolution declared unanimously passed—No objection taken—Subsequent attempt to restrain its being acted on—Injunction refused.

The first of these appeals was by the plaintiffs, Mr. E. D. Oppert and Mr. F. H. Kirby, against a decision of Mr. Justice North, dated January 25. The second appeal was by the defendant, Mr. J. F. Copeland, against a decision of the same learned Judge on the same date. The appeals were brought under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Oppert and Kirby, moved before Mr. Justice North for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants other than the defendant company from acting or purporting to act as directors of the defendant company, and for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from preventing the plaintiffs acting as directors of the defendant company and from excluding the plaintiffs from meetings of such directors. At the same time the company moved for an order directing the defendant, Mr. J. F. Copeland, who was the former secretary of the company, to deliver up to them, or as they might direct, all books, documents, and chattels of the company in his possession. It appeared that on January 3 last an extraordinary meeting of the company was held, upon a requisition of certain shareholders of the company, for the purpose of considering and, if thought fit, passing a resolution that four of the directors of the company (including the plaintiffs) should be removed from the board of directors, and of electing other directors in their stead. The plaintiffs contended that, on the chairman of the meeting putting the resolution to the shareholders present, three shareholders voted by show of hands against the resolution and only eight voted in favour of it, and that therefore the resolution was not carried by the requisite majority of three-fourths under section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862. The chairman announced that the resolution was unanimously passed, and at the time no protest was made nor was any poll demanded. The evidence was contradictory as to what voting actually occurred at the meeting, but Mr. Justice North came to the conclusion that Mr. Copeland had not voted against the resolution in such a manner that the chairman of the meeting could have seen him, and further that ten members had voted in favour of the resolution, so that even if Mr. Copeland had voted there would have been the required majority. His Lordship accordingly dismissed the plaintiffs' motion. On the motion made by the company against Mr. Copeland the learned Judge made an order as asked by the company.

In the first appeal Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney were for the appellants. In the second appeal Mr. Martelli was for the appellant, Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. W. F. Hamilton were for the respondents in both appeals.

Their LORDSHIPS, without calling upon the respondents' counsel to argue, dismissed both appeals.

The MASTER of the ROLLS in giving judgment said, with reference to the first appeal, that the action was a curiosity in its way. It was a squabble about a resolution passed at a meeting held on January 3, 1898, for the purpose of removing some of the old directors of the company and appointing others. A resolution in favour of removing the directors was declared unanimously passed by the chairman of the meeting. Oppert and another—one of whom was present at the meeting and the other not—brought an action against the new directors appointed by the resolution and the company for an injunction to restrain the directors appointed by the resolution from acting or purporting to act as directors of the company, and from preventing the plaintiffs acting as directors of the company and from excluding the plaintiffs from meetings of such directors. What was amiss? The meeting was held on a proper notice. The dispute now was as to the exact number of persons present and voting at the meeting. Oppert, who was not present, had three clerks who were. The chairman declared the result of the voting to be unanimous. Nobody challenged that ruling at the time; nobody then said that there had been any mistake. Neither of the three clerks of Oppert, nor Oppert's co-plaintiff, nor any one else, then objected. Copeland, the then secretary of the company, knew that it was not in Oppert's interests to demand a poll. Pausing there, was it to be tolerated that persons should allow a resolution to be declared as passed—not saying a word at the time, but letting the matter slide—and then bring an action to restrain its being acted on? If the Court did so hold it would be setting a precedent which would be extremely disastrous to companies. It would be intolerable if such a course were possible. Such a thing had never been heard of before, and without going into detail his Lordship thought that this was an experiment which he hoped would never be repeated. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs, and as a consequence the second appeal likewise.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY AND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1898.

 IN THE MATTER OF AN ELECTION FOR THE CITY OF YORK—FURNESS v. BERESFORD.*

Election Law—Parliament—Petition for a scrutiny—Particulars—Election Petition Rules, 1868, r. 7.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Lawrance at Chambers in the matter of a petition arising out of the recent Parliamentary election for the city of York, in which the candidates were Lord Charles Beresford, the respondent, and Sir Christopher Furness, the petitioner, and which resulted in Lord Charles Beresford being declared to be elected by a majority of 11 votes. The petition alleged that various classes of persons had voted at the election whose votes were void and ought to be struck off the poll—e.g., persons who had personated other persons, aliens, persons who were guilty of corrupt or illegal practices, persons who were employed for payment as agents or clerks in connexion with the election, persons who voted at a wrong polling station, persons who voted more than once, and persons who were not on the register of voters; and the petition prayed that a recount might be had of the ballot papers, and that a scrutiny might be allowed of the votes given and tendered at the election, and that it might be determined that the respondent was not duly elected, and that the petitioner was duly elected and ought to have been returned. The order appealed from was made on a summons taken out by the respondent, and was an order that the petitioner should within four days deliver to the respondent's agents particulars of the corrupt and illegal practices, illegal payments, illegal employment, and illegal hiring in the sixth paragraph of the petition mentioned, and that the 11th paragraph of the petition be struck out, and that both parties should have leave to appeal. Paragraph 11 was as follows:—"And your petitioner further says that certain persons voted at the said election in respect of entries in the register of voters of the said city, in respect of which said entries the said persons were not entitled to vote, and that the votes of the said persons are void and ought to be struck off the poll." The respondent's objection to this paragraph was that it was ambiguous and embarrassing, as including classes of persons who were referred to in other paragraphs of the petition. The appeal was brought by the petitioner, and there was also a cross-appeal by the respondent asking that certain other paragraphs of the petition might be struck out.

MR. DICKENS, Q.C. (Mr. Willoughby Williams with him), for the petitioner, said that the petition in this case merely claimed a recount and scrutiny; it did not seek to avoid the election on the ground of corrupt and illegal practices or any similar ground. The petitioner claimed that he had a majority of lawful votes, and his case was that he was entitled to strike out the votes which had been given by persons not duly qualified to vote or not competent to vote, in order that he might show that he had such a majority. This case was governed by Rule 7 of the rules made under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868. Rule 6 was a rule applying to election petitions generally, and it provided for the giving of particulars by the petitioner or the respondent within four days of the making of an order for such particulars. Rule 7 applied specially to cases in which the petitioner alleged that he had a majority of lawful votes and claimed a scrutiny, and it provided that an order might be made that particulars of the votes objected to should be given by the petitioner six days before the trial of the petition. The learned Judge therefore was wrong in ordering these particulars to be given within four days. Paragraph 11 of the petition was not ambiguous, nor did it include cases covered by other paragraphs. It related to persons who were the occupiers of two qualifying tenements, and whose names therefore occurred twice on the register, and who had voted in respect of that tenement for which their names had been starred at the revision of the lists by the revising barrister.

MR. JELF, Q.C. (Mr. Lewis Coward with him), for the respondent, contended that some particularity of information must be given even in a case where the petition only asks for a scrutiny, and that paragraph 11 could not reasonably be read in the way suggested by the petitioner, and also argued the cross-appeal asking that other portions of the petition might be struck out.

MR. DICKENS, Q.C., replied.

THE COURT allowed the appeal and dismissed the cross-appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the petitioner sought by this petition to have himself declared duly elected as member for York, and he sought to have this declaration on a scrutiny only. He did not ask to have the election avoided for bribery, illegal practices, treating, or anything of that sort. His object was to have it ascertained by a scrutiny on which side the majority of the votes lay. Accordingly he set out a number of allegations to the effect that certain votes which had been given at the election were void on various grounds and ought to be struck off the poll. The petition was, in his opinion, good in form and in fact; it could not be said to be too general, taking into account the practice which had prevailed for many years with regard to election petitions. Rule 7 of the Parliamentary Election Petition Rules expressly applied to the case where a petition claimed a seat for an unsuccessful candidate, alleging that he had a majority of lawful votes. Rule 6 was a general rule, and in the case of "Munro v. Balfour" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 113) it was held that Rule 6 did not apply to cases to which Rule 7 applied. That decision governed this case, and in his opinion there was no jurisdiction here to make any order except an order that particulars of the votes objected to should be given six days before the day appointed for the trial of the petition. As to paragraph 11, he could not say, having regard to the Acts relating to registration, that it ought to be struck out. It seemed clearly to raise matters which were properly to be considered on the hearing of the petition. The same observation applied to those paragraphs which the respondent asked to have struck out.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY said that the learned Judge had acted under Rule 6. He thought, however, that "Munro v. Balfour" had been rightly decided, and that where a petitioner claimed that he had a majority of lawful votes Rule 7 alone applied. Neither the petitioner nor the respondent had any right to get particulars from the other until six days before the hearing of the petition. On the other points raised he would only say that he agreed with Lord Justice A. L. Smith.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was also of the same opinion.

MR. JELF, Q.C., then appealed from an order made on a summons taken out by the petitioner, directing that all the ballot papers should be produced before Mr. Edwin C. Cooke at the Royal Courts of Justice, in order that they might be inspected and enumerated, and that Mr. Cooke should reserve for the consideration of the Judges appointed to try the petition such only of the ballot papers as might remain at the conclusion of the inspection and enumeration in dispute between the parties, and that the petitioner and the respondent should in all respects be bound by the result of the said inspection and enumeration.

THE COURT struck out the words as to the parties being bound by the result of the inspection and enumeration, and ordered that Mr. Cooke should report the result to the Election Petition Judges.

IN RE MAYNARDS (LIMITED).*

Company—Filing of contract—Issue of fully paid-up shares—Companies Act, 1867, sec. 25—Sufficiency of contract filed—Consideration not fully stated.

A question which is of the greatest practical importance to shareholders in limited companies, in reference to the sufficiency of the contract to be filed pursuant to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 131), on the issue of fully paid-up shares, arose in this case. It appeared that by an agreement of March 14, 1896, the applicant, Mr. C. R. Maynard, agreed to sell certain businesses and leasehold tenements, which were fully described in the schedule to the agreement, to the above-mentioned company when incorporated in consideration of £40,000 to be paid partly in cash and partly in shares fully paid up. This agreement was duly confirmed by the company when incorporated and the company proceeded to issue to the applicant fully paid-up shares in accordance with it. The agreement, which was filed on the issue of these shares with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies under section 25 of the Act of 1867, contained a recital of the previous agreement fully setting forth the terms of the purchase as regards the parties to it and the nature and extent of the consideration to be paid in cash and in fully paid-up shares, but the property which was the subject of the sale was described merely as "the business and property mentioned in the first part of the schedule" to the previous agreement and "the leasehold hereditaments short particulars of which are set out in the second part of" the same schedule, there being no further reference to the property nor copy of or reference to the schedule. In view of the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in "In re Kharaskoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate" ([1897] 2 Ch., 451) doubts were entertained as to the sufficiency of the registered contract by reason of its failure fully to state the consideration given for the shares, and application was accordingly made to the Court for the rectification of the register of shareholders with a view to the filing of a proper contract and the due reissue of the shares to the applicant as fully paid-up. In the case in the Court of Appeal the pecuniary consideration was not stated in any way in the registered contract but there was merely a reference to a preceding contract under which "for the considerations therein stated" the company had agreed to allot the shares. That case, therefore, did not conclude the point arising in the present case.

* Reported by G. I. FORTER COOKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. WARRINGTON, Q.C., and Mr. WHINNEY, for the applicant, submitted that the sufficiency of the contract was so doubtful that the register ought to be rectified.

Mr. VERNON, for the company, suggested that it was not necessary for the Court to decide whether the contract was or was not sufficient, but merely that its sufficiency was open to doubt.

Mr. KIRBY appeared for a member of a committee of shareholders.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, after observing that it had been suggested that he should be content to say that there was a doubt whether the contract was sufficient or not, but that in his opinion it was his duty to pronounce a decision upon the point, and after expressing his regret that the question had not been fully argued and that consequently his decision might not be an authority binding on any other Judge, continued as follows:—The question is whether this is a sufficient contract within section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the objection to it being that the consideration for the issue of these fully paid-up shares is not sufficiently stated. In the first place it may be said that it is not a contract at all, and in one sense it is not, for, though expressed to be a contract, it is in reality only a memorandum of the original contract or, as it is termed, a confirmatory contract. But to my mind it is far too late in the day to say that a confirmatory contract is not sufficient within the meaning of the Act. It may be said that, technically, when once you have made a binding contract you cannot make another. The original contract is the contract, and you cannot make another contract which is only an embodiment of the previous contract and say that that is the contract. But there is no doubt that a short confirmatory contract is sufficient for the purposes of this enactment. It has always been so regarded and to hold otherwise would be uselessly to endanger properties held under a confirmatory contract registered in the same way as this contract. I put that consideration aside; but whether you call it a confirmatory contract, in the same sense in which in the case of old charters there might be what is termed an "inseximus" charter, it must have all the elements of a contract. That I understand to be the foundation and substance of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of "In re Kharaskoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate"

(L.R. [1897], 2 Ch., 451). For the present purpose the Lord Justice Chitty puts the matter more directly and plainly than the other Lords Justices. At p. 468 he says:—"Now what is the object of the section? Publicity, to give information by registering the contract to any person who proposes to deal with the company either by way of becoming a shareholder or lending money, or the like. He is to go to the register to find what? To find the contract. He goes to the register in this case, but he does not find the contract. He finds part—half, as it were—of the contract." The Lord Justice does not mean that you may not register a confirmatory contract, or that you must register the whole contract, but that you must register the whole of that part of the contract which affects the transaction between the company and the shareholder. You must show all the elements of that contract. You have not got a contract if you omit the name of the vendor, or the name of the purchaser, or the amount of the consideration, or a fair description of the thing to be purchased. No doubt the cases as regards real property run very fine on each of those four points, and different Judges have taken different views, but it is clear that you must comply with those four requirements. You must indicate the vendor, the purchaser, the price to be given, and the thing to be purchased. In the present case you have the names of the vendor—i.e., the proprietor, who is to take the shares—and of the purchasers—i.e., the company who is to allot the shares—and the nature and amount of the price is fully stated. But have you got the thing which is to be purchased, the property in exchange for which the shares are to be allotted as fully paid up? Before I refer to the terms of the contract I will quote these further words of the Lord Justice Chitty. "This judgment of ours will not in any way affect the question with what degree of particularity the consideration must be stated in the contract. If the consideration is, for instance, a concession in South Africa, the person who reads the registered document will see that it is a concession in South Africa, and will form his own opinion about it." I do not suppose the Lord Justice meant to say that a reference to a concession in South Africa, without more, would be sufficient. "So, if it is furniture supplied to an hotel company he may be able to go at once and see what that furniture is, or he may not, because after a lapse of time the furniture may be worn out. Again, if it is the sale of a goodwill and stock-in-trade, the consideration stated being the goodwill and the stock-in-trade, he sees the nature of the consideration, and he sees it stated." The Lord Justice is there thinking of the furniture supplied to an hotel company, which is in an hotel which is named in the registered contract, and when he speaks of goodwill and stock-in-trade he means the goodwill and stock-in-trade of a particular business described in the contract. Apply that to this contract and the required result is something which you may fairly regard as incorporated into the contract as showing the substratum of the contract; what then do we find? The contract contains a recital that by an agreement dated March 14, 1896, the vendor has agreed to sell and the company when incorporated has agreed to purchase "(a) the businesses and property mentioned in the first part of the schedule thereto, and (b) the leasehold hereditaments and tenancies, short particulars of which are set out in the second part of the schedule thereto." So that in some schedule which he cannot look at the person who proposes to deal with the company is told he will find short particulars. He does not know whether there is one leasehold house or 50, whether they are let at a rack rent or a building rent—in fact, he knows nothing whatever about it, and cannot find it out from the contract. It seems to me that it is idle to say that the terms of the contract are set out when one of the most important elements of the contract—namely, the property which is the subject matter of it—is described by reference to a schedule which you cannot see. It seems to me that though the Lord Justice Chitty says that the judgment of the Court of Appeal will not affect the question with what degree of particularity the consideration must be stated, yet that judgment shows that there must be some degree of particularity, and there is no particularity here. To say that the property is fully described in the document last mentioned is precisely the same thing for this purpose as if it were not mentioned at all. I have thought it my duty to express an opinion, and I have no doubt myself that this is a bad contract. The result is that, as there is no doubt about the intention of the parties, the register must be rectified. His Lordship then referred as to the form of the order to be made to “Chadwyck Healey on Companies,” 3rd edition, p. 384, where it is stated that in an unreported case of “In re Eberhardt Company” the Court of Appeal had held that the order ought simply to direct that the name of the applicant should be struck off the register of shareholders, and not to proceed to give directions that he should be put on the register in respect of shares fully paid up. That might be his right, but it was no part of the rectification to be ordered by the Court. His Lordship said he had always adopted that view from the time when his attention had been first called to the book referred to. The order accordingly was made for rectification of the register.

REG. V. THE GOVERNOR OF HER MAJESTY'S PRISON OF HOLLOWAY (EX PARTE BUDDENBORG).*

Criminal Law—Extradition—Criminal law of Netherlands—Postponement of execution of sentence—Treaty June 19, 1873.

This was the argument on a rule for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge from custody on an order of extradition to the Netherlands Hermann Rudolph Buddenborg, who had been convicted of an offence under the bankruptcy law of the Netherlands.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), and Mr. Henry Sutton appeared for the Crown; Mr. R. Wallace, Q.C. (Mr. H. W. Rowsell with him) appeared in support of the rule.

The facts were these:—Buddenborg in October, 1893, was adjudicated a bankrupt at Haarlem, in Holland, according to the laws of the State, while he was absent in England. In November, 1893, Buddenborg was extradited in respect of a charge that he had committed certain offences against the bankruptcy laws of the said State. He was handed over to the Netherlands authorities. He then appealed against his adjudication in bankruptcy, and was detained in prison, awaiting trial for the offences for which he had been extradited, for ten months. As the appeal had not been heard at the expiration of that time—namely, in September, 1894—he was released. He remained in Holland until June, 1895, when he started business as a florist in England. In 1896 his appeal was dismissed. In September of that year, being still in England, he received a summons to attend his trial for the offences for which he had been extradited, and he thereupon went over to Holland and was tried on September 27, 1896. He was convicted on part of the charges, and on October 8 he received a sentence of 14 months' imprisonment, from which the term of ten months which he had already served was to be deducted. He was thus ordered to serve 112 days' imprisonment. On application to the officer of justice that he might serve the said remainder of his term—namely, 112 days—at some other time, the request was granted, and Buddenborg returned to England and carried on his business in London as before. On February 2, 1898, he was arrested on a warrant as having been convicted of the commission of crimes against the bankruptcy laws of the Netherlands Government, being the crimes for which he had already been extradited in November, 1893, and convicted and punished. He submitted that the commitment was wrong, as he had previously been extradited on the same charge, also that the term of 112 days had expired, and that therefore he had already been tried, convicted, and suffered punishment. He also claimed that his release was an unconditional one. The extradition was claimed under the treaty with the Netherlands, which is dated June 19, 1873. Article IV. of the treaty is as follows:—“The extradition shall not take place if the person claimed on the part of the Government of the United Kingdom or the person claimed on the part of the Government of the Netherlands has already been tried and discharged or punished, or is still under trial in the Netherlands or in the United Kingdom respectively, for the crime for which his extradition is demanded. Article V.—The extradition shall not take place if, subsequently to the commission of the crime or the institution of the penal prosecution or the conviction thereon, exemption from prosecution or punishment has been acquired by lapse of time according to the laws of the State applied to.”

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL contended that there was no ground for interfering with the extradition order. No exemption had been acquired by Buddenborg under Article V. That article only meant that a country should not surrender a person if the surrendering country had already punished him for the very offence on which the claim for extradition was based. Here that had not been done.

Mr. WALLACE urged that extradition ought not to be allowed. The time had elapsed now under Article V. A sentence could not under English law be respited so as to begin at a future time. There was no real respite by the Court in this case. It was not the Court that had allowed Buddenborg to go away, but an “officer of justice,” which the learned counsel thought meant a sort of magnified policeman.

Mr. ROWSELL, following on the same side, referred to Wilkes's case (19 How. State Trials, 1,075) and “Reg. v. de Castro” (6 App. Cas., 229) as authorities to shew that a punishment to commence at a future specified day was illegal, and still more if it was to begin at an uncertain day. The case where a person was to suffer a previous sentence first was the only exception to this rule. Buddenborg had, in effect, been dismissed from custody. To be dismissed from custody was equivalent to being discharged. He had, therefore, undergone punishment, and could not be extradited.

The COURT discharged the rule.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT said it was plain, from the letters and the affidavit, that in the Netherlands the execution of a sentence might be postponed at the request of a party. Here that had been done; whether as a respite or not he would not attempt to say. But, at any rate, it had been done at the request of the applicant, and he could not now be heard to say that he had served his sentence. On that ground, therefore, he failed. A second question was this. Was the postponement of the execution of the sentence a bar to extradition? It was contended that lapse of time created a bar. It was true that that might have been made a term of the treaty between the contracting countries, but it was not in fact included in it. Under section 10 of the Extradition Act, 1870, all that was required was proof of conviction. When, under Article V., exemption from punishment had been "acquired by lapse of time, according to the laws of the State applied to," the extradition was not to be granted. Those words, however, were wholly inapplicable in this case. They referred to such limitations as were imposed by various statutes. With regard to Article IV., the meaning of it was that if a crime had been committed by a person, for which crime he could be punished in both countries, and he had, in fact, been punished for it in one, he could not be tried again for it in the other. The extradition would not be interfered with.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred.

Commissioners of sewers divided the rateable property in their district into three classes, and a differential rate was made in respect of each class.

Rate quashed.

This was a special case stated by the Quarter Sessions for Somerset on an appeal against a rate made by the Langport District Drainage Board. The quarter sessions quashed the rate. The question raised was whether commissioners of sewers are entitled to classify different lands in their district and to levy proportionate rates according to the benefit derived from the works.

Mr. Foote, Q.C., and Mr. C. S. Garland appeared in support of the rate, appealing against the decision of the quarter sessions; Mr. R. Wallace, Q.C., Mr. Howland Roberts, and Mr. Weatherley appeared against it.

The Langport District Board, in addition to special powers conferred on them by the Somersetshire Drainage Act, 1877, have, under section 140 of that Act, "all powers conferred on commissioners of sewers by Act of Parliament, law, or custom." The board had divided the rateable property in their district into three classes upon the principle of proportionate benefit received and danger avoided by virtue of the said Act; and a differential rate was levied in respect of each class. Thus, class one was rated at 1s. in the pound, class two at 8d., and class three at 6d. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the quarter sessions were right in quashing a rate based on this principle.

Mr. FOOTE contended that the principle was a right and proper one. He said that under the statute 28 Henry VIII., section 2, commissioners of sewers might levy a rate by such ways and means as should appear to the commissioners convenient. This left them entire discretion, and there was absolutely no authority to the effect that the system followed in this case was illegal, and it certainly was most equitable. The commissioners had very carefully gone through the lands and made an assessment according to the value of the benefit derived by each separate property. He cited "Bow v. Smith" (9 Mod., 94), "Soady v. Wilson" (3 A. and E., 248, 1835), "Reg. v. Commissioners of Sewers for the Tower Hamlets" (9 B. and C., 517), "The Metropolitan Board of Works v. the Vauxhall-bridge Company" ([1857] 7 E. and B., 964), "Reg. on the prosecution of the Imperial Gas Company v. Head" (3 B. and S., 419), "Pugh v. Metropolitan Board of Works" (34 L.J., M.C., 97).

Mr. WALLACE cited "Griffiths v. the London and Eversfield Drainage Board" ([1871] 41 L.J., Q.B., 25), "St. Katharine Dock Company v. Higgs" ([1845] 10 Q.B., 641).

The COURT affirmed the quarter sessions in quashing the rate.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said it seemed to him that if the proposition for which Mr. Foote was contending had been well founded there would have been discovered some expressions in the cases on the subject in its favour long ago. None such were to be found. The system would involve great interference with private property and complicated inquiry, and the difficulty of working out appeals would be almost insuperable. There was no one authority which was clear in favour of the contention. The Vauxhall case was the only one that approached it, and the statement of the Court then on this point was extra-judicial, and at any rate it did not carry the case far enough. The effect was only that lands which were benefited could alone be rated. That case, moreover, dealt with a special Act, in which were words providing for "any reduction or allowance in respect of the sewers rate." Moreover, there were observations by the Judges in the late case of "Pugh v. Metropolitan Board of Works" (34 L.J., M.C., 97), which implied that the Court did not altogether approve of the extra-judicial opinion of the Court in the former case, though they did not in express terms decide against it. One other point might be mentioned. It was very doubtful whether the board would be entitled to divide the district under 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 22, section 14, into special districts by the method of constituting into a district any property, say, 50ft. above the level of the marsh. This would render it necessary to take isolated properties here and there, and as under the Act the levy and expenditure of the rate was to be within the district, a district could not well be constituted in that manner.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING was of the same opinion, but thought that the opinion given by the Judges in the Vauxhall case was in favour of the view taken by the drainage board. It could not, however, be binding on this Court, as it was extra-judicial. The principle contended for had, therefore, never been acted on. It would occasion great complications if it were.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE TYPESETTING MACHINE COMPANY (LIMITED) AND ANOTHER V. THE LINOTYPE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Defamation—Libel—Trade libel—No allegation of special damage—Finding by jury that the libel was defamatory of the plaintiffs as well as their goods.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by E. HARBINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this action the British Empire Typesetting Machine Company and the Empire Typesetting Machine Company, English and American companies respectively, sought to recover damages for libel from the Linotype Company, who carry on their business at 188, Fleet-street, E.C. The defendants denied that the words complained of were libellous, and maintained that they were true in substance and fact. They also said that there was no allegation of special damage.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Mr. Gregson Ellis were counsel for the plaintiffs; and Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. J. Eldon Bankes, and Mr. Lewis Thomas appeared for the defendants.

SIR ROBERT REID, in opening the case, said that the two plaintiff companies were the owners of patent rights for the manufacture of certain typesetting machines and had them in use in this country, America, and various other parts of the world. The circumstances which gave rise to the libel in question were as follows. There was a newspaper in New York called the Evening Sun, and five machines of the Empire Typesetting Company were sent to be used in that office in the spring of 1896 for the purposes of trial. In the summer of 1896 some trouble arose through the action of a trade union there, and the union declared that the office of the Evening Sun, in consequence of the use of these machines, was a "machine" room, which meant that the persons employed there, who were under the rules of the union, were required to receive nine hours' pay for eight hours' work. A compromise with the union was attempted unsuccessfully, and it was, in consequence of the heavy tax thus imposed on the machines, found necessary to discontinue four out of five of them. Those being the facts, a rival company in this country, the Linotype Company, through an official, on June 9, 1896, sent to the editor of the St. James's Gazette a letter in these words:—"We shall be greatly obliged if you could make some use of the enclosed in your columns." The enclosed was the following article, which was complained of as a libel:—

"The Empire Typesetter in America.—The Union Printer and American Craftsman, the most wide-awake and spirited of American trade journals, has recently contained several references to the Empire composing machines, which were installed in the office of the New York Evening Sun with such a flourish of trumpets. From these paragraphs we gather that five machines altogether have been employed in this office, the first being introduced some time in the month of February last, and the other four commencing operations on March 9 last. So short-lived, however, does this installation appear to have been, that we learn the machines were discontinued on Wednesday, April 29, and now the Empire Company is in receipt of notice to remove them altogether in the course of a few days. This will be a very serious blow for this machine." This announcement insinuated that the machines had been discontinued because they had proved to be failures and that was what was intended to be conveyed to persons interested in them. It was the statement of the truth so worded as to convey an entirely false character to what had really occurred. The American trade paper referred to in the libel, in its issue of March 21, 1896, contained a paragraph to the effect that the machines had given every satisfaction, and there was another paragraph in its issue of May 2 referring to the fact of the discontinuance of the four of the machines in consequence of the transformation of the Evening Sun office into a "machine" room. That paragraph was the only foundation for this libel, which counsel characterized as a shabby subterranean way of communicating with the Press in order to injure a rival in trade. The libel was also sent to the editor of the Printer's Register, but both he and the editor of the St. James's Gazette behaved as gentlemen should behave, and did not insert the objectionable notice, but made inquiries on the matter from the British Empire Company. The plaintiffs then communicated with the defendants, and asked for an undertaking to withdraw the paragraph, and send a copy of such withdrawal to all persons to whom they had sent it. The reply received from the defendants was an assertion that the statements contained in the paragraph were true, and a refusal to withdraw anything that was stated in it. The defendants having taken up that position, the plaintiffs' only course was to take these proceedings.

Mr. Ernest Gunn, the former business manager of the St. James's Gazette, deposed to having received two copies of the paragraph in question, one addressed to the St. James's Gazette and one to St. James's Budget, and the editor of the Printer's Register said he had received the same paragraph, but it was not necessarily for publication.

Evidence taken on commission in America was read by SIR ROBERT REID. It was to the effect that the machines at the Evening Sun office were discontinued in consequence of the tax imposed on them owing to the transformation of the office into a machine room, under the rules of the trade union. The machines themselves had worked satisfactorily. The plaintiffs were unable to say what damage they had suffered by the paragraph complained of.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE submitted there was no case to go to the jury. The paragraph was not a libel at all, because it was not defamatory; if, however, it was a trade libel, no evidence had been given of special damage, of which proof was necessary. He cited "White v. Mellin" (Ap. Cas. [1895], 154). If a trader disparaged another trader's goods, the latter could not recover for libel, unless he showed special damage. The learned counsel also referred to "Western Counties Manure Company v. Lawes Chemical Manure Company" (L.R., 9 Ex., 218); "Evans v. Harlow" (5 Q.B., 624); and "South Hetton Coal Company v. North-Eastern News Association" (1894) 1 Q.B., 133).

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Although I think that the mere vaunting of a man's goods, even if it implies disparagement of another man's, ought not to be actionable, yet I agree with Lord Herschell's opinion in "White v. Mellin" ([1895] A.C., 164) that where a person intending to injure another, and not in the exercise of his own trade and vaunting his own goods, has maliciously and falsely disparaged the goods of another, an action ought to lie. What I propose to do is, subject to what Sir Robert Reid may have to say, to ask the jury what this publication in effect is, and then I shall ask them, if necessary, to assess the damages.

SIR ROBERT REID argued that all the cases his friend had referred to had been decided on their merits. In "White v. Mellin" the words were not a libel at all, and there was only inferential disparagement of another trader's goods. Lord Herschell's judgment only referred to the classes of cases in which the excellence of one man's goods were vaunted to the disparagement of another's. If this case was a libel, there was no necessity for proving special damage. Counsel cited "Ratcliffe v. Evans" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 524).

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—I think the case must go to the jury. I do not think we quite know where we are till the jury have determined the nature of the libel.

SIR E. CLARKE pointed out that in "Ratcliffe v. Evans" general damage had been actually proved. He pointed out that it was for the Judge to rule whether the words were capable of a defamatory meaning.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Yes, I rule that they are capable of a defamatory meaning.

SIR ROBERT REID then addressed the jury. He said that it was only by the honourable conduct of the newspapers to which the paragraph had been sent that the libel was not published to the world, and so damage had been arrested. The defendants had stated that the paragraph complained of, whatever meaning it might be held to bear, was true. The libel conveyed an imputation on the plaintiffs in their business as vendors of a worthless machine. Was this libel merely a notice of the five particular machines, or was it in effect and substance an imputation on the business of the plaintiffs as carried on? If it merely referred to the five machines, the plaintiffs could not succeed, because damage had been arrested owing, as he had said before, to the honourable conduct of the newspapers in not publishing it. It was said that that circumstance entitled the defendants to judgment. There was another reason for being unable to prove damage, and that was that it was impossible to show how far this underhand back-biting process had gone. The question of special damage did not arise except where the words complained of were not in themselves a libel. What would a person of ordinary business intelligence understand by reading this paragraph? Counsel contended that the only meaning it could bear was that the plaintiffs were selling worthless articles, and therefore it was a libel on the plaintiffs in the conduct of their business. He asked the jury to measure their damages by the consideration of what ought to be given to mark their sense of disapproval of the conduct of the defendant company.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE said that the question to be asked of the jury was whether the notice in question was defamatory of the plaintiffs in the conduct of their business. There were two companies, who were plaintiffs, and there had been no reference whatever made to the English company, and he submitted that there was no evidence as to their having been affected in any way. The paragraph was obviously sent out as a trade advertisement, and dealt with a rival machine in words which the defendants believed to be absolutely true. The plaintiffs were trying to get a verdict and damages for libel, confessing that no damage had ever been sustained by them. The jury were asked to give a substantial sum to show their sense of disapproval of the defendants' conduct, but he thought that was an unreasonable request. The machines in question were offered as a gift to the Evening Sun newspaper for the purposes of making a trial of them. They were to serve as an advertisement for the plaintiffs. After the machines had been put there about ten days the paragraph referred to appeared in the American trade paper. The work of the machines was stopped, and the representatives of the Empire Company were informed that the machines could not be worked unless some arrangements could be come to with the trade union. This coming to the knowledge of the Linotype Company, the paragraph now complained of was sent to the St. James's Gazette. Everything in the paragraph was absolutely true. The defendants were quite entitled to say what they did. It was suggested that there was a defamatory imputation on the Empire Company. It was not defamatory to the company apart from their goods, nor depreciatory of the goods themselves.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in the course of summing up, told the jury that all he had to decide was whether the words were capable of a defamatory meaning, and he had done so in this case, and it was for the jury to say whether in fact this was a libel. After dealing with the facts, his Lordship pointed out that the paragraph which appeared in the American trade paper on May 2 conveyed distinctly the cause of the discontinuance of the machines. The defendants had not suggested that they had any other or different information from what were now proved to be the facts. In that state of things the defendants did what he was sure the jury would think respectable and honourable men ought not to have done. Rivalry in trade was a good thing, but what the defendants in this case did he declined to think could have been sanctioned by any honourable men connected with the Linotype Company. They published this paragraph to the editors of two journals, who took a very proper view of the matter, and the paragraph did not appear in their journals. His Lordship read the paragraph and told the jury they would have to say what the language meant and would convey to the mind of an ordinary intelligent person. Would any one gather from that paragraph that the Evening Sun had no reason to complain of the machines, and that certain other circumstances had arisen which compelled their discontinuance. If the jury found the paragraph to be true in substance and in fact there would be an end of the case. Did the writer mean to convey that the company who were making these machines were making worthless machines, or, in other words, was it a libel on them in the conduct of their business? Or was it merely an imputation that these particular five machines were useless? As to damages the matter was reduced to a small compass. There was no evidence to go upon, as there was no publication to the world. In the case of libel there was no measure that could be called a legal measure at all, but the jury had to consider the conduct of the parties, to which the learned Judge directed the jury's attention in the case. His Lordship left the following questions to the jury:—(1) What was the meaning of the publication? (2) Was it merely a disparagement of the particular machines or was it defamatory of the plaintiffs in the conduct of their business in selling knowingly or unknowingly worthless machines? (3) Did the defendants publish the alleged defamatory matter maliciously intending to attack the plaintiffs in the conduct of their business? (4) What damages, if any?

The jury answered:—(1) The publication was a libel. (2) It was directed against the business of the company as vendors of these machines generally. (3) Yes. (4) £500 damages.

At the desire of SIR E. CLARKE, his LORDSHIP put an additional question to the jury. Did they think the libel meant to impute that the plaintiffs were knowingly selling useless machines?

The jury answered this question in the affirmative, and on these findings the learned JUDGE gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £500.

Trust—Trustee—Duties and liabilities—Law of Scotland—Unauthorized investment.

This was an appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland inviting questions of the rights and liabilities of judicial factors. The decision of their Lordships is of interest and value to practitioners and others in England also, as the Judicial Trustees Act, 1836, is to a large extent an attempt to introduce the Scottish system into this country. By the English Act a judicial trustee may receive remuneration for his services, as do judicial factors in Scotland, and provision is made for the audit of accounts similar to that which exists in Scotland. In Scotland audit is made by the accountant of Court, and a judicial factor has to close his account once in every year. Act of Sederunt, 1730, and section 4 of the Judicial Factors Act, 1849. By the Judicial Trustees Rules, 1897, v. 14 (1), the Court fixes the time at which accounts are to be made up, and "the officer of the Court" who is to audit them is one of the Masters of the Chancery Division (Wheeler's Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, pp. 94, 107). One of the questions in the present appeal was whether any further responsibility was placed on the accountant of Court. The appellant, a chartered accountant of Glasgow, was, in January, 1885, appointed factor loco tutoris to the respondent Jessie Annan. In the following February he lent £1,750 in his name as [such factor to the Greenock Harbour Trust upon a bond, and the loan was duly entered with the accountant of Court. Shortly before Whit Sunday, 1887, the Harbour Trust was found to be insolvent, and the usual half-yearly interest was not paid. Under the Greenock Harbour Act, 1888, the appellant was obliged to accept certain debenture stock in place of the bond, the value of which is considerably less than the amount originally invested. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Kyllachy), whose interlocutors were affirmed by the First Division—Lord Adam, Lord Kinnear, and the Lord President—held that the loss must fall upon the appellant. The Lord Ordinary was not prepared to hold that the security was not of the class authorized by the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, but thought that it was insufficient. By that Act trust moneys may be lent on real or heritable security; debentures or mortgages of railway companies and bonds, debentures, or mortgages secured on rates or taxes levied by municipal corporations. The First Division held both that the bond was not of the class authorized by the statute and that the security was insufficient. They further held that the accountant's audit was not equivalent to a discharge.

Mr. Balfour, Q.C. (of the Scottish Bar), and Mr. Haldane, Q.C., were for the appellant; the Lord Advocate (Mr. Graham Murray, Q.C.), Mr. Shaw, Q.C., and Mr. Orr Deasail (of the Scottish Bar), for the respondents, were not heard.

LORD HERSCHELL, in moving the dismissal of the appeal, expressed his concurrence with the Court below in the opinion that this bond was not "real or heritable security in Great Britain" within the meaning of section 3 of the Act of 1884, and said that it had been so held by the Judges of the Court of Sessions as far back as 1880 with respect to these very bonds. The only security assigned were the dues and rates of the Harbour Trust, and the only power possessed by the bondholder, in case the interest was not paid, was to obtain the appointment of a factor to receive the dues and rates. Further, this was not a loan secured "on bonds, debentures, or mortgages secured on rates or taxes levied . . . by a municipal corporation." The payments made by ships for the use of the docks were for services rendered and accommodation provided, and the Harbour Trustees were not a "municipal corporation." Some of them happened to be members of the corporation; but the Trust included persons who were not. In his view, therefore, the investment was one of a class for which there was no statutory authority. Then remained the question—apart from that of the class of investment—whether the actual circumstances were such as to justify the loan of trust money to the Greenock Harbour Trust. In his opinion, they were not. The margin was exceedingly small and the revenue of the Trust for some years had been steadily declining. There was, besides, a heavy expenditure in contemplation, and this, and other circumstances gave to the investment a speculative character which made it improper for a judicial factor. He arrived at this decision with some regret as he was sure the appellant had no motive to serve except the interests of his ward.

LORD WATSON said that he was quite satisfied that the factor loco tutoris had acted in perfect good faith, but it would not be consistent with his judicial duty to accept that fact as any justification for the security in which the appellant had invested the funds. He did not think that, either under the Pupils' Protection Act or under any other statute or at common law, the accountant of the Court had any power to approve an improper investment. In his opinion the investment was not in any sense on land or a heritable security and that it belonged to a class which was not authorized. But it was also clear that its safety depended upon the success of an adventure which was a perfectly legitimate field for the ordinary investor, but not for either a tutor or factor loco tutoris.

LORD SHAND said that he had no doubt that the appellant had acted with good intentions, and he had given his evidence with great candour. This investment, it appeared, was very popular at Greenock itself, and even throughout Scotland. But the popularity of a security did not exonerate a judicial factor from the duty of prudent inquiry and cautious action.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD concurred, and the appeal was dismissed with costs.

ANDERSEN V. CRUNDALL AND CO.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Damage to cargo—Liability for—Cargo, when at ship's risk.

This was an action brought to recover a balance of freight and dock dues due in respect of a cargo of timber carried by a vessel called the D. H. Morris from Pensacola to London. The claim was admitted, subject to a counterclaim for damage to the cargo. The plaintiff was the owner of the D. H. Morris. The defendants were the receivers of the cargo in question and the holders of the bill of lading given in respect of it. By a charterparty dated March 2, 1897, and made between the plaintiff and certain merchants, it was provided "that the D. H. Morris should proceed to Pensacola and there load a full and complete cargo of pitch pine timber; that the cargo should be delivered alongside the vessel at her ordered loading berth at shipper's risk and expense; that the cargo on delivery alongside should be received by the master and be secured by vessel's tackle and should be at vessel's risk, the dogs and chains on said cargo being also at vessel's risk; the ship to be responsible for any cargo lost from alongside through negligence and for salvage expenses on same." It also provided "that the shipper should for the sum of two dollars per load appoint and pay any stevedores to load the cargo, supply dogs and chains, and pay certain other charges; and that the master should sign shipper's bills of lading as presented." The vessel duly arrived at Pensacola and loaded her cargo. The logs were bound into rafts by dogs and chains and were then taken alongside the ship and loaded on board. A bill of lading for the cargo was signed by the master, and described the cargo as having been "shipped in good order and well conditioned on board the vessel," and provided that "freight and all other conditions should be as per charterparty." The vessel arrived in London and was ordered to the Surrey Commercial Docks, where the cargo was discharged by stevedores employed by the ship. The defendant's case was that a number of the logs had been injured by the use of dogs, either in discharging or in loading, and that in either case the plaintiff was responsible. The plaintiff's case was that the damage was not done in discharging and must have been done in loading, that the stevedore at the port of loading was the servant of the charterer, and that the shipowner was not responsible for damage done by him. He admitted that if the damage was done in discharging he was responsible.

Mr. Loebnis appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck for the defendants. A number of witnesses were called on each side.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that the defendants were entitled to succeed. The meaning of the charterparty was that the cargo was to be brought alongside the ship in the water and was then to be received by the ship, and that from that time forward the cargo was to be at the ship's risk, and that if anything happened to hurt the cargo from that time forward for which the ship could be to blame the ship must take the blame. The ship had to take the cargo on board and stow it, and, although by the terms of the charterparty the shipper was deputed to appoint and pay the stevedore, the work which the stevedore had to do was still the ship's work, and the ship remained liable for its proper performance, the cargo being at the ship's risk. The clause in question did nothing more than provide that the shipper should for a certain payment discharge certain duties which would otherwise fall on the ship; it did not take away from the ship any liabilities imposed by the other terms of the charterparty. Even if that view of the charterparty were unsound, the terms of the bill of lading threw upon the plaintiff the onus of proving that the damage complained of was done during the loading. So far was the plaintiff from having discharged that onus that he (the learned Judge) was inclined to think, upon the evidence, that the damage was done during the discharge. His judgment must be for the defendants.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,¹ 1898.

DOWLER V. KEELING.*

Patent—Validity—Specification—Insufficient description—Invention relating to improvements in hollow rivets and studs, and in the process of riveting.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Henry Dowler, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Kekewich, dated December 1 last, dismissing the plaintiff's action. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that he was the patentee and registered legal owner of letters patent No. 5,312 of the year 1892 granted for an invention of "Improvements in hollow rivets and studs and in the process of riveting, which improvements are applicable to braces, straps, box buckles, brace fittings, and other light articles," and that the defendant, Mr. Samuel Henry Keeling (who trades as H. Hipkiss and Co.), had infringed such letters patent. The plaintiff accordingly claimed an injunction to restrain the infringement and the usual consequential relief. By his statement of defence the defendant denied the infringement. He alleged that the plaintiff's alleged invention was not new; that the plaintiff was not the first and true inventor thereof; that it was not useful nor the proper subject-matter of letters patent; and, further, that the plaintiff did not sufficiently distinguish and point out in his specification which of the matters and things therein mentioned he claimed to have invented and which he did not claim to have invented or admitted to be old.

Mr. Thomas Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Arthur J. Walter were for the appellant; Mr. Lewis Edmunds, Q.C., and Mr. N. Micklem were for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments, lasting no less than six days or parts of days, their Lordships, on the 17th ult., reserved judgment, which was delivered dismissing the appeal, with costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read a judgment as follows:—In this case the plaintiff's invention relates to improvements in hollow rivets and studs and in the process of riveting. There are four claims in the specification, but three only have to be considered. Rivets and studs are both referred to, and the patent covers both. But the invention relates to hollow rivets and hollow studs only, and to such as are used for braces, straps, box buckles, brace fittings, and other light articles. Further, I cannot gather from the specification that the invention relates to studs which are not to be more or less riveted by pressure on the closed neck. The improved rivet or stud may be described as a hollow bottle-shaped thing, made of some compressible metal, closed at its top and having a flange at the bottom which may be either open or closed by a cap. The important features of this rivet or stud are—first, its neck or upper part, which is a cylindrical tube closed at the top but open below when it widens out into the shoulder; secondly, the shoulder connecting the neck with the lower part; thirdly, the lower part which widens out a little from the shoulder downwards until the flange is reached; fourthly, the flange at the bottom. One very important question is whether the patentee has in his first claim claimed this stud or rivet as a separate thing, or whether he has claimed it only in combination with a disc or plate, also described in the specification, and with which it is clearly intended to be used. Before deciding this question it is necessary to understand what this disc or plate is and how it and the stud or rivet are used. Two primary forms of disc or plate are described. The first is shown in figures 2 and 6. In this form the disc or plate is a circular piece of metal with a hole and short tube in the middle through which the neck of the rivet or stud is to be passed. In figure 2 this tube is expanded at the bottom; in figure 6 it is not. Both varieties of this form of disc or plate may be conveniently called washers, the projecting tube being their essential feature. The other primary form of disc or plate is a comparatively thick plate with a hole through which the neck of the rivet or stud is passed, but without any projecting tube at all. This form of disc or plate may be used either with an eyelet in the hole as shown in figures 15, 16, and 17, or without, as shown in figure 24. This form is referred to in the specification. Whichever of these forms of disc or plate is used, it is placed over the neck of the rivet or stud, so that the neck projects through the disc or plate. The closed top of the neck is then punched down and becomes "upset"—i.e., flattened and broadened by the blow. The punch at the same time forces the disc or plate on to, and in the first form into, the shoulder of the rivet or stud; and the disc or plate can be forced down tight on to any material between it and the bottom flange of the stud or rivet. The rivet or stud is usually passed through the material to be held by it until such material touches the flange at the bottom. But in figures 20, 21, and 22 the patentee shows another mode of using the rivet or stud. He, in fact, turns it upside down and passes the neck only through the material to which his rivet or stud has to be fastened. The flange which I have spoken of as at the bottom thus becomes the top, it is like a button, and is fastened to the material to which it is applied by the pressure of the shoulder of the stud and the washer, which is pressed down by the upset head of the neck as before described. Such is, in my opinion, the short effect of what the plaintiff has described as his invention so far as figures 1-24 are concerned. The invention is so described in the body of the specification as to leave it quite open to the patentee to frame his claim in more ways than one. He might frame his claim so as to confine it to a combination of his rivet or stud with his discs or plates, or so as to cover that combination, but also to cover the rivet or stud as a distinct thing and independently of the particular combinations. He might also have claimed his tubed washers shown in figures 2 and 6 in a similar way. I will now turn to claim one, and see what the plaintiff has claimed. In the first part he appears to me to claim the rivet or stud shown in figure 1, and in the second part to claim it in combination with his discs or plates, or, to follow his own language more closely, to claim them in combination with it. I cannot, however, read claim one as a claim for a combination only. Nor, apart from the plaintiff's own evidence to which I will allude presently, does the specification indicate that a combination only was what he was aiming to describe as his invention. The pains he takes to describe his rivet or stud shows that he thought that he had invented a new thing. His peculiar form of tube washer described in figures 2 and 6 may be replaced by a thick plate having no peculiarity, and the patentee so worded his claim as to protect his rivet or stud whether used with his peculiar washer or not. No doubt now that it is seen to be desirable to fall back on the combination alone, the plaintiff's counsel strenuously contend that the claim is for a combination alone. But if the rivet or stud shown in figure 1 had been new and original, as the plaintiff thought it was, the claim could not, in my opinion, have been construed so as to claim it only in combination with the discs or plates described by the patentee. The claim is to the rivet or stud as a "subordinate part or integer," to use Lord Cairns's expression in "Clark v. Adie" (2 A.C., 320), and see "Cropper v. Smith" (28 Ch.D., 143). The case of the "British Dynamite Company v. Keebs" (13 R.P.C., 190), relied upon by the plaintiff, has little if any bearing on the present case. The real claim there was for dynamite, and the so-called second claim was only an unskilful description of the mode of firing it. To treat this specification as a claim to what is shown in figure 1, and what follows as the mode of using it, would not assist the plaintiff. The plaintiff in his evidence said that the rivet or stud described in figure 1 was new and original, the closed top without the shoulder was old, and the shoulder with an open top was old, but the combination of the two was new, and this combination was his invention which he wanted to protect. He did not know that the experiment had ever been made before. It is impossible to disregard this evidence, and it shows beyond all doubt that I am doing the plaintiff no injustice in construing his claim according to its ordinary grammatical meaning. The consequence is most unfortunate for him. The experiment is the exact thing described in figure 1, and although it was used by Player for a button as distinguished from a rivet, it is as a separate thing distinguishable from the plaintiff's rivet or stud shown in figure 1. Moreover, the defendant's studs were in all respects like the plaintiff's, except that their ends were open and not closed. The closing of the top can hardly be regarded as important if the rivet or stud is claimed as a separate thing. Great stress was laid on what is called the telescopic action of the plaintiff's rivet or stud—i.e., the sinking of the neck into the lower part when the top is punched down. This is a mere incident of its shape. The patent is for the thing described, not for its telescopic action. Moreover, even if it were, the experiment made by the defendant in Court with blotting paper and an old open-ended stud such as the defendant used before the plaintiff's patent showed the same sort of collapsing or telescoping as is relied upon by the plaintiff. The controversy about the telescopic action is to my mind wholly immaterial. The conclusion at which I have arrived makes it unnecessary to refer to claims 2 and 3, which were said to have been anticipated by Boulton and by Dowler's earlier specification of 1878. I say nothing about the effect of the defendant having made studs like figure 1 in the course of making his open-ended studs before the date of the plaintiff's patent. The question thus raised is one of considerable difficulty, but it is unnecessary to decide it. For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the plaintiff's patent as it stands covers too much and must be held invalid until amended. If judiciously amended it may be good. But in my opinion the patent is bad as it stands, and the appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read a judgment to the like effect.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred in the reasons given by the other members of the Court for their decision, but expressed himself by no means satisfied that any amendment or any disclaimer, however judicious, would enable the plaintiff so to amend his specification as that it would be sufficient, either in point of novelty or subject-matter, to support the patent.

THE HOLLINSIDE.*

Ship—Charterparty—Construction—Discharge of cargo—Quantity discharged—Discharge by consignee at ship's expense—Deduction from freight.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the County Court held at Newcastle. It appears that the respondents were the owners of the steamship Hollinside, and claimed to recover 18s. 10d. balance of freight on a cargo of coals. The appellants, who were the consignees, counterclaimed the cargo for the same amount. The coal was shipped under a charterparty which provided that the coal should be delivered "on being paid freight at the rate of 9s. per ton of 20cwt. or 1,015 kilos delivered, or on bill of lading quantity less 2 per cent., at receiver's option, to be declared in writing before bulk is broken." The charterparty also provided, "Consignee to effect the discharge of the cargo, steamer paying 1f. per ton of 20cwt. or 1,015 kilos." The bill of lading showed 1,184 tons of coal shipped on board at Sunderland. On arrival of the ship at Port de Bouc the appellants decided to accept the cargo at the bill of lading quantity less 2 per cent., and so save the expense and delay of having the cargo weighed. They, however, deducted from the freight £46 19s. 8d. for the steamer's portion of the costs of discharging the cargo, claiming to be entitled to 1*l*. for every ton of coal discharged, and that, as there had been no weighing of the coal, the bill of lading quantity—viz., 1,184 tons—was conclusive. The respondents contended that, as the appellants had decided to take the coal delivered as 1,184 tons less 2 per cent. for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of freight, they had admitted that the amount they had to discharge was the same, and were therefore only entitled to be paid 1,184*l*. less 2 per cent.—viz., £46 0*s*. 10*d*.—as the steamer's share of the discharging expenses.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. Laing for the appellants; Mr. H. Boyd, Q.C., and Mr. D. Stephens for the respondents.

The appeal was dismissed with costs.

The PRESIDENT said that it was obvious you must look to the whole of the charterparty, and when you did so you must come to the conclusion that, if the appellants had chosen to accept the bill of lading quantity less 2 per cent. as the quantity delivered, they were only entitled to be paid by the steamer for discharging the like amount.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES said he thought the charterparty should be read as a whole in a business-like way. The charterparty gave two methods of determining the quantity of coal delivered—the actual quantity delivered, or the bill of lading quantity less 2 per cent. For the purpose of determining the amount of freight the consignees had adopted the latter method. In his opinion the consignees could, therefore, not claim to be paid for having discharged a greater amount than they had admitted to have had delivered by the ship.

IN RE DRIFFIELD GAS LIGHT COMPANY.*

Company—Winding up—Distribution of surplus assets—Fully-paid and partly-paid up shares.

The Driffield Gas Light Company was constituted in 1835 under a deed of settlement and was registered under some or one of the old Joint Stock Companies Acts, and also under Part VII. of the Companies Act, 1862, as a company without limitation of liability. The deed of settlement provided (clause 1) "that the sums set opposite to the names of the parties hereto shall form the capital or joint stock of the company and that the aggregate amount thereof shall be £1,800" (with a provision for increase by issue of further shares); (clause 19) that losses should be made good by the proprietors "in proportion to their respective shares"; (clause 20) that profits should be divided amongst the proprietors "according to the amount of their respective shares"; and (clause 32) that upon a winding-up the residue after payment of debts should be "divided between the several proprietors for the time being in proportion to their respective shares in the said undertaking." The capital was divided into shares of £10 each. Before the date of the winding-up the original capital had been increased, by the issue of new shares, to 1,200 shares of £10 each. Six hundred of them (including the original shares) were issued before 1893, and were fully paid up at or soon after the times of issue. The other 600 were created in 1893, with only £5 10*s*. paid up. The deeds creating some of the issues of shares subsequent to the original issue recited resolutions of the company authorizing their creation on the terms that the holders of the new shares should be entitled to dividends on the amount from time to time called up thereon; but the deeds themselves provided that the new shares were to be in all respects subject to the provisions of the original deed. The undertaking of the company was sold in 1897 to a local authority, and the company was being wound up under a resolution of the shareholders. All the debts and costs of liquidation had been paid, and there remained a large surplus for distribution, the question being on what principle it should be distributed as between the holders of the fully-paid shares and the holders of partly-paid shares.

Mr. George R. Northcote was for the liquidator; and Mr. O. Leigh-Clare, Mr. Brinton, Mr. Hurrell, and Mr. Dunham were for the different classes of shareholders.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered judgment, in which, after stating the facts and the question to be decided, he proceeded as follows:—In the case of the "Anglesea Colliery Company" [(1866] L.R., 2 Eq.; 1 Ch., 555) it was held that apart from the Companies Acts it is the clear right of a partner, when the partnership is wound up and the debts are paid, to have contribution in order to repay to him capital which has been advanced in excess of his proportion, and that the Companies Acts must be construed in accordance with this principle, so that a holder of fully-paid shares is to be regarded as a "contributory" entitled to have a call made on the partly-paid shares in order to equalize the capital account. In "In re Scinde, &c., Corporation" [(1867] L.R., 6 Ch., 53*n*) and "Ex parte Maude" [(1870] L.R., 6 Ch., 51) it was established that in a winding-up order under the Companies Acts where after payment of debts and costs a balance remains, but insufficient for a complete return of capital paid up, the capital account must be equalized by a call on the partly-paid shares, and the assets must then, in the absence of any different provision, be distributed according to the nominal amount of the shares; and it was held that an express provision for the payment of dividends according to the amounts paid up on the shares did not prevent this rule from being applicable in the partial return of capital in a winding-up. It was also decided that the holder of the fully-paid shares is not in the position of a shareholder who has paid calls in advance unless he has paid up on shares which have not been issued as fully paid, or fully called up. In "Oakbank Oil Company v. Crum" [(1882] 8 App. Cas., 65) where the company's articles of association provided that the shareholders should be entitled to dividend "in proportion to their shares," it was held that it was not competent to the company to declare a dividend in proportion to the amounts paid up on different classes of shares, and the practice of five years was disregarded. Lastly, in "Birch v. Cropper" [(1889] 14 App. Cas., 525) after payment of debts and costs of winding-up there was a balance more than sufficient to return all the capital paid up. The articles of association provided for payment of dividends in proportion to amounts paid up, but made no provision for distribution of surplus in a winding-up. The Court of Appeal held that the surplus should be distributed on the same principle as the dividends, but it was decided by the House of Lords that the article which governed dividends did not govern the distribution of the surplus, and that after equalization of the capital account the assets must be distributed according to the nominal amount of the shares. The effect of these decisions seems to be as follows:—The winding-up sections (section 109 and section 133) of the Companies Act, 1862, do not of themselves supply any rule for the mode of adjusting loss of capital or of distributing surplus, but only supply the necessary powers for giving effect to the rights and interests of the parties. Those rights in the case of a company constituted under the Companies Acts must, in the absence of any provision in the memorandum or articles of association, be ascertained, in the view of one of the noble and learned lords who took part in the decision of "Birch v. Cropper" (14 Ap. Cas., 525), by recourse to general principles of equity; in the view of another of them, by reference to the principles and provisions of the Companies Acts. But in either view the result is the same—namely, that the capital account must first be equalized, and then there remains no ground for appropriating the balance in any other way than according to the nominal amount of the shares in the capital; and a provision in the memorandum or articles of association regulating the distribution of dividends will not of itself govern the distribution of surplus in a winding-up. In the case of a company not constituted under the Companies Acts it would seem to follow that reference must be made to the deed or instrument under which it is constituted, and if that deed or instrument contains any provision with regard to surplus effect must be given to it, but a provision regulating the distribution of dividends ought not to be considered as of itself governing the distribution of surplus. If the capital of the company is limited by shares of equal or commensurable amount the same consequence ought to follow as if it were so limited under the Companies Acts, the holder of each share becoming, in the words of Lord Macnaghten in "Birch v. Cropper," "entitled to a proportionate part in the capital of the company, and, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, entitled as a necessary consequence to the same proportionate part in all the property of the company, including its uncalled capital." In opposition to this conclusion reliance is placed on two decisions, which happen to be the only reported decisions with reference to the distribution of surplus in the case of companies not constituted under the Companies Acts. The first is "Somes v. Currie" ([1855] 1 Kay and J., 605; 1 Jur., N.S., 954). There the charter of the company provided that "every person holding any share in the capital stock in the said company shall be entitled to the profits and advantages attending the said capital stock in proportion to the number of shares so held by him." Yet it was held by Vice-Chancellor Page Wood that upon the dissolution of the company the surplus must be distributed in proportion to the amounts paid up on the different classes of shares, and this without any previous equalization of the capital account. The ground of the decision seems to have been that on the particular facts of the case, and especially the fact that dividends had during three years been distributed according to the amounts paid up, the Vice-Chancellor held that there had in effect been a contract between the shareholders that "the profits and advantages" should be so distributed. It is pointed out by the Court of Appeal in "Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Company" ([1887] 36 W.R., 1) that "Somes v. Currie" cannot be considered as suggesting any general rule, and a disapproval of it, if so considered, is plainly implied. The other case is the one just mentioned of "Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Company." There it was held, both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, that the surplus was divisible according to the amounts paid up on the different classes of shares; but that decision, again, was expressly based on its own peculiar circumstances, and it is explained in "Birch v. Cropper" as depending entirely on very special facts, and not laying down any general principle, and not being an authority except where the circumstances are precisely similar. The very fact that "Somes v. Currie" and "Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Company" have been so plainly treated as defensible only on special grounds shows that the general rule is not in accordance with them. I think, therefore, that in the present case effect must be given to the express provision of the deed of settlement in clause 32, and that after equalization of the capital account by a return of all the capital paid up the surplus remaining must, according to the language of that paragraph, be "divided between the several proprietors for the time being in proportion to their respective shares in the said undertaking"—that is, in proportion to the nominal amounts of the shares. There was a contention that persons who took shares from the company at a premium should be allowed to share in the surplus in proportion to what they paid for the shares. This is plainly untenable.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Vendor and Purchaser—Concealment by purchaser —Inducement—Relief—Deed of assignment set aside.

Plaintiff assigned to defendant for a nominal consideration his claim against an estate which subsequently paid 20s. in the £. The Court decided on the facts that he was induced to do so by the correspondence passing between the parties, and set aside the deed of assignment.

An interesting point arose in this case as to the duty of a solicitor to withhold or communicate facts within his knowledge of which the party with whom he is dealing is unaware. The case was before his Lordship on February 24, 26, and judgment was delivered to-day.

Mr. Farwell, Q.C., and Mr. Le Riche appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Whimzey for the defendant.

The plaintiff, Mr. Montague Davis, alleged that the defendant, Henry Gerard Ohrly, had offered to buy from him a debt of £300 owing from a certain Mr. Alexander Dixon Frodsham to the firm of J. Davis and Sons, of which the plaintiff was the sole surviving partner. Mr. Frodsham was adjudicated a bankrupt on August 30, 1881, his statement of affairs filed in the bankruptcy proceedings showing no assets. On July 1, 1891, he died. Towards the close of that year Mr. Ohrly, who was a brother-in-law of Mr. Frodsham, advertised for Mr. Davis, who was then resident abroad. He there invited the firm of Messrs. Davis and Sons to communicate with his (the defendant's) solicitors, Messrs. Sheffield, Son, and Powell. In consequence of this advertisement Mr. William Jeffries Cox, who held a power of attorney to act for Mr. Davis, entered into negotiations with the solicitors. It was then alleged that they had represented that there were no assets of any kind and there was absolutely no estate whatever belonging to Mr. Frodsham out of which the plaintiff's debt could be satisfied, and that the defendant merely wished to buy the debt in order to clear off the petition for the sake of the family, and that under the circumstances he was only prepared to give the nominal figure of 1s. in the pound, and that if that was not accepted the plaintiff would get nothing. On August 9, 1893, the plaintiff assigned by indenture the debt of £300 and interest thereon together with the securities which he held for it for a sum of £15, and it had now come to the knowledge of the plaintiff that the Official Receiver, who represented the late Mr. Frodsham, was at that time entitled to, and had now received, sufficient estate to pay 20s. in the pound. The plaintiff therefore claimed to have the indenture rescinded and the securities delivered up. In the course of the evidence it appeared that Mr. Cox, acting as agent of Mr. Davis, wrote to Messrs. Sheffield, Son, and Powell stating that Mr. Davis refused to consent to the acceptance of 1s. in the pound. Further correspondence took place between the parties which led Mr. Cox to say in a letter of March 14, 1892:—"No doubt what you have previously written is perfectly correct, and, therefore, I should advise Mr. Davis that £15 is better than nothing." The plaintiff was unable to say whether that statement referred to a letter received by him or on his behalf, or to the effect of conversations, but alleged that Messrs. Sheffield, Son, and Powell, by their reticence in not communicating to the plaintiff that there were assets, induced the plaintiff to sell the debt for a price which he would not have done had he known the true circumstances of the case. The defendant in his defence denied that Messrs. Sheffield, Son, and Powell had made the representations with his knowledge or privity, either express or apparent.

Mr. LEVETT, Q.C., urged that Messrs. Sheffield, Son, and Powell had acted in a perfectly proper manner. They were, he said, acting on behalf of the defendant, and were legitimately watching over the interests of their client. They did nothing to misrepresent the facts, and they were in no way bound to inform the plaintiff of the increase in value of the subject matter of the purchase. Caveat emptor was the maxim of the law.

Mr. FARWELL, Q.C., on behalf of the plaintiff, contended that since Mr. Cox had written saying that "£15 was better than nothing," it was obvious that he did not know the true facts, and that, therefore, the defendant's solicitors, who knew better, were not entitled to hold their tongues and say nothing. It was not the duty of solicitors to write letters which left false impressions.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES.—There is a case at p. 169 of Jacob's Reports, "Turner v. Harvey," which seems to me to have a very material bearing on all this.

Mr. LEVETT, Q.C.—I should submit that that case is very much in my favour. It is there said, at page 178, "The Court in many cases has been in the habit of saying that where parties deal for an estate they may put each other at arm's length; the purchaser may use his own knowledge, and is not bound to give the vendor information of the value of his property. . . . If an estate is offered for sale and I treat for it knowing that there is a mine under it, and the party makes no inquiry, I am not bound to give him any information of it; he acts for himself and exercises his own sense and knowledge. But a very little is sufficient to affect the application of that principle. If a word, if a single word, be dropped which tends to mislead the vendor that principle will not be allowed to operate." Again, "Walters v. Morgan" (3 D. F. and J., 718) is an authority for saying that, since there is no fiduciary relation between a vendor and a purchaser, the purchaser is not bound to disclose any fact exclusively within his knowledge which might be expected to influence the price of the subject to be sold. Simple reticence does not amount to legal fraud, but a word or gesture intended to induce the vendor to believe in the existence of a non-existing fact which might influence the price of the subject to be sold would be sufficient ground for a Court of equity to refuse a decree of specific performance.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES.—The question is, has there been anything done in fact to mislead.

Mr. FARWELL, Q.C.—We say that their conduct misled us. Your Lordship remembers the case of "Brownlie v. Campbell" (5 App. Cas., 954). Lord Blackburn, in delivering his judgment, there said, "I should say wherever there is a duty to speak, when you have got anything to say and you keep it back in order that the other side, believing that you, having said nothing, have nothing to say, it is very much the same as falsehood and fraud."

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in delivering judgment, after a careful review of the facts of the case, said that there had been a good deal of conflict in the evidence as to what had taken place at the interviews. He thought, however, that the parties had honestly endeavoured to speak the truth as to what had actually taken place at the conversations, which were now some years old. The position that the solicitors had taken up was that there was no antecedent obligation upon them to disclose what they had remained silent about, and they adhered to that position. With regard to the defendant himself, however, it appeared that in an action of "Steane and Another v. Ohlry" he had written a letter saying that the deceased had left no estate. That letter, however, did not appear to have been shown to Messrs. Sheffield, Son, and Powell, but if it had it would have ended the matter. The issue was of importance to the solicitors as the Court had to decide whether the position they had taken up was in fact maintained, or whether they had overstepped the line. The proposition of law which formed the basis of this case was to be found in "Derry v. Peek" (14 App. Cas., 337), and was elucidated by "Redgrave v. Hurd" (20 Ch. D., 13), "Turner v. Harvey" (Jacob's Reports, 169), and "Coaks v. Boswell" (11 App. Cas., 232), left no doubt as to what the law on the subject was. He had come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's contention was right, that it was the letters that had induced him to act as he had, and sell his debt, being under the impression that there was nothing more to be got out of the estate, and the deed of assignment would, therefore, be set aside.

IN THE MATTER OF AN ELECTION OF COUNTY COUNCILLORS FOR THE CENTRAL HACKNEY DIVISION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE COUNTY OF LONDON—WESTACOTT V. STEWART.*

Election Law—County Council—Death of candidate after nomination—Mandamus to returning officer to countermand notice of the poll—Ballot Act, 1872, sec. 1.

Section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, is applicable to elections for the County Council "as far as circumstances admit."

This was an application to postpone an election in consequence of the death of a candidate, and it raised questions of law of considerable practical importance.

The application was made by Mr. Dickens, Q.C. (Mr. S. Day with him), on behalf of Mr. Thomas Bentley Westacott, who had brought an action for an injunction to restrain the returning officer from holding the election of county councillors for this division on Thursday, March 3. They also applied, in the alternative, for a mandamus to compel him to countermand the notice of poll for that day.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. H. Avory appeared for the returning officer, desiring the decision of the Court as to the course to be taken.

Mr. Westacott's affidavit stated that he was one of the candidates for election to the office of County Councillor for the Central Hackney Division of the Administrative County of London. In addition to himself there were three other candidates nominated—namely, Henry Sylvester Samuel, James Stuart, and Thomas McKinnon Wood. Such nomination took place on Wednesday, February 23, and the poll was fixed to take place on March 3. Mr. Samuel died on Saturday, February 26, 1898. Notice of the said death had been given to the returning officer, and proof thereof had been given to his satisfaction, and the certificate of death had been left with him. A demand had been made by Mr. Westacott to the said returning officer requiring him to countermand the notice of poll which had been given for March 3. He had, however, refused to do so. Mr. Westacott had issued a writ claiming an injunction. The matter came before Mr. Justice Grantham in Chambers, and he had desired that it should be brought into Court. A Divisional Court had therefore been formed and the application now mainly relied on, and ultimately held to be the right form, was for a peremptory prerogative writ of mandamus commanding the returning officer of the Administrative County of London "forthwith to countermand the notice of the poll given at the said election for March 3, 1898, and to proceed with the said election in accordance with law." The sections on which the question turned, and which afford a typical instance of the modern system of legislation by reference, are as follows. The Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 41), section 2 (1):—"The county council of a county and the members thereof shall be constituted and elected and conduct their proceedings in like manner . . . as the council of a borough divided into wards." Section 75:—"For the purpose of the provisions of this Act with respect to county councils, and to the chairmen, members, committees, and officers of such councils, and otherwise for the purpose of carrying this Act into effect, the following portions of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882—namely, part 2, part 3, &c.—shall, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this Act, apply . . . with such modifications as are necessary to make them applicable." Part 3 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 50), contains section 58, of which subsection (1) is as follows:—"If an election of councillors is contested the poll shall, as far as circumstances admit, be conducted as the poll at a contested Parliamentary election is by the Ballot Act, 1872, directed to be conducted." The Ballot Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict., c. 33, section 1):—"If after the adjournment of an election by the returning officer for the purpose of taking a poll one of the candidates nominated shall die before the poll has commenced the returning officer shall, upon being satisfied of the fact of such death, countermand notice of the poll, and all the proceedings with reference to the election shall be commenced afresh in all respects as if the writ had been received by the returning officer on the day on which proof was given to him of such death, provided that no fresh nomination shall be necessary in the case of a candidate who stood nominated at the time of the countermand of the poll."

Mr. DICKENS contended that the combined effect of these sections was that the returning officer should act as he would act in a contested Parliamentary election if one of the candidates died after nomination, for section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, was obviously incorporated in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., said he raised no objection as to the form of the application. He urged that section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, was not made applicable to a municipal election or to county council elections by the Municipal Corporations Act. The procedure of a Parliamentary election was quite different. Thus the date of an election of county councillors was fixed by the county council, while at a Parliamentary election the returning officer fixed the date. He could not fix the date even if he were to countermand the poll at the present election. There would be serious difficulties in his way. Further, would it not be necessary, if any part was postponed, to put off the whole election of County Councillors for the County of London? If not, the result might be that the voters who would vote at the election for this division would be a different body to those who would vote at it if it were not postponed. Voters who had voted in other divisions might claim to vote at this as well if it were postponed, which they could not do if the elections for the whole county took place on one day. Section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, dealt with the nomination of candidates, as the marginal note said. It was section 2 that dealt with the poll. The two matters were distinct. The provisions of the Ballot Act in this respect did not fit in with the provisions for municipal elections. The Ballot Act applied to elections for Parliament, when representatives of the two great political parties in the State would be candidates, and not to local elections, when there might be 20 candidates.

Mr. DICKENS, in reply, emphasized the words of section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, "as far as circumstances admit," and contended that that permitted the Court to modify the provisions so as to meet the case. If section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872, did not apply, there was no provision applicable to the case. As to fixing the date of the election, application could be made to the Court, under section 70 of the Municipal Corporations Act, and they had power to fix a day.

The COURT granted the mandamus to postpone the election.

Mr. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said,—"I am of opinion that the best view of this case is that section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, must be taken as incorporating the last paragraph of section 1 of the Ballot Act, 1872. It certainly relates to the taking of the poll. It was said that there was a difference between the Acts, because one applied to high politics and the other to local politics. That argument, however, had no weight with me. The argument that the provisions of the Ballot Act were not as they stood compatible with a municipal election carried more weight; but that is met by the words of section 58 of the Municipal Corporations Act making the Ballot Act applicable "as far as circumstances admit" as to the form of proceeding. The motion for a mandamus to the returning officer to countermand the poll is the proper form of motion.

Mr. JUSTICE WRIGHT concurred. The writ for an injunction was not the proper form in this case. The other candidate had no right to obtain an injunction, but the mandamus should be granted. The Court had two alternatives. The one to let the election take its course, in which case the validity of it could be questioned on petition; but that would be a very inconvenient method for all parties, and expensive; or it could grant the mandamus. He thought the mandamus should go, and be a peremptory mandamus to the returning officer.

IN RE HUMPHREYS, EX PARTE LLOYD-GEORGE AND WILLIAM GEORGE.*

Solicitor—Costs—Power of Court to charge property recovered with payment of costs—Solicitors Act, 1860, sec. 28—Criminal proceedings—Bankruptcy proceedings—Rule 125 of Bankruptcy Rules.

The power given to the Court by sec. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, to charge property recovered with the payment of costs does not apply to criminal proceedings.

Decision of Divisional Court (ante, p. 68) affirmed.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Lloyd-George and William George, a firm of solicitors, from the decision of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Kennedy) reversing an order of the County Court Judge of Carnarvonshire. The case is reported ante, p. 68. The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Mr. W. S. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. Evans appeared for the appellants; Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington appeared for the trustee.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE CHITTY read the judgment of the Court as follows:—This is an appeal from the order of the Divisional Court discharging an order dated November 10, 1896, made by the County Court of Carnarvonshire sitting in bankruptcy. The applicants are a firm of solicitors who obtained the order in the County Court. It was made on their petition for a charging order under the provisions of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860. The order declared that the sum of £813 mentioned in the petition had been recovered and preserved for the bankrupt's estate through the instrumentality of proceedings instituted by the petitioners on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy, and ordered that the costs, charges, and expenses of the petitioners of and incidental to the recovery and preservation of the £813, including the costs and expenses of the petitioners in procuring the arrest of the bankrupt and the costs and expenses of the proceedings taken before the justices preliminary to and consequent on such arrest, and of the petition and the parties properly appearing thereon, should be taxed and paid out of the £813 recovered and preserved as aforesaid. The bankrupt, a horse dealer, had absconded to Australia, taking with him the sum of £813, the proceeds of the sale of his horses, and the property of his creditors under the bankruptcy. Two criminal charges were made against him. The first was for forgery, and in this matter the appellants acted as solicitors for his father. Although they introduced charges against the trustee in their cash account for proceedings on this charge, the appellants do not now seek to have these charges paid out of the bankrupt's estate. The other criminal charge was for offences against the Debtors Act, 1869. In respect of this charge the County Court Judge, on an application made by the appellants on behalf of the trustee, whose solicitors they then were, directed the trustee to prosecute the bankrupt by order made in April, 1895. To this order section 166 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, applied, and thereupon it became the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute and carry on the prosecution. The object of the enactment appears to be to save the bankrupt's estate from the costs of the prosecution. The bankrupt was arrested in Australia on the criminal charges and brought to this country; he was afterwards discharged by the justices on the charge of forgery, and was tried and acquitted on the charge under the Debtors Act, 1869. At the time of his arrest he had on him the sum of £813, which was taken from him by the police authorities. The balance of this sum, amounting to upwards of £700, was remitted to the appellants by virtue of a power of attorney prepared by them on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy. The appellants have retained in their own hands the money thus received. They delivered to the trustee a cash account, in which they sought to deduct large sums in respect of the costs of the prosecutions and other matters, some of which it is admitted they are not entitled to claim. The account showed a balance of £323 4s., payable to the trustee. Although they had been requested to deliver a bill of costs to the trustee in September, 1896, they had not done so before the charging order was made. In fact they have not now delivered their bill of costs. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that they were entitled to retain the money on two grounds—first, by virtue of the charging order, and, secondly, by virtue of a lien they claimed as solicitors. As to the charging order, I think it ought not to have been made. Section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, is to the effect that in every case in which a solicitor is employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any Court of justice, it shall be lawful for the Court or a Judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or shall be depending to declare such solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved. "Property recovered or preserved" means property recovered or preserved in any suit, matter, or proceeding in any Court of justice. Obviously the proceeding must be in a civil Court of justice. The enactment does not extend to criminal proceedings. In a criminal proceeding, instituted as it is for the punishment of the offender, no property is recovered or preserved. The only possible exception which occurs to us is an order made after conviction by the Judge for restitution of the property to the owner under the provisions of the Acts relating to larceny and other similar offences (24 and 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 100; 35 and 36 Vict., c. 93, s. 30). If that be an exception—a point on which it is not necessary to express any opinion—the only costs for which a solicitor could obtain a charging order would be the costs of obtaining the order for restitution. In the case before us the money received by the appellants was not recovered or preserved in any civil proceeding in a Court of justice. It was received merely by virtue of the power of attorney. It was contended that it was recovered in the proceedings in the bankruptcy. The answer is, it was not. The only colour for the argument was the order directing the prosecution. This point is covered by what we have said as to criminal proceedings, coupled with the fact that the money was not recovered by virtue of that order, although the order may have led indirectly to the recovery. To these reasons against the charging order we may add the following. The jurisdiction under section 28 of the Act of 1860 is discretionary. We entirely agree with the opinion expressed by Lord Justice Bowen in "Greer v. Young" (24 Ch. D., 545, at p. 557), where he said that "the Act gives a discretionary power to the Court; the solicitor has no absolute right to the charge, but only power to ask the Court in the exercise of its discretion to make the charge." Without going so far as to say that the Bankruptcy Court ought never to make a charging order in favour of the solicitor to the trustee upon the funds which belong to the creditors, we think that the cases in which the discretionary power ought so to be exercised must be rare. In the circumstances of this case we think that the discretion was wrongly exercised. There is great force in the observations made by Mr. Justice Wright on Rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules regulating the priority of costs and charges payable out of the estate. Still there may be occasions on which it would be right to make the order, seeing that the ordinary right of the solicitor to be paid for his services out of the estate is only through the right of the trustee to obtain the costs out of the estate, a right which the trustee may have lost by reason of his being a defaulter or by his misconduct in which the solicitor is not implicated (see "Ex parte Harper," 26 Ch. D., 685). For these reasons we think that the Divisional Court were right in reversing the charging order. The point as to the solicitor's lien, apart from the Act, does not appear to have been raised in the Divisional Court. It may be disposed of in a few words. The petition was not founded on lien; it was simply for a charging order. The solicitor to the trustee, whether in bankruptcy or in the case of an ordinary trust, has no lien on the trust estate. The trust estate in bankruptcy does not belong to the trustee; in equity it is the property of the creditors. The right of the solicitor to be paid out of the bankrupt's estate is only through the right of his client, the trustee. He has no independent right (see "Ex parte Harper"). No doubt a solicitor employed by the trustee with respect to the trust estate is not uncommonly called or calls himself solicitor to the estate, but this is a misnomer. The law on this subject is well stated by Mr. Justice North in "Stanier v. Evans" (34 Ch. D., 476, 477). Unfortunately for themselves the appellants have pursued a mistaken course. It was their duty to pay the money to the trustee and to deliver a bill of costs, and to have taken steps for the taxation of the bill at the proper time. At the conclusion of the argument their counsel stated that they would now follow this course. Nothing which has fallen from us will in any manner prejudice them on the taxation. The respondent submits that on the delivery of the bill it should be taxed, and all proper costs and charges should be allowed. There is no undertaking on either side. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DUNN V. APPLETON.*

Practice—Costs—Action remitted to County Court—Costs of O. 14 application.

In remitting an action to the County Court the Master has no jurisdiction to make an order as to the costs of an unsuccessful application previously made under O. 14.

This was an appeal by the defendant from an order of Mr. Justice Day at Chambers. The case was argued some time ago, when judgment was reserved. The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Mr. C. B. Marriott appeared for the defendant; Mr. Montague Shearman appeared for the plaintiff.

The Court, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read the judgment of the Court, in which he said that the action was to recover £22 10s. alleged to be due under a contract. On November 5 an order was made under Order 14 giving the defendant leave to defend on his bringing £20 10s. into Court, which he did. On November 19 the Master made an order at the instance of the plaintiff remitting the action to the County Court, and directing that the costs of the Order 14 application should be costs in the cause in the County Court. On appeal against this latter part of the order Mr. Justice Day affirmed the Master, and the defendant now appealed to this Court. The appellant contended that, the action being one which might have been brought in the County Court, there was no jurisdiction to make the order, the conditions under which alone Order 14 costs could be recovered in such actions—viz., either under Order 14, r. 9 (a), or under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, not being performed. In their opinion the case was concluded by "Harris v. Judge" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 565), followed by "White v. Cohen" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 580), both decisions of the Court of Appeal. It was unnecessary to repeat the train of reasoning by which the Court came to the conclusion that section 116 of the Act of 1888 cut down the effect of section C5, and applied to all actions, whether remitted or not, which might have been brought in the County Court. The result of these decisions was that, in the case of a remitted action, if the plaintiff recovered more than £20 and less than £50 in contract—and the plaintiff here could not do more—he should not be entitled to more costs than he would have been entitled to if he had brought the action in the County Court, for he could not bring himself within the proviso in section 116 as to Order 14, nor could he get the benefit of a certificate or order in Chambers under the same section. "The clause in section 116 relating to the certificate or order allowing costs," said Lord Justice Lindley in delivering the judgment of the Court in "White v. Cohen," "can only come into operation where the action is tried in the High Court." Therefore, even if the order in question could be construed as such an order allowing costs, it could not help the plaintiff. Neither did he come within the proviso in the section as to Order 14, for he did not get judgment under that order. Neither was it an order made at the hearing under Order 14, r. 9 (a), even if such an order could have been made at the hearing, purporting as it did to make Order 14 costs costs in a County Court action. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

REG. V. COCKSHOTT AND OTHERS, JUSTICES—EX PARTE RICKERBY.*

Criminal Law—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, sec. 17 (1) and (2)—Election to be tried by jury. Conviction under Betting Act, 1853, quashed on ground that the justices had not, before going into the charge, informed defendant that, if he desired it, he had a right to be tried by a jury

Mr. Danckwerts in this case showed cause against a rule nisi obtained to quash a conviction under the Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Viet., c. 119), section 3, by the justices of the borough of Stockport. Mr. J. R. Randolph appeared in support of the rule.

The short facts were that on November 6, 1897, Joshua Rickerby, a hairdresser, was convicted of being a person using a certain office at 7, Market-passage, Southport, for the purpose of betting on horse races with persons resorting there. It did not appear that the justices, before going into the charge, informed Rickerby that he had a right to be tried by a jury. It did not so appear in the conviction, and was not so in fact. On November 6 the town clerk, as the case was about to begin, stood up to read out the statutory notice that the defendant might elect to be tried by a jury, but, seeing that a consultation was going on as to whether the defendant should plead guilty, he desisted, and the case was continued without the notice being read at all. After some evidence had been given on oath the defendant, by the advice of his solicitors, pleaded guilty. The justices fined him £50. Affidavits were now put in on behalf of Mr. Rickerby to the effect that he would have elected to have been tried by a jury if he had known that he had the right to do so. His solicitors also swore that they did not know that he had that right. The rule was granted on these facts.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. DANCKWERTS submitted that there was no reason for disturbing the conviction. The defendant had pleaded guilty. The statement as to his right to trial by jury had not to be read to him till he had pleaded not guilty. Here it was seen at once that he would plead guilty. Moreover, a man could waive any such objection. "Turner v. Postmaster-General" (5 Best and Smith, 756).

MR. RANDOLPH contended that the conviction was invalid because the statutory caution had not been given. Without that the Court had not jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

The COURT made the rule absolute.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the case was important. The defendant was brought up before the justices on a charge under the Betting Act, a conviction for which might render him liable to imprisonment for six months with hard labour. The offence therefore was brought within section 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vic., c. 49), as being an offence "in respect of the commission of which an offender is liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months, and which is not an assault." That section provided that a person "may on appearing before the Court and before the charge is gone into, but not afterwards, claim to be tried by a jury," and thereupon the Court shall deal with it as if it were an indictable offence. The second subsection provided, "A Court of summary jurisdiction, before the charge is gone into in respect of an offence to which this section applies, for the purpose of informing the defendant of his right to be tried by a jury in pursuance of this section, shall address him to the following effect:—'You are charged with an offence in respect of the commission of which you are entitled, if you desire it, to be tried by a jury. Do you desire to be tried by a jury?' " In the present case the defendant came into Court, and the proceedings were about to begin when it appeared that the defendant intended very shortly to plead guilty. For certain reasons he did not desire to plead guilty at once. He therefore pleaded not guilty, and when the facts that were wanted by him had come out he withdrew his plea. The town clerk had known his duty and was prepared to read out the statutory caution, but seeing that the matter was about to be arranged he desisted. The first point raised was that the conviction must state the fact of the caution having been given; but that was not persisted in, and was a bad point, section 27 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act only applying to indictable offences tried summarily. It was then pointed out that the person charged must make his election "before the charge is gone into, but not afterwards." This power of selecting a tribunal was of no use to him unless he knew that he had it. That showed that it was necessary that the information should be given to him before the one opportunity on which he could make use of it had passed away. The Court had no right to fritter away the protection given to prisoners. The option was to be put to each prisoner before he was asked whether he pleaded guilty. There could be no waiver of a right by a person entirely ignorant that he possessed such a right. The affidavits were to the effect that neither the defendant nor his solicitors knew of the right to trial by jury. Moreover, it was not at all clear that there could be a waiver, even if they had known.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. To accept the contention that the caution should be given after the plea had been taken would do away with the protection given by section 17 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. The exact time when the claim to have his trial by jury should be made by a prisoner was noteworthy. It was on appearing before the Court and before the charge is gone into. The knowledge of his right might make all the difference in a plea by a prisoner. It must not be assumed in the case as a presumption of law that the prisoner or even the solicitors for him knew the law, for the statute made in effect an exception to the presumption by providing in terms that the information must be supplied. The conviction must be quashed.

JONES V. WALTERS.*

Local Government—Bye-law—Validity—Prohibition against frequenting and using "any street or place" for betting.

This was a case stated by magistrates of the county of Stafford, and raised the question whether a certain bye-law made by the county council of Staffordshire against frequenting any public place for the purpose of betting was invalid or not.

MR. MULHOLLAND, Q.C., and Mr. Alfred Young appeared for the appellant, a bookmaker, who had been convicted for breach of this bye-law; Mr. Greene, Q.C., appeared for the respondents, but was not called on.

The bye-law, No. 7 of the bye-laws of 1896, was as follows:—"No person shall frequent any street or public place and use the same for the purpose of betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager with any person, either on behalf of himself or any other person."

MR. MULHOLLAND said the bye-law was illegal. The words ought to have been added that the betting should be to the annoyance of other persons. At any rate, its terms were too wide. The prohibition was not even confined to public highways. It would apply to a place where people might go, as, for instance, a place like Epsom Downs. The bye-law created a new offence. It was as if a bye-law were made to prevent a man sneezing or smoking. Betting was just as legal as sneezing or smoking. He cited "Burnett v. Berry" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 641); "Strickland v. Hayes" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 290); "Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon" (16 Q.B.D., 708); "Mantle v. Jordan" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 248).

The COURT upheld the bye-law.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that it did not appear to have been contended that there was any real difference between the bye-law in the present case and that in "Burnett v. Berry" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 641). That was a case which the Court must follow, unless there was any very strong reason to the contrary. But the learned Judge did not disagree with it. It was contended that something amounting to actual annoyance of the public was necessary to justify a bye-law of this description. That was not so, however. The bye-laws were to be bye-laws for good government of the locality. They certainly included a bye-law for the prevention of the practice of frequenting streets or public places for the purpose of making bets there.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. The bye-law was perfectly good. The county council had power to make bye-laws for "good rule and government." To make a bye-law for preventing persons frequenting streets for the purposes of betting was certainly a rule for the good government of the locality. Frequenting the highways and stopping people to make bets with them was clearly a subject for a bye-law. It was contrary to the primary use of a highway—namely, for people to pass and repass thereon.

LONDON BANKING CORPORATION (LIMITED) V. HORSNAIL, HAYWARD, AND COOPER.*

Bill of Exchange—Action by endorsee against acceptor—Alleged payment by endorser—Payment, what amounts to—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 59 (2) (b).

This was an action to recover £1,700, the balance due on a three months' bill of exchange, dated June 25, 1897, drawn by the defendant Horsnail, accepted by the defendant Hayward, and endorsed by the defendant Cooper, amongst others. The bill was ultimately endorsed to the plaintiffs. The action had been discontinued against Horsnail, he being an infant, and judgment had been recovered against Cooper. The defendant Hayward raised the defence that Cooper had paid the plaintiffs the balance due on the bill.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. E. A. Nepean were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. R. G. Glenn for the defendant Hayward; and Mr. J. Roskill appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy of Cooper.

It appeared from the evidence and the statements of counsel that the bill was drawn in connexion with building operations upon which Hayward was engaged in September, 1897; and that Cooper, who was at that time a solicitor, had endorsed it, in order that it might be more readily discounted. The bill became due on September 28, 1897. Cooper, shortly before it became due, paid the plaintiffs, who were then the holders of the bill for value, a sum of £300; and further paid them a bonus of £20 to induce them to hold the bill over from September 28 to October 1. On September 30 Cooper went to Hayward's office, hoping to find that Hayward had provided money to meet the bill; but not receiving the money from Hayward, he drew his own cheque on the London and County Bank (Croydon branch), where he had an account, for £1,700, and handed the cheque to the plaintiffs. At the same time he wrote a letter to his bankers advising them that he had drawn the cheque, and expressing a hope that Hayward would provide funds to meet it. The cheque was taken by a clerk of the plaintiffs to the London and County Bank on the morning of October 1. The cheque was a crossed one, and the cashier to whom it was presented prepared a form of "banker's payment," after consulting the manager. The form was as follows:—"Per Croydon branch, London and County Banking Company (Limited). Pay ourselves the sum of £ —, for —, manager." The date, amount, and the name of the payee were filled in, and the form was signed by the cashier and countersigned for the manager. The document was then handed to the plaintiffs' clerk, who looked at it and turned to leave. At that moment another clerk came out of the manager's room and said:—"Stop that payment." The cashier thereupon said to the plaintiffs' clerk:—"I fancy there is a mistake. Let me see it," and the clerk returned the document to him. The "banker's payment" and the cheque were then taken to the manager. The reason for the demand of the return of the "banker's payment" was the fact that the bank authorities had just heard (as was the fact) that Cooper, on October 1, had shot at his wife and attempted to commit suicide. Cooper on the same day was arrested, and was subsequently sentenced to a term of penal servitude, which he is now undergoing. The handing over of the "banker's payment" to the plaintiffs' clerk was the payment set up by the defendant.

Mr. Benham, the cashier at the Croydon branch of the London and County Bank, who was called on behalf of the defendant, stated that when a cheque was presented by one bank on another, and no particular mode of payment was specified, it was customary to pay by means of a "banker's payment."

In cross-examination he said that it was the custom of the bank to advise the head office of "banker's payments" issued during the day. The payee bank had to sign the "banker's payment," and it was then taken to the clearing-house. If the head office was not advised he did not think the money would be paid. He had never known of a "banker's payment" being cancelled after it had once been issued. The head office had not been advised on this occasion.

Mr. Nalder, the manager of the City office of the Metropolitan Bank of England and Wales, said that if no advice were given of the issuing of a "banker's payment" the signature of a branch bank would not be repudiated; but that the branch banks in fact always advised.

Mr. Dunsford, of the chief cashier's department in the Union Bank, said that, so far as the Union Bank was concerned, branch banks did not advise as to "banker's payments"; and Mr. Drake, a cashier at Lloyds Bank, gave evidence similar to that of Mr. Nalder.

Evidence was also given by the solicitor to Cooper's trustee in bankruptcy, and by Cooper himself, who explained the circumstances leading to the making of the bill and the drawing of the cheque for £1,700.

MR. BOSANQUET, Q.C., submitted that, the action being against the acceptor of the bill and payment, if any, having been made by the endorser, the bill was not discharged, and the acceptor was still liable. The plaintiffs might recover as trustees for Cooper—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, section 59, subsection (2) (b).

MR. BRAY, Q.C., argued that the onus was on the plaintiffs to prove that they were holding the bill for Cooper. The Bills of Exchange Act showed that the endorser was the only person who could sue if the bill had been paid. The bill had in fact been paid when the "banker's payment" was handed to the clerk of the plaintiffs, and the defendant was under no liability to the plaintiffs. He relied on "Pollard v. Bank of England" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 623). "Chambers v.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Miller" (13 C.B., N.S., 125), "Williams v. James" (2 Ex., 798).

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiffs' clerk on presenting Cooper's cheque at the London and County Bank might have insisted upon receiving £1,700 in cash. He had not insisted upon a cash payment, but, being authorized no doubt to do so, had taken instead a "banker's payment." What took place at the Croydon branch of the bank amounted, in his Lordship's view, to a payment of the cheque. Apparently, after this payment had been made, the manager of the bank discovered something—probably the fact that Cooper had been arrested—which made him think it would be unwise to pay the cheque; and he accordingly directed his clerk to ask for the return of the "banker's payment" on the ground that there had been a mistake. In reality there had been no mistake at all, but the bank wished to prevent payment. The paper was thereupon handed back to the cashier by the plaintiffs' clerk. The consequence was that, though there had been a payment of the cheque in law, there had been none in fact, for the plaintiffs had never converted it into cash. His Lordship found, as a fact, that Cooper by October 15 knew that his cheque had been treated as a non-paid cheque, and, in his opinion, from that time forward the plaintiffs remained, with the assent of Cooper, holders for value of the bill. Being holders for value, and the acceptor not having paid, the plaintiffs were entitled to sue the defendant. He did not think that the defendant had made out that the amount of the bill had been paid, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs.

THE QUEEN V. DOUGLAS AND OTHERS.*

Justices—Disqualification—Clerk to magistrates —Ex officio justice—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 22.

A clerk to magistrates became ex officio a justice of peace by virtue of being chairman of the district council; held that he thereby vacated the office of magistrates' clerk.

In this case, which came before the Court on February 12, a rule nisi for a certiorari had been obtained to bring up a conviction by the justices of the division of Ringwood, in the county of Southampton, to be quashed on the ground that Mr. Alderman Druitt, who was clerk to the magistrates, and who, being mayor of Christchurch and chairman of the district council, was by virtue of the Local Government Act, 1894, section 22, an ex officio justice of the peace for the division of Ringwood, in which Christchurch is situate, had formed one of the seven magistrates who adjudicated on the case. Another alleged ground for quashing the conviction, which was for assault upon a woman, was that the respondent, Alderman Druitt, was a practising solicitor. Though holding the office of clerk to the magistrates and receiving the salary, Mr. Druitt had not acted in that capacity since May, 1896, the duties being performed by his son with the acquiescence of the justices. The respondent had on several occasions tendered his resignation to the Bench, but they had not accepted it or appointed a successor until after the commencement of the present proceedings.

MR. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C. (Mr. Clavell Salter with him), showed cause against the rule. The Local Government Act, 1894, made the respondent an ex officio justice, unless he was disqualified by some Act of Parliament. Even if the office of magistrates' clerk was inconsistent with being a justice, this did not amount to a statutory disqualification. Even if the offices were incompatible the conviction was not necessarily bad. If holding the office of magistrates' clerk was a disqualification, it was waived at the hearing, for on both occasions when the applicant was before the Bench he was represented by solicitors who knew the facts.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that if the two offices were incompatible, one of them was vacated, as that was the legal meaning of the word.

MR. LAWRENCE said that in "Rex v. Pattison" (4 B. and Ad., 9) it was held that the acceptance of the one office did not vacate the other. He did not say that the two offices ought to be exercised together, but there must be a real interest to make the conviction bad. On the question of waiver he cited "Reg. v. Burton" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 468).

MR. E. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Mr. F. H. M. Corbet with him) argued contra. On the occasion in question the respondent was acting through his son in advising the magistrates, and was also sitting on the bench as a judicial officer. These offices were incompatible, because it was essential that the justices forming the Court should be unpaid, whereas Mr. Druitt was taking money for the clerkship. It was not consonant with the policy of the law that a man should fill both positions. Having cited "Worth and Others v. Newton" (23 L.J., Ex., 338), the learned counsel said that the question of waiver could only arise where the magistrate was interested, but in this case he had no jurisdiction and had no right to be on the bench at all.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, after hearing the arguments, intimated that the case was of such importance that the Court would reserve judgment. He was glad that Mr. Druitt had put an end to what was undoubtedly a scandal, although there was no suggestion of any personal imputation upon him. In giving judgment to-day he said that this was a case which illustrated the jealousy with which the law looked upon what was required in the administration of justice by magistrates. Two objections were made to the conviction. The first was that Mr. Alderman Druitt, one of the magistrates who took part in it, was a practising solicitor, and the second that he was clerk to the magistrates. As regards the first objection there was no real foundation for it. The gentleman had ceased to practise so far back as 1892, in which year he made over his business to certain of his relations. It was true that until 1896 he had taken out a solicitor's certificate, but he had only done this because he thought it was proper to do so, having regard to the fact that he was joint registrar of one of the County Courts. With regard to the second objection it appeared that Mr. Druitt had held the position of clerk to the magistrates for a considerable time, and, in the sense that he received the salary, he continued to hold it until a date subsequent to the conviction. He had tendered his resignation, but the magistrates had done a highly improper thing. Though Mr. Druitt had become mayor of Christchurch, and ex officio a member of the Bench, they permitted him to retain his office of clerk to the magistrates and to draw the salary. It was not suggested that there was any intention in the nature of jobbery; nevertheless the course pursued was reprehensible, and the fact was that Mr. Druitt continued to be clerk to the magistrates, acting by his son. The question was whether he was thereby incapacitated from holding the position of a magistrate. The two positions were incompatible with one another. What was the position of a clerk to magistrates accepting the position of mayor and chairman of a district council? He could not be compelled to remain in his office of clerk. He had a right to free himself of that office, and the magistrates could not prevent him. What was the effect of a person holding two offices incompatible with one another? The principle to be applied was to be found in "Reg. v. the Mayor, &c., of Bangor" (18 Q.B.D.; 349). In that case it was held that a person elected to the office of councillor in a borough who was also at the time of his election an alderman of the borough by accepting the former office vacated the latter. The late Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, in the course of his judgment said:—"It has been said that the offices are incompatible, and that two incompatible offices cannot be held by the same person at the same time. The latter proposition is true with respect to the offices of alderman and councillor, not on the ground that they are offices of profit, but on the ground that they are so incompatible that the Legislature cannot have intended they should be held by the same person at the same time. What is the consequence of this doctrine? A long series of authorities has upheld the proposition that when two offices are incompatible, and the suggested ineligibility of the candidates for one of them only arises from the fact that it is incompatible with the office he already holds, he is not thereby prevented from being elected to the second office, whether it be superior in rank or power to the other or not. The cases have decided that if a person holding one office be elected to another and accepts that election he thereby vacates the office he held, and thus the difficulty with respect to the impossibility of holding two incompatible offices is got rid of." The principle in that case applied to the present one. By accepting the office of mayor Mr. Druitt vacated his office of clerk to the magistrates. Though his subsequent acceptance of the salary was an irregularity, yet that did not prevent him from acting as a magistrate. The rule for a certiorari would therefore be discharged, but without costs.

DENABY AND CADEBY CO. V. FENTON.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—"Fatal accident in mine," meaning of.

This was a case stated by justices at Doncaster, and raised a question as to the meaning of the words "fatal accident in the mine" in an agreement between colliery owners and the miners.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. E. Lewis Thomas appeared for the appellants; Mr. Atherley-Jones, Q.C., and Mr. Compton-Smith for the respondents.

The facts were these:—A summons was taken out by the appellants, the Denaby and Cadeby Main Collieries Company, under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vic., c. 90), claiming 5s. damages by reason of the respondent, a miner, absenting himself from service on September 7, 1897. On that day a boy was injured in the Cadeby Main Colliery, and the respondent assisted to extricate him from under the "corves," or trucks, and stated that the boy then gave no signs of life. He was taken out alive, and taken on an ambulance to a hospital about a mile and a-half from the colliery, and died two hours after his arrival there, but was in an unconscious state and dying from the moment the corves ran over him. There had been a question between the appellants and their workmen in May last as to whether men were entitled to leave the mine in case an accident happened when a workman was injured in the mine, but did not die therein. The appellants did not recognize the custom as extending to any case but that of a person dying in the mine. Eventually it was agreed between the appellants and their workmen that in case of a fatal accident in the mine the workmen might in certain cases leave the mine. The circumstances of the case were such that if the boy had died in the mine the respondent would have been entitled to leave and to cease work during the time he did so leave and cease it. He left the mine under the bona fide belief that a fatal accident had occurred. The justices held that the accident was not a fatal accident in the mine, and that therefore the respondent was not entitled to leave the mine and cease work, but that as he had an honest belief that the boy was dead he was justified in leaving, for which reason the Justices held that he was not liable in damages, and dismissed the summons.

Mr. CRIPPS, on behalf of the appellants, contended that the justices were wrong. If the agreement between the parties had been broken a bona fide but mistaken belief as to a matter of fact was no answer to the breach. The Justices should therefore have given damages.

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES submitted that there was within the meaning of the parties a fatal accident in the mine. It was not like a miner dying weeks after the injury. The boy here was in articulo mortis while in the mine. The contract must be reasonably interpreted. If the men reasonably believed the boy was dead, it would be reasonable that they should quit.

The COURT upheld the decision of the justices, but not on the grounds given by them.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said the Court, speaking generally, could only deal with the issues left in a case stated, but this was not without exception; for if the Court could see from the contract set out that there was a point not taken by the magistrates, the Court could deal with it. In the opinion of the Court, what happened was in effect a "fatal accident in the mine," and therefore the respondent was within his right in leaving off work. He would advise the masters and workmen to come to an agreement to define more clearly the circumstances which would justify men in leaving the mine. He might suggest that some such words as these might be inserted,—"If the person injured is apparently dead, or in a dying state, it would then be a question of fact for the justices in each case to say whether there were sufficient grounds to justify the miners in leaving the mine."

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said the decision must be upheld. This accident was a "fatal accident in a mine" within the words of the agreement as set out in the case. If the words had been "an accident fatal in a mine" there might have been a difference. The boy here was dying the moment after he was run over. He was in articulo mortis.

REG. V. SHARMAN AND OTHERS, JUSTICES—EX PARTE DENTON.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Application for—Objections—Justices—Practice.

Justices have a discretion as to hearing objections to a licence from persons who decline to make their statements on oath.

This was a motion for a certiorari to quash the grant of a licence, and also for a mandamus to the justices of the Wellingborough division of the county of Northampton, and the question was raised whether an objector to the grant of a new licence, who wished to state facts, might be compelled to make his statement on oath.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Pollard appeared for the persons to whom the licence had been granted; Mr. Candy, Q.C., and Mr. W. Ryland Adkins appeared for the justices; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. G. Blaiklock for Mr. Denton, the person who had objected to the licence being granted, and [was not allowed to make unsworn statements before the justices.

The general annual licensing meeting of the Wellingborough division of the county of Northampton was held on Monday, August 23, when an application was made by William Douglas Knight for a provisional full licence for a proposed hotel near the railway station at Rushden.

Several witnesses were called and sworn on behalf of the applicant, and were examined and cross-examined.

A memorial in favour of the grant was also put in and considered. A number of witnesses against the grant were called, sworn, examined, and cross-examined, and a memorial or petition was put in on behalf of certain opponents. Among the signatures thereto was that of Mr. George Denton, the applicant for the certiorari. Upon the closing of the case, Mr. Denton, who was a resident in the district and a large employer of labour, rose and stated that he had certain facts to lay before the justices in opposition to the granting of the licence. It was objected that he ought not to act as an advocate, and that if he desired to make statements of fact he ought to do so upon oath and submit to cross-examination as all other witnesses had done. The justices were of opinion that Mr. Denton ought to take the oath like any other witness when he claimed to make statements of fact. At the meeting of the committee for confirming the licence Mr. Denton acted in a similar manner, and was refused permission to make statements of fact not on oath. The licence was confirmed.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON urged that the rule for a certiorari ought not to be made absolute. He cited "The Royal Aquarium v. Parkinson" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 431), "R. v. the London County Council—Re the Empire Theatre" (71 L.T., 638), "R. v. the Court of the Company of Watermen, &c." ([1897] 1 Q.B., 659), "R. v. Justices of Surrey" (52 J.P., 423). He stated that Mr. Denton had claimed the right to express his views to the justices and to state facts on the strength of the case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" ([1897] A.C., 556), which decided that a licensing meeting of justices was not a Court of summary jurisdiction. Mr. Lawson Walton submitted that the justices had a discretion, and that if they refused to hear Mr. Denton except on the same terms as other witnesses they were perfectly justified in doing so.

Mr. ASQUITH, on behalf of Mr. Denton, said it was immaterial for his client whether a mandamus or certiorari was granted. He would not, therefore, contend very strenuously that a certiorari was the right remedy. Mr. Denton claimed a right as a resident parishioner to express his views. The case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" had nothing to do with the matter. He hoped that the Court would decide whether a certiorari was the proper remedy before dealing with the mandamus.

The COURT then held that a certiorari was not the right remedy.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said it was not a case for a certiorari. The grant of the licence was not a judicial order, and there had been no want of jurisdiction. In fact, almost all the possible objections were applicable to it.

Mr. CANDY and Mr. ADKINS then showed cause on behalf of the magistrates against the mandamus.

Mr. ASQUITH, dealing with the question as to whether the applicant had shown a legal right to the mandamus, said that residents had a locus standi at licensing meetings. The justices ought to have accepted the statements of Mr. Denton, though they might allow less weight to them if he would not swear to their truth.

The COURT refused to make the rule absolute.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that as to the substantial question the matter was left to the discretion of the justices, and they should not be too strict in its exercise. Within reasonable limits the local public should be allowed to express their views. But there was nothing to hinder their discretion. As to the mandamus there was no substance in the application. Under certain circumstances members of the local public might have the right to intervene at these licensing meetings; but in this case little, if any, ground was shown why Mr. Denton should do so, and, moreover, he never gave any reason why he should not be sworn. The learned judge did not see that the grant of a mandamus would serve any useful purpose. No miscarriage of justice had been shown. The opponents of the licence had been fully heard; a petition against it, of which Mr. Denton was a signatory, had been put in and considered. The rule must, therefore, be discharged.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. The justices had discretion to refuse to hear persons who would not take an oath, as all the others had done. The case illustrated the saying that a little knowledge was a dangerous thing. It would have been just as well if Mr. Denton had never read "Boulter v. the Justices of Kent."

THE OWNERS OF WOOL CARGO LATELY LADEN ON BOARD THE STEAMSHIP WAIKATO V. THE NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Ship—Bill of lading—Damage to goods—Defective condition of vessel—Exceptions limiting liability—Construction.

This was an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract by bills of lading given in respect of certain parcels of wool shipped at ports in Queensland for London on board the defendants' steamship Waikato. The wool in question was stowed in portions of the vessel which had been fitted up with insulation, in the usual manner, for the carriage of frozen meat. On arrival in London the wool was found to be damaged. The plaintiffs alleged, inter alia, that the vessel was not in a proper condition to carry the wool by reason of the insulation of her holds, whereby the heated air in the holds was unable to escape, and that by reason thereof the wool had been damaged. The defendants contended that under the terms of the bills of lading they were protected. The bills of lading contained the following clause:—"The act of God, . . . loss or damage arising from accidents to or defects, latent on beginning voyage or otherwise, or to (sic) hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, or their appurtenances, . . . steam, heat, or fire on board, . . . any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew, or other servants of the company, the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and canal, and of navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, are excepted." By an order made in Chambers it was directed that certain questions be tried before the trial of the action—namely, (1) whether, having regard to the bills of lading, there was an implied term that the parts of the Waikato in which the wool was stowed should be, when the said wool was shipped, in a proper condition to carry the said wool safely on the voyage; (2) whether the fact alleged—namely, that they were insulated for use as refrigerating chambers, whereby the heated air in the holds could not escape, by reason of which the damage complained of was alleged to have occurred—was not a defect within the meaning of the clause in the bill of lading. These questions now came before his Lordship for decision.

*Reported by H. RUSSELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by R. H. BALLOCH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Right Hon. H. H. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. Laing for the defendants.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that the common law obligation of the shipowner was to provide for the cargo-owner at the beginning of the voyage a ship fit to carry the particular cargo. If the shipowner desired to get out of that responsibility he must do so by using very plain and distinct words. The bill of lading, as a rule, was given to the cargo-owner after the cargo had been shipped, and he was supposed to assent to the terms which were introduced into the bill of lading if he did not raise an objection to them, and, as his opportunity of objecting was not of much practical use to him, the shipowner ought to express his meaning in the plainest possible way. Now it was said in this case that the shipowner had told the cargo-owner, by this clause, that his goods were to be carried upon the terms that the ship was not responsible, although she started on her voyage in an obviously unfit state to carry the cargo. That was a most unlikely contract for the shipowner to suggest or the cargo-owner to agree to, and unless the words of the bill of lading constrained him he (the learned Judge) would hesitate to come to the conclusion that such a contract had been entered into. (The learned Judge then read the words of the bill of lading set out above, and continued.) The "defects" which the shipowner excepted were those which were latent at the beginning of the voyage. The clause was really an attempt to introduce into the bill of lading one of the provisions of the Harter Act.* The defendants contended that the meaning of the clause was that they were not to be responsible for defects which were prominent and open to the observation of themselves and their servants. They relied on the words "or otherwise." In the opinion of the learned Judge those words would not convey such a meaning to any one reading the bill of lading. If the shipowner wanted to make such a contract he must use plain and simple words, and show the cargo-owner clearly that he would have to insure himself against risks which as a rule he had not to insure against. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs upon the preliminary questions with costs.

ECCELS AND OTHERS V. MILLS AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant by lessor —Breach—Covenant not running with the reversion—Liability of lessor's general estate.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand of June 29, 1895, dismissing the appeal of the appellants against so much of the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Zealand in the action as related to certain lands in Otago known as the Meadowbank Estate. The arguments were heard in February, 1897.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Mr. Butcher, Q.C., were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Russell Roberts, and Mr. C. H. Sargant for the respondents.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, in giving their Lordships' judgment, said the question in the case was whether a sum of money recovered more than 20 years ago by the lessee of a New Zealand farm from the executors of his lessor as compensation for the non-fulfilment of a certain covenant in the lease ought not to have been charged against the specific devisees of the farm instead of being paid as it was out of the lessor's general estate. The claim, though it arose so long ago, was not barred by statute, or by laches, or by any rule of equity. The liability was not dealt with directly by any provision in the lessor's will. The answer to the question must therefore depend on the true meaning and nature of the covenant. Was the covenant one that ran with the reversion? If so, was that circumstance of itself enough to throw the liability on the reversion in exoneration of the general estate? If the covenant did not run with the reversion did the reversioner necessarily escape all liability? Or must the inquiry be carried further? Might not the liability depend on other considerations than the rights and remedies of lessees under the statute of 32 Henry VIII., and the question whether the agreement was or was not under seal? Might it not perhaps be that as between the objects of the testator's bounty the liability depended on the consideration whether the covenant was properly incident to the relation of landlord and tenant, or was it in its nature preliminary and introductory to the commencement of that relation—whether it was, so to speak, a condition of the letting or a condition of the lease? Those questions were all debated more or less fully at the Bar. They were certainly none of them free from difficulty, and there did not appear to be any authority applicable to the peculiar circumstances of the case. By deed dated September 2, 1868, the lessor, John Jones, of Dunedin, in the province of Otago, demised to Francis Dillon Bell a farm of some 4,000 acres in that province known as Meadowbank. The term was 14 years from September 1, 1868. The rent was to be £1,000 a year. The lease contained a covenant by the lessor for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns in the following words:—"The lessor, his heirs, or assigns will, at his or their own expense, on or before September 1, 1869, completely finish laying down in good English grass and in accordance with the rules of good husbandry the 1,000 acres which the lessor has already commenced laying down in English grass." If there were nothing more in the lease bearing on the construction of that covenant and nothing else to be considered there would undoubtedly be implied in and by reason of the covenant to finish the operation in question, an agreement on the part of the lessor to lay down in English grass and according to the rules of good husbandry so much and such parts of the 1,000 acres referred to as had not been laid down in that manner already. There would also be implied on the part of the lessee an authority or licence for the lessor to enter upon the land and cultivate it for that purpose. And if such an agreement and such a provision were implied in the lease it would be difficult to contend that the burden of the covenant did not run with the reversion, so as to give the lessee a right of action and a remedy against the persons who might be assignees of the reversion at the time fixed for the complete fulfilment of the covenant. The covenant, however, did not stand alone. It was accompanied and apparently controlled by the following declaration, which was inserted at the end of the lease:—"It is hereby declared that there shall not be implied in this lease any covenant or provision whatever on the part of either of the parties hereto." The effect of that declaration, if it meant what it said, was to qualify the preceding covenant by shutting out every possible implication which the terms of the covenant would seem to suggest or require. The result, therefore, was that by the covenant so qualified the lessor warranted that he would on or before September 1, 1869, completely finish laying down the 1,000 acres in good English grass, according to the rules of good husbandry, but that he did not bind himself further in any shape or way. He did not agree to break up the land or to lay it down, or to do anything on the land in fulfilment of the apparent intention of the covenant. He had reserved no power of entry, nor was he given any authority to enter for that purpose. Still, if the operation was not found finished on the prescribed day, he must be answerable in damages. That was the bargain between the parties. They stood to be bound by the strict letter of their contract. They chose to draw the line there. They would not go one step further. Whatever there might be beyond the mere letter of the contract depending on inference or implication that was deliberately excluded—a singular provision no doubt, whether it proceeded from mutual distrust or sprang from the fancy of the draftsman, or was adopted as a means of avoiding some difficulty of the moment. But the declaration was not open to any ambiguity. The language was as plain and as positive as language could be. And, after all, perhaps the explanation was not so very far to seek if Mr. Bell's letter of July 2, 1869, which was in evidence, might be taken as an accurate description of the surrounding circumstances and the position of the parties when the lease was executed. The treaty for the lease was a very protracted affair. The great matter to be arranged was the laying down of the 1,000 acres in English grass. Mr. Bell counted upon that improvement to make the rent. At Mr. Jones's request he laid down about 250 acres. Mr. Jones set about doing the rest of the work himself. He ploughed the ground and he sowed it. Then he wanted Mr. Bell to accept the land as he was laying it down. Mr. Bell refused. The quality of the seed was not what it should have been; the best seed in the world would come to nothing on a single ploughing; the work would have to be done all over again. Everybody said so—friends and neighbours as well as the incoming tenant. Heedless of warning and deaf to advice, Mr. Jones went on in his own way. When he had once ploughed and once sown the specified number of acres, though no grass was to be seen, he maintained that he had done all that was required. Mr. Bell would not yield. Mr. Jones was firm, or perhaps obstinate. Fortunately they both appealed to the future. Time would tell who was right and who was wrong. So when it came to the point of granting the lease "a year was given," as Mr. Bell says, "to prove" whether the work had been properly done or not. Mr. Jones was content to pay the penalty if the fates were against him. But apparently, as a point of honour, he would not set his hand to anything implying an agreement to do more than he had done without expressly negating any such implication. Whether that explanation be satisfactory or not, everybody must admit that, in construing a contract, the Court was bound to give effect to every part of it. If a stipulation was found in the bond it mattered little how it got there. It was not to be rejected because it might be unusual or ignored because 20 years afterwards the Court could not guess why it was ever introduced. Mr. Jones did not live to see the end of his experiment. He died on March 16, 1869. By his will, which was made on December 20, 1868, he divided his property among his children. Some of their shares he settled, including the share in which Meadowbank was comprised. He appointed executors, and made them also trustees of the settled shares. The appellants, who claimed under a voluntary conveyance, represented the inheritance in Meadowbank. The principal respondents were the persons interested in the testator's residuary estate. At the end of the first year of his tenancy Mr. Bell claimed compensation for breach of the covenant in question. The claim was originally made against the testator's executors as trustees of Meadowbank. The matter was referred to arbitration. By an award dated March 2, 1871, the arbitrators found that the covenant had been broken and assessed the damages at £2,296, directing that the parties contesting the claim should pay that sum to Mr. Bell as executors of Mr. Jones. The money, with interest and costs, was ultimately paid to Mr. Bell out of the testator's personal estate not specifically bequeathed. The payment was directed to be borne by the testator's executors in deference to an opinion of Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. (afterwards Mr. Justice) Archibald, who advised that the covenant did not run with the reversion, and that the damages would be payable out of the testator's general estate. The learned counsel, of course, gave no reasons with their opinion, but it could hardly be doubted that they proceeded on the principle that effect ought to be given to every term of the contract. The propriety of the payment was not questioned at the time or for many years afterwards. Lately, however, difficulties arose in regard to some items in the trustees' accounts and two suits were instituted for partial administration of the testator's estate. In the course of the second suit the question now at issue came to be discussed. At the suggestion of the Judge the pleadings were amended. All parties interested were brought before the Court, and the suit was turned into a suit for general administration. Mr. Justice Williams was of opinion that Mr. Bell's claim ought to have been satisfied by the specific devisees and that the testator's general estate ought to be recouped by a charge on Meadowbank. A decree to that effect was accordingly pronounced with consequential directions. On appeal the Court unanimously affirmed the decree. Their Lordships were unable to concur in the view taken by Mr. Justice Williams and the Court of Appeal in New Zealand. They thought that the covenant in question must be construed as qualified and controlled by the declaration which followed it. On that construction the covenant did not run with the reversion, and, inasmuch as in their opinion the covenant was not incident to the relation of landlord and tenant, they thought that the liability for the breach of the covenant properly fell to be borne by the testator's general estate. The view taken by their Lordships of the nature and meaning of the covenant rendered it unnecessary to determine upon whom as between the different objects of the testator's bounty the liability would have fallen primarily if the covenant had been unqualified and uncontrolled by any other provision in the lease. But inasmuch as Mr. Justice Williams proceeded on the assumption that the covenant was unqualified and on the admission of counsel that the covenant ran with the reversion, and as his judgment in its entirety was approved by the Court of Appeal, it would hardly be right for that Board to pass the question by in silence. The reasoning of Mr. Justice Williams seemed to be this:—The covenant runs with the reversion. It is, therefore, not merely an obligation imposed by statute on the reversioner, but a burden or charge upon the reversion itself. A person who takes a benefit under a will must take the benefit with any burden that happens to be attached to it. Then there are plenty of cases where legatees of leaseholds have tried in vain to shift the burdens incident to their leasehold interest and throw them on the testator's general estate; those cases are in point; there the burden was incident to the lease here it is incident to the reversion. The leaseholder bears the burden incident to his holding; the reversioner must in like manner bear the burden incidental to his estate. That reasoning did not appear to their Lordships altogether satisfactory. It did not, perhaps, keep sufficiently distinct the two principal questions which, on the assumption that the covenant ran with the reversion, would present themselves for consideration—the question whether the covenant was a burden or charge on the reversion itself and the question whether the covenant was in its nature incident to the relation of landlord and tenant. In regard to both their Lordships had some difficulty in accepting the view of the learned Judge. Granted that the covenant ran with the reversion it did not follow that the liability under the covenant was a burden upon the reversion. At common law no covenant ran with the reversion. By the statute of Henry VIII. all lessees have “like action and remedy against all persons . . . having any gift or grant . . . of the reversion of the said lands and hereditaments so letten . . . for any condition or covenant expressed in the indentures of their leases” as they might have had against their lessors. They could not have any greater right or any more extended remedy. In the lifetime of the lessor the covenant was not a burden on the land in the hands of the lessor. After his death, how could it be a burden on the land in the hands of the specific devisees? The appellants did not dispute that if the covenant ran with the reversion the specific devisees of Meadowbank came under liability to Mr. Bell. Whatever liability the statute threw on the specific devisees as assignees of the reversion that they were bound to bear as between themselves and the lessee. But the testator's estate was also liable and residuary legatees took nothing until the testator's liabilities were satisfied. If the liability for the breach of the covenant was not a charge on the inheritance as Mr. Justice Williams seemed to have thought it was, why should the specific devisees bear it rather than the testator's estate merely because for the protection of tenants the statute gave the lessee an additional remedy against the lessor's assignees? The inquiry must go deeper. It would seem that the nature of the obligation in each particular case must determine the question. If it was in its nature incident to the relation of landlord and tenant it would only be fair that the burden should be borne by the devisee as between him and the testator's estate, falling on him as landlord whether the agreement bore a seal or not. That seemed to have been the principle of “Mansel v. Norton” (22 Ch. Div., 769), where it would be observed there was no covenant to run with the reversion, though by some slip in the report the Master of the Rolls was made to say that there was. The lease was not under seal, and therefore the statute had no application. The agreement there was that the lessor should buy the tenant's property at the end of the term, and it was held that as between the specific devisee and the testator's estate that obligation—incident as it plainly was to the relation of landlord and tenant—fell on the devisee. On the other hand, if the covenant was not in its nature incident to the relation of landlord and tenant—if the thing to be done was something preparatory to the complete establishment of that relation—it would seem to be fair and in accordance with the probable wishes of the testator that the burden of the covenant unperformed by him in his lifetime should be borne by his estate rather than by the specific devisees. In the present case the object of the covenant was to insure the premises being put into a condition fit for the occupation of the tenant under the lease. Such a covenant was intended to be performed forthwith—not to remain attendant on the lease during its currency. In its nature it seemed to be very different from a covenant by the landlord to keep buildings on the demised land in repair or to pay for unexhausted improvements at the end of the lease. The cases cited at the Bar where the question was between a specific legatee of leaseholds and the testator's estate were of little or no assistance in determining the question now under consideration. The only one cited in which the covenant could possibly be regarded as otherwise than incident to the relation of landlord and tenant (if indeed any covenant in a lease on the part of the lessee could be regarded as otherwise than incident to that relation) was the case of “Marshall v. Holloway” before Vice-Chancellor Shadwell (5 Sim., 196). There the lessee covenanted to make certain improvements in existing buildings and to erect certain new buildings on the demised land within a comparatively short period. The lessee died before the period expired without having completely performed his covenant. It was held that the devisee of the leasehold ought to be exonerated by the general personal estate from the cost of completing the unfinished work. That case if it could be accepted as an authority would appear to go far beyond the position which the appellants sought to establish. The report, however, was so confused that it was not easy to say upon which, if any, of the various grounds touched upon in the judgment his Honour desired to rest his decision. It was certainly not surprising to find that subsequent Judges had differed on the point. Vice-Chancellor Turner felt considerably embarrassed by “Marshall v. Holloway” in a case before him (“Fitzwilliams v. Kelly,” 10 Hare, 266) where the covenant was meant to be in attendance during the whole term of the lease and to have a recurring operation—a case in that respect apparently as different from “Marshall v. Holloway” as well could be. He thought Vice-Chancellor Shadwell must have relied on a provision in the will as to the payment of the testator's debts. Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, however, considered that the principle in “Marshall v. Holloway” and the principle in “Fitzwilliams v. Kelly” were one and the same—the principle being that the obligation of completing the testator's interest in the subject-matter of the bequest fell on the testator's general estate (see “Armstrong v. Burnet,” 20 Beav., 424, 431, 437). The Master of the Rolls seemed to have thought that the fulfilment of the repairing and building covenant in “Marshall v. Holloway” was required to complete the testator's interest as lessee, or, in other words, that the fulfilment of that covenant might be regarded as antecedent and preparatory to the complete establishment of the relation of tenant and landlord. Whatever might be the true explanation of “Marshall v. Holloway,” their Lordships agreed with

* Reported by W. J. SOULSBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Williams in thinking that it would not be satisfactory to rely on a case about which there was so much obscurity, though they could not see that " Marshall v. Holloway " was virtually overruled, or, indeed, affected by the decision of the Court of Appeal in " Hawkins v. Hawkins " (13 Ch. Div., 470) which seemed to have been a very plain case, and was one in which their Lordships entirely agreed. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty that the decision under appeal should be reversed and that the suit should be dismissed with costs in the Courts below so far as it sought to throw the liability for the breach of the covenant in question on the specific devisees of Meadowbank. The respondents, who represented the residuary legatees, would pay the costs of the appeal, including the costs of the respondents, the trustees.

THE QUEEN V. CLEMENS.*

Criminal Law—Malicious injury to property—24 and 25 Vict., c. 97, sec. 51—Direction to jury.

This was a case reserved for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved by the Quarter Sessions for Cornwall.

Mr. Bucknill, Q.C., and Mr. W. T. Lawrance appeared for the prosecution; Mr. Duke for the defence.

The defendant, Henry Clemens, sen., and 19 others were indicted under section 51 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, for that they on August 31, in the parish of Newquay, Cornwall, unlawfully and maliciously did damage certain personal property—namely, a wooden structure, or office, of the Headland Hotel Company (Limited), to an amount exceeding £5. The facts were as follows:—In August, 1897, the Headland Hotel Company having obtained a lease from Mr. Treffry, the owner of the soil of some land at Newquay, forming portion of the Little Fistral Meadow, had begun to excavate for the foundations of an hotel, and had erected thereon a wooden building of the value of £14 for an office. On August 31 a number of persons, including the defendants, assembled at Newquay, and, headed by a brass band, proceeded to the meadow, fastened a rope to the wooden building, pulled it over, and broke it up. They then tied the rope to the two sides of the building, dragged them to the edge of the cliff, and threw them into the sea, which is distant 120 yards from the spot where the wooden building had been erected. They then returned, tied the rope to the remaining two sides, dragged them to the cliff, and likewise threw them into the sea. For the defence, evidence was given that, until about 60 years ago, the land was part of a large extent of unenclosed land called Towan Common, and the inhabitants of Newquay (which was then a village called Towan Blistra) were accustomed to dry and mend nets on Towan Common, take sand therefrom, cut the rushes growing thereon for fuel and for litter for cattle, and go upon the said land for purposes of recreation. About 60 years ago Mr. Lomax, the then owner of the soil, enclosed great part of the land, including Little Fistral Meadow. At the time of the enclosure the inhabitants of Newquay protested and had a meeting with Mr. Lomax, who agreed to put a stile in the eastern hedge of the Little Fistral Meadow, for the purpose of giving to the inhabitants access to the land within the enclosure. The inhabitants and visitors have been accustomed to use the stile and to wander at pleasure over the enclosure. It was contended by the defendants that they were not guilty of the alleged offence, on the ground that the acts done by them had been done in good faith in assertion of rights over the said land which they believed to be possessed by the inhabitants of Newquay. The chairman directed the jury that it was for them to decide whether the defendants acted bona fide in the belief that they were within their rights; and, secondly, whether they did excessive damage; and that if, in the exercise of what they believed to be their rights to remove an obstruction, the defendants did more damage than was necessary the jury should find them guilty. The jury returned a general verdict of guilty, and in answer to questions stated that the defendants, acting in the bona fide belief that they were entitled to remove the building, did more damage than was necessary. A fine of 40s. was imposed on each defendant, and a case reserved by the chairman for this Court.

Mr. DUKE said his submission was that the direction of the chairman was wrong as to the rights claimed. They were a right of access to the land for purposes of recreation in the inhabitants of New Quay, and a right to have the land kept free of buildings which would interfere with the drying of nets. If the bona fide belief in the right to take sand existed that would exonerate the defendants even if the right itself did not exist.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM asked whether it was part of their recreation to throw the office into the sea.

Mr. DUKE said there was no adjoining place where they could have put the materials except highways and private property, where they would be a trespass. He admitted, however, that there was evidence on which the jury might have been entitled to convict, but submitted that they were not properly directed. What they should have been told was that the excess of damage beyond what was absolutely necessary might be evidence of malice and illegality, but that they ought not to have been told that it was proof of it. It was not found here that the defendants did more than they knew they had a right to do. He cited "Perry v. FitzHowe" ([1846] 8 Q.B., 757).

The COURT, without calling on counsel for the prosecution, upheld the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said the statement of the case was not altogether satisfactory, but the fault lay, not with the chairman of quarter sessions, but with the way the case was presented to the quarter sessions on behalf of the defendants. His Lordship then read the statement on the case as to the rights said to have been exercised more than 60 years ago. Some of them, he said, were profits à prendre—namely, rights to enter on the land of another and take therefrom a profit. These would not be general rights for a whole community, but only rights in respect of certain property. The right alleged of drying their nets on the ground might apply to the inhabitants of the place, as also might the claim of right of access for purposes of recreation. The case did not expressly state what rights were relied on by the defendants. The chairman thought there might be some evidence of right of access for purposes of recreation. But no details were given. It must, however, be assumed that the defendants went on the land in the assertion of some right. His Lordship then read the statement in the case as to the destruction of the wooden office, and then continued,—It was not denied that there was in this state of things ample evidence that the defendants had unlawfully and maliciously damaged personal property to an amount exceeding £5, but it was contended that the jury had arrived at a verdict of guilty on a wrong direction of the chairman. The summing-up, however, was in substance a proper summing-up, though the precise language thereof might not be the same as he himself would have used. As appeared from the note of the summing-up affixed to the case, the chairman said to the jury, "You have not got to decide whether a right exists or does not exist, but whether defendants, in acting as they did, acted in the bona-fide belief that they were acting within their rights—rights that were known to the law and a right that can be legally a right in removing this building. In the next place you will have to determine whether or not, assuming they acted bona fide in what they did, and that they removed an obstruction which they were justified in removing, whether they did excessive damage in so doing." And later on, in his summing-up, he directed the jury—(1) first of all to decide whether or not in removing this building the defendants thought they were acting in the protection of a right, such right being a right known to the law, and if so (2) whether, in removing it, they did damage which was greater than they were bound to do in removing the obstruction. The jury answered the first question,—We believe that the defendants acted in the belief that it was according to right in the first place. The chairman then said,—Do you think they are guilty because they did more than was necessary to be done in asserting that right? The Foreman.—Yes, by destroying it and throwing it over the cliff. The Lord Chief Justice thought that on the whole the charge of the chairman did convey the points it was necessary for the jury to consider. The conviction must, therefore, be affirmed.

The other learned JUDGES concurred.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., 1898.
Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } March 7.

Lunacy—Execution creditor—Receiver in lunacy—Jurisdiction of the Court over lunatics' property.

The Court has not jurisdiction to compel the creditors of a lunatic to come to it for payment, or to restrain them from pursuing their legal remedies against property of his not actually under the protection of some one appointed by the Court to take care of it.

This was an original application to the Court sitting in lunacy, the case being that of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. It appeared that a judgment creditor of Charles Clarke issued a fi. fa. on January 8, 1898, under which the judgment debtor's goods were seized on January 17, 1898. After the judgment had been obtained—viz., on December 31, 1897, a summons in lunacy was taken out in order to obtain the appointment of a receiver under section 116 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1890. Notice of the pendency of this summons was given to the judgment creditor before he issued the fi. fa. After the seizure under the fi. fa.—viz., on January 18, 1898—an interim receiver was appointed and notice was given to the sheriff to withdraw which, however, the execution creditor told him not to do. On January 21, 1898, an order appointing a receiver was made, and notice of this order was given to the sheriff and he was again asked to withdraw, but the execution creditor directed him not to do so, and he remained in possession. On January 28, 1898, the sheriff issued a summons in lunacy asking for directions how to act, and this summons was adjourned into Court and came on to be heard on February 16, 1898.

Mr. Manisty was for the applicant; Mr. S. O. Buckmaster and Mr. Ivor Bowen were for the receiver, the wife of the lunatic; Mr. Edward Ford was for the execution creditor.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships reserved judgment.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in reading the judgment of the Court, stated the facts as above set forth, and continued as follows:—On that occasion (February 16, 1898), it being obviously for the benefit of every one that the sheriff should be got rid of, and no one objecting, the Court ordered the sheriff to sell the goods and to pay the proceeds, less his expenses, into Court in the matter of lunacy. But this order was made without prejudice to any question between the lunatic or the receiver in lunacy on the one hand and the execution creditor on the other, and the Court took time to consider their respective rights and the right of the Crown as the protector of lunatics and their property. These rights have now to be determined. Unless the right of the Crown and the jurisdiction of the Judge in lunacy can be regarded as arising when the summons was taken out—viz., on December 31, 1897—so as to place the lunatic and his property under the protection of the Crown on and after that date, it seems plain that the proceeds of sale ought to be paid to the execution creditor and not to the receiver in lunacy. It is very true that the property in goods seized under a fi. fa. remains in the execution debtor until sale (Giles v. Grover, 1 Cl. and Fin., 72). But it is no less true that after seizure and before sale the execution creditor is as regards those goods in the position of a secured creditor. See "Ex parte Williams" (L. R., 7 Ch., 314) and "Slater v. Pinder" (L. R., 7 Ex., 95). He had a legal right as against the execution debtor—i.e., owner of the goods—to have the goods sold and to be paid out of the proceeds of their sale. Further, in this case it cannot be said that the goods were ever in the possession of the receiver. Even if an order appointing a receiver related back, which it never does, the receiver has never in fact been in possession of the goods. This circumstance distinguishes this case from "In re Winkle" ([1894] 2 Ch., 519), where the receiver had possession and the sheriff had not, he having gone out of possession under an order of a Judge at Chambers. The judgment of the Court proceeded entirely on this ground, and "In re Winkle" is no authority for saying that the Court in lunacy can deprive execution creditors of their rights over property not under the control of the Court when seized under legal process. The cases of "In re Plenderleith" ([1893] 3 Ch., 332) and "In re Farnham" ([1895] 2 Ch., 799, and [1896] 1 Ch., 836) show that whilst on the one hand the Court will not allow property in its custody and belonging to a lunatic to be applied otherwise than for his benefit, and will not pay his creditors out of it without first providing for him, yet, on the other hand, the Court in lunacy has no jurisdiction to interfere with the rights of creditors to seize and sell by legal process property of the lunatic which at the time of seizure is not in the custody of the Court. It was, however, suggested that as soon as the summons in lunacy was issued the jurisdiction of the Crown exercisable by the Judge or Court in lunacy became exercisable over the lunatic's property, and that his property ought to be regarded as under the protection of the Crown from that time. In a sense this is true, for as soon as the summons was issued the Judge in lunacy had jurisdiction to make orders for the protection of the lunatic's property; but until some order is made showing that the Crown has actually taken the property of the lunatic under its protection it has never yet been held to be withdrawn from legal process by a creditor of the lunatic. The Court in lunacy has gone far even before any inquisition to protect an alleged lunatic and his property. It has punished persons entrapping an alleged lunatic into a marriage (see "Smart v. Taylor," 9 Mod., 98), it has restrained an alleged lunatic from execution instruments disposing of his property ("Ridgeway v. Darwin," 8 Ves., 65), and it has in quite recent times protected the property of an alleged lunatic against seizure by his creditors by appointing an interim receiver ("In re Pountain, 37 Ch.D., 609.) The statute De Prerogativa Regis, which has always been regarded as defining the power of the Crown in lunacy matters, has been very widely construed—e.g., it has been held to extend to a lunatic's personal property, although land and tenements alone are mentioned. But it is quite clear from Lord Eldon's observations in "Ex parte Hastings" (14 Ves., 182) and "Ex parte Hall" (Jac., 160) that the Court in lunacy could not protect a lunatic from arrest under a ca. sa., and could not prevent a judgment creditor from issuing execution against his property if the creditor could reach it by ordinary writs of execution without interfering with the possession of an officer of the Court in lunacy, and this doctrine is as well settled now as it was then, as is shown by "Brockwell v. Bullock" (22 Q.B.D., 567) and "In re Farnham" ([1896] 1 Ch., 836). If, indeed, the creditor has done anything to give the Court in lunacy jurisdiction over him it is another matter (see "Ex parte Weaver," 2 Myl. and Cr., 441, and other cases of that kind noticed by L. J. Fry in "Brockwell v. Bullock"). We have looked to see whether the fact that the Judge in lunacy can now sell a lunatic's real property for the payment of his debts enables the Court to compel creditors to come to that Court for payment, and to restrain them from pursuing their legal remedies against property not actually under the protection of some one appointed to take care of it. The power to sell the real property of a lunatic for payment of his debts was first given in 1830 by 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., c. 65 (see sections 28 and 30), and this power has been continued under later statutes ever since. But it has always been held both before and since 1830 that the Court in lunacy cannot compel a creditor to come in and prove his debt in lunacy by restraining him from issuing execution if he can do so without interfering with the officers of the Court. "Brockwell v. Bullock" and the cases cited in it show this to be the law now, as it always was. We can find no trace of the exercise by the Court in lunacy of any such jurisdiction as we are referring to. We find a long course of decisions inconsistent with the possession of any such jurisdiction; and we are not prepared now for the first time to assert it. It would, we think, be wrong to creditors to do so, and not necessary for the protection of infants or lunatics, for an order for a receiver or an injunction can in an urgent case be obtained very summarily, and such an order affords all the protection which is really necessary. It was contended that under section 117 of the Lunacy Act the Court could sell the goods seized, they being the property of the lunatic. But the Court could only sell the lunatic's interest in those goods; it could only sell them subject to the security of the execution creditor; and this would not benefit the lunatic in the present case. No doubt the Court could have directed the receiver to redeem the execution creditor's security by paying the judgment debt and the sheriff's charges, and then to sell the goods; but the Court was not asked to do this, nor did it appear that the receiver had money in her hands which she could have applied for such a purpose. As soon, therefore, as the money is paid into Court it ought to be paid out to the execution creditor if the amount does not exceed his debt and costs. An order to that effect will be made by the Master. The execution creditor is also entitled sooner or later to be paid the unpaid balance of his judgment debt and his costs of those proceedings out of the lunatic's property applicable to such payment; but the creditor must apply for such payment to the Master, who will give the receiver proper directions on the subject. The receiver must also apply to the Master for payment of her costs.

*Reported by E. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE WARSAW.*

Ship—Collision—Compulsory pilotage—River Tyne—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 604(1)—Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act, 1865, sec. 16.

In this case the plaintiffs were the owners of the steam-tug Warrior, and claimed damages from the defendants, the owners of the steamship Warsaw, for colliding with their tug, which was lying moored alongside another steamer at the Felling buoys in the river Tyne. The defendants alleged that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the pilot of the Warsaw, who was employed by compulsion of law. On March 4 the Court, with the assistance of the Trinity Masters, found that the collision was solely occasioned by the fault of the pilot, and reserved judgment on the question of compulsory pilotage.

Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Boyd, Q.C., and Mr. F. Laing for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in delivering a considered judgment, said,—The Warsaw was at the time on a voyage from Leith to Newcastle with a general cargo and 51 passengers, and was proceeding up the river Tyne in charge of a pilot duly licensed by the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners. I have already decided that the collision was solely occasioned by the fault of the pilot, and the question now arises whether or not the employment of the pilot was compulsory by law. The question depends upon statute law. The first subsection of section 604 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, makes it compulsory for every master of a ship carrying passengers between any places in the British Islands to employ a qualified pilot whilst navigating within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed under this or any other Act, and imposes a penalty of £100 on the master for failing to do so. Subject to a contention raised by the plaintiffs' counsel, this subsection is applicable to and determines this case in favour of the defendants. The plaintiffs' counsel, however, contended that, notwithstanding the said section, the vessel was exempted from compulsory pilotage by virtue of the 16th section of the order confirmed by the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act, 1865. That section is as follows:—"Nothing in this order shall extend to oblige the owner or master of any vessel to employ or make use of any pilot in piloting or conducting such vessel into or out of the said district, or within any part thereof, if he is not desirous so to do, or to pay any pilotage dues when not employing or making use of a pilot." The 22nd section of the same order provides that "nothing in this order shall exempt the commissioners or the pilotage district aforesaid from the provisions of any general Act of Parliament now in force or hereafter to be passed relating to pilotage or pilotage dues or to merchant shipping." I am of opinion that, in the absence of any previous decision binding the Court to decide otherwise, the 604th section of the Act of 1894 expressly imposed upon the master of the Warsaw the duty to employ a qualified pilot, and that the order and Act of 1865 do not free him from this duty. It was, however, urged for the plaintiffs that the present case is governed by the decision in the case of the Johann Sverdrup, reported in 11 P.D., p. 49, and 12 P.D., p. 43. In that case the question was as to the effect of the Act of 1865 upon a previous Act regulating pilotage in the Tyne. That was an Act passed in 1801, which compelled foreign vessels coming into or leaving the Tyne to employ pilots licensed by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The Act of 1865 transferred the old jurisdiction of the said Trinity House to the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners, by whom the pilot in charge of the Johann Sverdrup was licensed. It was held that the Act of 1865 superseded the pilotage provisions of the Act of 1801, and that no obligation to employ a pilot was imposed by the said 16th section upon any vessel, whether British or foreign. It will be seen that no question was raised or considered as to the effect of the 354th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, for which the 604th section of the Act of 1894 is now substituted. The order of 1865 was made under the powers conferred by the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862, section 39 (replaced by certain sections of the Act of 1894), and confirmed by the Act of 1865, and, although it superseded the local Act of 1801 and substituted new regulations for those contained in that Act, there is nothing in it inconsistent with the 354th section of the Act of 1854 or the 604th section of the Act of 1894. The said 16th section does not even expressly exempt vessels from employing pilots. It merely provides that nothing in the order shall extend to oblige the owner or master of any vessel to employ a pilot or pay pilotage dues, and it is followed by the said 22nd section. The case of the Temora (Lush, 17) was cited by the defendants. That case was not decided on the exact point now in dispute, and, although it is favourable to the defendants, it is not necessary to rely on it, because I am of opinion, for the reasons above set forth, that the 604th section expressly makes the pilotage compulsory upon vessels circumstanced as the Warsaw was, and that the Act of 1865 does not prevent its application. Therefore, although the plaintiffs have unfortunately suffered loss through the collision in question, as the collision was solely occasioned by the fault of the pilot, and there was no fault on the part of the defendants or their servants, the defendants are not responsible for the loss, and my judgment must be in their favour with costs.

THE MOLSON'S BANK V. COOPER AND SMITH AND OTHERS.*
Bankruptcy—Proof—Loan—Realization of securities.

The appellants lent money on securities to a firm which subsequently failed. Having realized the securities they nevertheless sought to recover judgment for the whole indebtedness, so that they might obtain a larger dividend in the bankruptcy.

Held, that they could not do so.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada of December 9, 1896.

Mr. Shepley, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. Hume Williams appeared for the appellants.

The respondents, Messrs. Cooper and Smith, were boot and shoe manufacturers at Toronto, and they had an account with the Molson's Bank. Having applied to the bank for a line of credit, they received from the manager, Mr. Pipen, on June 13, 1891, a letter stating that the board had granted them a line of credit to the amount of $150,000, to be secured by collections deposited, at a rate of interest of 6 per cent., with one-quarter commission on all cheques and collections outside the city of Toronto. To that letter there was a postscript stating that its meaning was not that the advances should be fully covered by collections, but as near as the respondents could. The respondents stopped payment in August, 1893. In the interval the bank had made large cash advances to the firm in the way of discount of their promissory notes. The respondents from time to time handed the bank large numbers of their customers' notes and bills as collateral security for the advances so made. At the time of the firm's failure the bank held their promissory notes to the amount in all of $145,000, all of which they had discounted for the firm. The bank held as collateral security under the letter of June 13, 1891, customers' notes, which they proceeded to realize, and in respect of which, when the action was brought, they had actually received $83,000. The suit was brought for the recovery of the whole indebtedness, $145,000, and the defence set up was payment or satisfaction in whole or in part by the money received by the bank on the collateral notes. Mr. Justice Rose, who tried the action without a jury, gave judgment for the bank for the full amount of the notes sued upon, holding that they were not obliged to credit the money in their hands against the notes, but were entitled to retain the fund so realized as a reserve fund, carrying the amount to the credit of a suspense account. The Divisional Court, on appeal, set aside that judgment, deciding that the bank were bound to apply the money in reduction of the respondents' debt, and that it ought to be applied pro tanto in payment of the notes sued upon.
